"Right now some of those foreign people are looking at us in a sneering way Jennie" observed the touchy southern Calvinian boy, indignantly, and I give you my word for it they are beginning to say among themselves that Hen Conditer belonged to the wonderful patrol. Jennie was very subtly got to do something to clear the good name of our patrol."

"We will rely on the girls scout, simply and yet with that reasonableness which has carried conviction in its train. Already I've got a good suspicion. There may be nothing to it but it has given me an idea, where we ought to look first of all and convince Violet of her sister and Penrod to that fact for they will no doubt lead the hunt."

"Please tell us about it Jennie!" begged Toby.

"I just knew Jennie would get on the track double quick time" asserted Landy who always believed there was nothing impossible to the great girl scout leader, once she set herself to a task."

"It all came about from hearing a little boy talking when I was down in the market yesterday morning hunting up some special good vegetables which Penrod asked me to get and to which dinner he begged me to come and share with his sisters. Maybe you know who he is and maybe you don't, he is Johnny Anderson, the boy who always ships out a raft of dried ginseng roots every year so they say, and in the Spring sends a good bunch of Musk rats to this city."

"Sure we know Johnny" assented Toby quickly. "He comes to this city with a big load of hay once every week. His folks live a long ways off up beyond the two Lakes Lake Pando and Lake Murmur, where he of the Wolf Patrol used to go camping last year."

"That's right" said Jennie Turner and their farm borders that terribly big Forbidden Swamp lying beyond Lake Pando, a dangerous swamp to those who don't know the way in and out, full of bogs and quick sands. Well I happened to tell Johnny or happened to hear Johnny I mean tell how he had taken a look through the swamp the other day just to find out how the Musk rats were coming on, so as to get a pointer on his winter business this year. He said he honestly believed there must be some number of men hiding there or doing something there, because in several places he had come upon many tracks made by men's shoes."

"But people sometimes go in Forbidden Swamp to hunt don't they Jennie?" objected Lill Aggie.

"Not now with two big armies confronting each other, and even at this time no one could find any kind of game up there you know, and nothing else could be shot at as they say these swamp animals can scent the presence of so many men and flee away from some where." Jennie Turner continued. "But Johnny has something else to say that interested me considerably. It seemed at several no a number of places he found ashes that told of a fire, and while rooting around in one of them he picked up a piece of steel that he allowed me to see and gave to me. It had evidently been filed and boys can you guess what it made made me think it must have once been?"

"Although all of them looked eagerly interested, they shook their heads and wondered why as though they would not be able to guess at any effort."

"Go on Jennie and tell us!" urged Toby.

"Yes let down the bars and relieve our anxiety please Jennie." Added Lill Aggie.

"Unless I am way off in my reckoning," said the other solemnly. "It was a pair of steel hand cuffs such as officers fasten to the wrists of Glandian Indian prisoners when taking them to the camp, especially despatching especially despatching dangerous prisoners."

It was about three o'clock on the following afternoon when a cavalcade of children riding as many husky horses and led by seven beautiful little girls moved slowly and carefully along the shores of the treacherous Lake Pando a many miles away from the city of Pando and from the Christian Christian lines. All the horses were mounted by lively lads and girls all of them in the uniform of Abbeemian boy and girls scouts, the kind as a rule that distinguish Child Scouts in Abbeemian, different from what they are seen in other countries as they were armed to the teeth like Abbeemian cavalry. Counting the beautiful little girls it would be seen that they numbered just seven, and this included a whole regiment of girl scout, and an extra regiment of boy scouts including all those whom we met on the road under the spreading branches of the big oak (poke yoke) and Mark Canning's Prince Penrod, and James Anderson and his sisters in addition. Since the entire membership of the Wolf Patrol here visiting the Vivianites consisted of eight it was plain that the only one lacking was the unfortunate Hen Conditer. As he was a Violet and her sisters were they had firmly made up their minds at any risk to exert themselves to the utmost in the hopes of finding the little deserter, and bringing him back to camp, and therefore they had set to work preparing for the campaign. As said as they were now they kept their weapons to themselves as much as possible, and though they did not feel like speaking it was their force up to Prince Penrod for their sake to give such advice as was required by all the others, telling them to go as light as possible since they would have to be moving around, and ordinary camp material could not be considered. There was chance too that they might be compelled to remain out in the open for quite a number of nights, and there for there were plenty of nights or ways rather where by they could secure shelter without carrying along such a cumbersome thing as a tent. As no body no matter what their work was to be would not miss a single base in the morning two police had been brought along. Each boy and girl had their rubber military rain coat strapped to their backs (Abbeonnan child scouts do not wear common Scout ponchos but wear a full sized raincoat). Each of them carried their most trusty rifles, a had their hand grenades, and pistols and sabres, not that they expected they would need all that against a single man and a boy but that there was chance they might encounter a landallian cavalry patrol and they must be prepared. Besides this all of the scouts had seen to it that each one had some sort of a food supply, in the shape of bread, wheat, dried beef, and such things as could be most easily packed. As Penrod had declared they expected to be like "The Hermann hummers" and live off the country as they went along, though ready to pay good cash for any and all eggs, or bread secured from the farmers.

"Uncle Josh" as one of the boy scouts was called had arranged to carry a coffee pot along together with a supply of the ground bean, while Andy had a big frying pan fastened to his pack, which the others laughingly just knew would be frequently tripping him up, and making all so sort of noises when they meant to steal silently along, and therefore Violet had ordered him to see to it it was tied to the horse's saddle instead to his pack. Just what they meant to fry in that pack no one fully knew; but they were strong in hopes, and believed that things would turn up to satisfy their hunger when the sensation became too acute. They had no choice on the road since early morning for it was a long way up to Lake Pandora but so far they met with no foes as they were still within the christian lines which were very wide. As this region before had been the scene of some of the bloodiest fighting around the country near Pandora of course the conversation among the boy and girl scouts covered many memories connected with those experiences for they had worked hard during the battle and had seen much service. The horses had shown signs of playing out some miles back, but they had managed to coax them along and there was little doubt now that they would reach their intended destination inside of a very short time. This was a farmer's place that lay near to the big swamp at the head of the big Pandora Lake, a body of water so wide that it would take three days for the fastest ship to cross. Here they would arrange to leave their horses while searching the dark recesses of the swamp. As all of them even Violet and her sisters had an unusual amount of experience in such unsavory places they believed they knew fairly fairly well how to go about the hunt. Only they had to look out for quicksand, and quicksand here was peculiar, that even if you was roped and a rope thrown around the neck of a horse, the animal could not pull you out.

"Well then we ought to get near that large farm mighty soon now I should think Jennie," remarked Penrod himself as he flicked the back of his horse's neck to disturb a big greenfly that was trying to stab the sweat covered animal in a tender spot.

"From what I have been able to find out, and from what I know from my own experience up here," Jennie answered, "The north bend of this lake lies just beyond that patch of willow trees and we will see the farm house as soon as we make the next turn. Easy there with your horse the Violet dear you came near being thrown out of the saddle just then."

"The peaky old road is so narrow and rough it's hard to keep any of our horses from going straight," complained, ill Aggie in disgust for one foot of his own horse had indeed slipped over the edge and his escape too from a bad spill from the saddle had been a close shave.

"I reckon since the forbidden swamp must lie over in that direction then," remarked Jimie pointing as he spoke.

"Just what it does," replied Angelina, who was leading them and not looking as a gullie.

"It sure looks dreadfully gloomy, I should say," remarked Jennie.

"Swamps always do you must know," Penrod told his friends. "Yes," added Anna, "some of them are always half dark even in the middle of the day. That is because of the thick jungle of vines that hang from trees to around the canopy of branches and thick clouds of leaves overhead. Why down south in my country, where Spanish and other kind of moss cover the trees in the swamps, it is almost dark as a rule." "But Prince there's one thing I don't understand," suggested Landy Andy looking aside ways at the sad tearful eyes of poor Violet and her sisters. "Out with it then, and if I can explain I would be only too willing." He was told.

"Supposing now for the sake of argument that a stranger was a treacherous dirty tricky of a landallian spy who had escaped from our lines some where, and that he managed to get a strategic hold on our camp, then, so that the other just had to do whatever he was told, told—get all that do you, supposing that he did not really write that note, that the spy made him do it, and then to cover himself kidnapped the boy. Well if he skipped with the boy out of Pandora city night before last how under the sun could they get way up here in a day or two?"

"Yes it is something like thirty miles from the christian armies outside of Pandora I should say," declared Jennie Turner, and it takes that boy

Johnny a day and a night to get to the outskirts of the christian lines with his load, all down grade too, you remember that Hen Conditt never was anything to brag of in the line of a long distanced walker though he is good at horse back riding. "Hiding."

"He may have had to make up his mind that he had to do some fast sprinting unless he rode a horse," said Prince Penrod when he realized what a honest nest he had stirred up back the road in Pandora.

"Yeth," remarked Ted Stancklinburg who had been listening to all this talk with certain ideas of his own, and lots of times it isn't the very hard to get a life on the road. Wagons and so forth happen along you know and the farmers here in Abbeonnan a every thoft hearted people you these."

"As going to say the very same thing," Ted "Jennie Turner," remarked, "when you took the very words out of my mouth. Yes they may have had a lift or else Hen had to stretch himself to do the most vigorous walking of his career if he and his companion had no chance to take horses to ride. All of which is based on the supposition that they did come away up here and are hiding right now some where about if not in the forbidden Swamp."

"I suppose you are figuring on what Johnny said eh Jen?" asked Penrod. "I'm a figuring on a whole lot of things and it don't need at all time or what ever you pronounce it, we piled the other" and among them is the fact that more than a dozen unknown men have been using the dangerous swamp for a hiding place of late to try and find out intentions of the christian generals."

"Perhaps we will learn a heap more about it after we strike the farm we are heading for," suggested Ted looking at the sad faces of Violet and her sisters.

"And there, if you look (the cook) now you can see the house, a, among the other those trees, with a little smoke coming out of the chimney at the kitchen end," said Jennie Turner pointing ahead.

Will Aggie deliberately took chances by moving one hand from the reins and vigorously rubbing his stomach with it.

"Oh I know something of what bullying old piping suppers farmers wives serve up," he hastened to say, throwing a little longer he could into looks and words. "And here's hoping we get an invitation to stay over there until tomorrow morning. If they are very pressing Prince, I entreat you not to hurry us off. As long as we have the swamp surrounded things can wait that long and we don't expect to do much in the night time you remember."

Prince Penrod first looked at his sisters, for he and they made no rash promises. Then he simply smiled, and started to talk of other subjects. Poor Will Aggie who did feel so empty after such a little lunch by the wayside was left in suspense. Violet and her sisters depressed by what had happened had eaten no breakfast, no one could have coaxed them to and they didn't even want to hear of food now.

"What's this farm we name?" asked Toby.

"Michael Elmeon," replied Penrod. "You know Johnny Johnny Green is only a board boy and he has to work for the farmer until he gets to a certain age, when he is supposed to be given a sum of money and be his own boss. That's the law in this country."

"Well all I hope is that we pick up some decent clue around here," said Will Aggie. "Yes and a bully supper in the bargain, that will fill a horrible vacuum and put us all in fighting condition."

All the time of this conversation Violet and her sisters had not said a word. They felt too down hearted to do so, and their mind and heart was on the boy's side. That's what I wanted something of a 46 as mention. Dogs began to bark, crows to crow, cows to moo, moo, moo, and even a donkey started to bray in a fearful fashion. Immediately Johnny Green, the boy who trapped me, came running out from the tough appearing boy about fifteen years of age came running out from the big barn where he had been milking some of the cows for he held a three legged stool in one hand as though it might be some weapon of defense. The farmer a long lanky individual with a keen honest face also bobbed in eight, holding a curly comb, while at the kitchen door could be seen the tall graceful figure of his pretty wife evident bound to learn what was happening even if hard to believe in consequence. Three tow headed wild eyed little children evidently the offspring of the farmer and his wife who had been playing at teeter with a plank laid over a carpenter's "horse" for a saw, ranged themselves all in a row, and gaped their fill at the strange and magnificent spectacle of a long column of boy and girls armed like cavalry soldiers and all dressed alike except Violet and her sisters who did not wear uniforms but just plain purple clothing.

 Penrod rode forward ahead of the column and asked:

"Are you the farmer's wife?"

"That I sure am son, what fetches the hull lot of you up this way? Meaning to camp on the lake shore it might be! I've heard about the boy and girl scout troops of the Vivians army, Johnny, yonders, been apining to join em this long time back, but of course it aint to be thought of, with him so far away."

"Yes the main band here" said Penrod are the Vivianites but seven of the boys here belong to the Wolf Patrol Mr Farmer. But I'm the leader and more than that but the son of the Vivian, Prince Penrod! Perhaps you know of my Father. He there for not paying any attention to the "rank astonishment of the farmer there upon him" introduced his sisters whom the farmer stared at as he if he thought he saw beautiful ghosts and some of his officers too and even mentioned position as Doctor father of James Andre as occupied a prominent position as Doctor Then he added "but Mr Farmer we have not exactly come up here to camp out this trip" after bowing to the farmer's wife who had first darted indoors to see that her supper was not burning and then hurried to join them. Penrod knew that the truth might just as well come out in the beginning as later. On this account he did not hold anything back but he perfectly frank with the owner of the lake farm.

"What might be your object then Prince?" asked the tiller of the soil respectfully and possibly feeling a bit of natural curiosity in the matter and yet not able still to keep his eyes off Violet and her sisters.

"Ask him first of all won't you Prince?" pleaded till Aggie, as though he feared lest this important matter be lost sight of in the confusion of affairs. "Whether he can spare some of us some eggs and a few broilers to take into the old swamp with us."

"I guess ma c- n't let you have what you want along them lines. I replied the farmer. "Though seems like somebody's been amaking fuss with her laying hens lately. They keep disappearing right along. Sometimes I think it's a mink that's getting em but there ain't any signs of such a critter around; cause you know a mink'll kill as many as a dozen fowls in one night, and just suck their blood."

Prince Penrod exchanged suggestive looks with his sisters and Andre.
 "From what you say sir" he remarked quickly "you fowls are carried off bodily. Is that it?"

"They jest keep on getting less and less right along," the farmer admitted.
 "We and John Johnny here was thinking of setting up with guns to see if we could get a crack at the chicken thief, whether he was a mink, a badger or a to legged mink."

"That is what we was a meaning to do," agreed the said Johnny; glad to have his name mentioned in the matter at all though secretly he was all the time looking at Violet and her sisters and admiring their spiritual like beauty and innocence of looks."

"Well we've got a good hunch, Mr Farmer" said till Aggie, bound to get his say in the affair and thinking Penrod was too slow in getting to the point "That we might put you mine to that some thief or thieves."

"I'd shore be glad to hear it," declared the farmer. "Johnny a here has been sayin as how he believes there's a faller hiding out in the swamp, cause he seen his tracks. I even reckon on sending to the army for help and see if we could run him down with some bounds."

"Well Mr Farmer that is what we about to be doing," said Penrod. "And
 And now if you'll listen to something I've got to tell, you can understand what sort of interest we have got in this thing."

So in a few words as possible he told the story of how Hen condithad been reported to have acted in such a queer way, robbing General Jack Evans and the Prince's pocket of important papers for military purposes as those were not touched but of Andre's money which he had hidden in the safe and actually leaving a silly letter that fastened the crime on his own shoulders.

"He was seen by one of my chums talking with a strange man just the day before before this happened" continued Prince Penrod. "It hurt a man more than any thing, because I and my sisters did so much for the boy and that this is a very bad act of ungratefulness on his part. If it can be proven against him we Abieannians do not forgive an act of ungratefulness and will punish him within the full limit of our power when we capture him, and too we can charge him with rank desertion. We also believe the man was the same old unknown party who has been hiding in "Forbidden Swamp" for a time past, and as you have just told us living off your flock of fowls, with another large squad of boy and girl scouts started off last night the swamp; it already our bounded so that he and the boy cannot escape if they are still there. Johnny here down in the hay market, gave my friend Jimmie Farmer something he picked up in the swamp near some sheds. He said it is Mr Farmer and all of us believe firmly it is a part of a steel military hand cuff which was filed in half showing that the man must be a desperate character of a spy escaped from some interrum net camp of the army."

At that the farmer's wife uttered a little shriek, and began to look frightened.
 "Henny" she told her husband authoritatively "you go get your gun right away.
 And Johnny chain the bull dog close to the kitchen door. After this I'm coming to make sure the barn in place when I'm left alone, and Henny kept inside the house along with me."

Prince Penrod guessed that the said Henny must be the bulldog. He also figured that as a rule the animal was kept in house at nights which accounted for his not interfering with the carrying off of the farmer's chickens. The farmer was plainly deeply interested by this time in the story come connected with the coming of the Prince, his sisters and all these gradually uniformed scouts.

"Sure I'll do all I can to help you land the critters Prince," he answered Penrod. "But that swamp is some big and some mighty dangerous and I guess as how you'll have all you want to do chasing through the same where half of it is quicksand. Supposing now you let things rest till to morrow and make an early start. Maybe we might bag the mink this very night, if so be they try to make another haul on my feathered stock, aiming to get a good turkey this time."

Of course Penrod could see through a grindstone that had a hole in its center. He knew very well that the farmer wanted to make use of them all in order to protect his property but it seemed Penrod's purpose just as well to readily agree to the proposition. As for till Aggie his eyes were almost popping out of his head with suspense; he was licking his lips after the manner of a most hungry dog when scenting a bone. Penrod asked Violet and her sisters if they wished to eat any supper but they slowly shook their heads but Penrod was determined that they must eat something.

"We will stop over with you then Mr Farmer," agreed the Prince and before morning try to finger out our plans of campaign looking to "Forbidden Swamp".
 up, the chicken thief as we are believed to be hiding in "Forbidden Swamp".
 "I'm sorry for one thing" remarked farmer's wife wife who apparently hailed the decision of Prince Penrod to run and her soul with joy that was not to be denied.

"What might that be, ma?" asked till Aggie in a quivering voice for the poor boy began to have a terrible fear that she was about to warn them that the stock of provisions were much too valuable to be wasted on even a deserving company of boy and girl scouts.
 "Of course we'll be glad to have as many of you as you can have supper with us, and a good breakfast too for that matter," she told them. "But as there are so many of you that I'm afraid I couldn't find beds enough to go around even if you all doubled up."

At that the poor elongated scouts gave a loud laugh, the clouds passed from his face like magic. If he could only be positive of his regular relations it mattered nothing to till Aggie where he laid his head.

"I don't let that little thing bother you Mrs. Jennie" he hastened to say, in a way making himself spoken for the whole crowd; why we are used to camping out you see and in our time we all even including the prince have slept in the queerest beds you ever heard tell of."

the big oak trees. The sky was unusually black with faint distant forest fires smoke and yet while it was not actually too dark the boys and girls had some difficulty in seeing as well as they might have liked. Penrod and his sisters were listening to the faintest sound. They wondered why they did not already hear the groans and whines of the wretched thief who had been hung up by the heels without receiving a second warning... The minute thing how Johnny had been whisked above, Penrod himself felt sure no one could be blamed for letting out that shriek when the outcast ropes came about. No one would have thought it queer if the suspended rascal kept up his groans as he writhed and twisted in a vain effort to reach up to the limb, which was so beautifully shaped that it was not even a circus contortionist would have been able to do. He imagined he heard some sound ahead of them, but even at that Penrod could be certain and when he asked one of his sisters she said she heard nothing. Another of them said it must be the night breeze sighing through the upper branches of the tall trees or the alarmed turkeys holding a confab among themselves for all she could tell... But they were rapidly bearing down upon the spot now and in another half minute ought to be where they could see the creaking figure of the caught thief of rope.

"I saw something away yonder," Johnny ventured Catherine in a surprised tone, "but it doesn't make no sound."
"Huh, something's gone wrong then I guess with the one caught," grunted the inventor and if Catherine could feel surprised what a surprise it must have been to Johnny when he saw a dangling figure to greet him but that despite the wild yell so full of mortal agony if not terror. Perhaps wise and shrewd Penrod, and also his sisters had begun to hazard a shrewd guess as to the why and wherefore of this silence. They were gnat at need, feeling through things before the answer came to any of their chum.

If this were so at least they did not venture as yet to say anything to them about it. But now all of them save slow poke, Andy, Andy who could not run fast because he was fat had arrived at the tree. They could hear the alarmed turkeys making some twittering sounds above but if any of them had flown off the rest remained on their roosts. Johnny had been smart enough to fetch his lantern along. This he now proceeded to light and as soon as the flick took fire he began to examine the trap.

"Holy Moses and Jumping Jack," exclaimed Johnny.
"Oh gone the luck, let us down let us down" some one wailed as though they were broken hearted by the outcast ropes.
Violet and her sisters looked in astonishment and bewilderment at the trap and then at Johnny.

"Please please let us down," came the wail.
"Good gosh!" gasped Penrod. "Your trap caught three persons on the same foot."
"And two of them are knocked unconscious by something," added Jennie Lu Mer.
"That's what comes of not testing things before hand" said Violet giggling, with the air of a wise dove who knew it all though that was only her way of speaking in her supercilious and excitement.
"Gee whiz he did test it Princess" said Jennie Lu Mer laughingly "did we not see Johnny hanging head down. There's some sort of a mystery about it that's all."

"Not much" said Penrod, who while others were talking and prying no attention to the victim unless for mercy had been examining the end of the rope; "The noose must have been bigger than usual and caught the three of them at once by that's all."

"I guess we'll have to cut the culprit down with a knife do you think so Penrod," cried one of the others.

"No, no" cried Johnny against. "We can move the huge hand back."
"That's right just what we can do" continued Penrod firmly.
Every body had to push up to examine the three hanging there and the there was no dissenting voice after that. They knew that Penrod and Violet and her sisters were a light as they always appeared to be in matters like this.

"But say please, please, please, cut me down cut me down I'm getting sick hanging here by one leg I tell you!" demanded the man.

"Maybe I'll help you get loose when I feel like it," suggested the bound boy. "Caught three of you with one loop. Ha, ha, ha. That's good."

"How did the other two happen to get knocked out?" I wonder" said Joyce.

"Maybe in the suddenness of the outcast ropes they knocked heads to gether not to speak the whole against the limb with knockout force," suggested Violet.

Penrod.
"Just what happened as sure as anything," answered Catherine, while the sisters looked and giggled. "They were too smart for you boys that time" she said to the swinging prisoners.

I wonder how the loop got them all at the same time and by the same leg" too" said Daisy. "That looks strange."

"Maybe they got each foot in the same noose as it might have been big enough then to catch them" added Argeline. "See, here's the loop within our sight, and it's around the right leg of each of them. Some strong rope to hold the three without breaking."

Sure enough it was just as she said. The loop showed in plain sight around the right leg of the three of them. Johnny had hid himself behind a tree tree nearby to have his laugh out it was such a funny sight.

Penrod led by Violet and her sisters hurried to where the noose had been perched on the brink of the steep little descent. From there the rope stretched as tight as a harp string, and they had a hard time to get the noose to start to the bottom to let the three men down and as they came gradually down the one still conscious was covered with rifles.

Johnny was the most joyful and surprised fellow Penrod had come across in a long time. He kept muttering to himself as they were throwing cold water on the faces of the other two to bring them around. Johnny sure did seem to be in a happy frame of mind since his trap had caught three in one bunch and by the same leg.

"Now I understand how it happened" said Penrod. "It was just as if the three had tried to climb up with the same foot at the same time, for it seems the box itself was responsible for it must have slipped from under them. I heard sort of rumbling sound just before the shriek. The noose caught the three of them at the same time/2"

"And we didn't get a glimpse of H. N. Conditar after all" lamented Andy.
"Now I was hoping I'd see him here too."

"Yes it's all off now but maybe he wasn't around here," admitted Nettie.

"Of course after that now the boy if he was here wouldn't be silly enough to stay around here," suggested Daisy.

"Huh that old trap is more good than expected seeing as how it has captured that mess," chuckled Johnny. "I reckon any how as I'll have to think up some other trap to keep them from coming near the house too. But they ain't going to get any of them turkeys if I have to set up all night, a and boy, boy, boy a gun from you fellows in the bargain."

"What's the matter with tying Moses the bulldog to your front door in a nice dark spot?" remarked Penrod. "He's barking now at the kennel near the house. I'd certainly make use of the old dog if I were you Johnny."

"Just what I will do Penrod. Moses ain't a great hand to bark, bulls do the business with their teeth, stand O, with their nose. He's barking because he can scent I'm out here and wondering why. That is the only time he can give tongue. I'll fix him by the door for the rest of the night. What are you going to do with those three prisoners?"

"They have been hand cuffed and will be questioned the first thing in the morning" said Penrod. "They won't get away" he admitted truthfully. "Our scout sentinels are more watchful than owls and it would be a cinch for them to try and make a break. How does it come though the farmer hasn't shown up?" he added thinking it a bit queer Mr. Jensen displayed as it seemed so little in his interest in the safe keeping of his young turkeys."

"On him" chuckled Johnny. "Nobody ain't again tuh get him waked up once he hits the hay. I've been awakened at nights by the loudest thunderstorms you could ever imagine a hearing, and he there snooring like sawing wood all the time. Talk to me about sleeping, he kin beat anything yuh ever met. I bet t he misus is up and waiting to know if we grabbed one. Wait till I tell her the funny news. He, he, he of them hanging there at one time. What a funny sight it was."

"Was it possible after all that one of them had a chance to grab a turkey?" asked Violet, as she picked up several feathers from the ground near the trees."

"What do you say about that Johnny?" Penrod inquired.

"Well it don't stand tuh reason he did," replied the other gravely. "Even if one of those men did had held one at a time he never'd a held on tuh hit ar to that rope had slung him head down. A. do, guess I ort tuh know. If you don't believe it, and if any o yuh wants tuh feel what it's like I'll rig up the trap again in the mawnin' for yuh. Hold a turkey nowthin. He couldn't even hold his breath, but had tuh give a yell like a hundred soldiers was killing him."

Indeed they were all of pretty much the same opinion, no matter how brave a man the Glandelinian trespasser might be, when he met with such an sudden and unexpected upheaval as that running noose brought about his wife were bound to desert him for the time being at least.

It may have been noticed also, that at no one, even brave Violet and her sisters the most venturesome children of them all volunteered to make the additional test when morning came especially Catherine who had one experience like that already in her life time. They seemed perfectly satisfied to accept the will for the deed... They had witnessed the speedy bucking of Johnny's trap twice now, and from what they saw of the three men had no itching to try and find out what it felt like to hang head downward from the limb of a tree, with a leg almost dislocated by a sudden jerking powerful lever.

"Well we have no reason to cry over-seeing as we have these raskils." remarked Johnny. "The thing did it a work and that's all they is to hit. Might as well get Moses and fix him to a dark spot near our front door."

"Pen-rod dear, what are you thinking about?" asked Argeline just then, for being used to the ways of her brothers she could see that he was pondering something in his mind.

"If you want to know sis dear it was about that yell." Pen-rod admitted. "A pretty husky whoop in the bargain. Observed Joice. "I o my sisters used to think we could beat all creation letting out a yell, but that went one far better, you hear me talking."

"Yes" added Daisy "it sounded as if the top of the world had blown off the fellow fellows made such a howl, anyway that's how it seemed to me when I was waked up so suddenly."

"Have we ever heard a whoop like that before?" asked Pen-rod. "How you are thinking of Hen Conditor, of course Pen-rod. came from Jennie who saw it in his mind."

"Well Hen's got a good strong pair of lungs let me tell you," admitted Daisy. "I remember that time the cow accidentally tossed him two months ago and say he made every body inside of half a mile run out doors to see what was the matter. They found Hen straddling a limb of a tree, and whoop whooping it up for all he was worth. put that yell though it did come from a boy sure enough, did not sound like his voice though."

"And just as well any other boy badly scared." Hattie observed. "I think I myself would be able to do some fine yelling and screaming, and even shrieking if you call it that along those lines, under the same conditions."

"Then it seems that we will never be able to identify Henry by that shout." laughed Pen-rod (although he thought to himself it sounded like Gerald Star-rings voice) "but there is a way we can find something out, as all scouts ought to know."

That remark immediately put them all on their mettle though Catherine after looking questioningly at her sisters agreed and said:

"Sure thing Pen-rod dear, for of course you mean if we could find a trail around here smaller than the foot prints of those three men, we could at least pick out the different foot prints if not so, and any one of us girls ought to know something about the kind of shoes Hen wears."

"That's me a" admitted Jennie "because before this happened I happened to be going with foolish Hen more or less lately and she said the last words pretty sadly. "show me and my sisters the foot prints and I'll tell you soon enough if it is him."

Of course nothing could be done without the lanterns, they had left their flashlights in the saddle holsters so they kept close to Johnny telling the main body of scouts to spread out and keep watch. Johnny only carried a lantern. From time to time he was given instruction how to hold the light so they might examine certain prime spots.

"Hello Pen-rod's found something." suddenly exclaimed keen eyed Hattie Vivian, when she saw her brother stoop over almost under the tree, and along side the large dry goods box.

"That's so Pen-rod dear what is it?" three of his sisters asked him in a breath.

"Gather round me angel sisters" the other commanded "and let's see if any one of you can recognize what I have picked up."

"It must have fallen from the pocket of one of them when he was dangled so suddenly upside down." was the way Argeline Vivian put it; quick to guess the truth, though she herself had not thought of this possibility before.

"Correct for you Eva dear - that's what happened." Pen-rod admitted acknowledged.

"Is it a knife Pen-rod dear?" continued Argeline. "Once more you hit it." said the other, "and Eva dear since I know you too besides Jennie and violet have been going more or less with Hen lately perhaps you would be able to recognize his knife if you happened to set eyes on it?"

"To be sure I would Pen-rod dear." "You've handled it then have you?" "Lots of times because you see I've lost my own frog sticker some weeks back and I ain't had a chance yet to buy a new one." Argeline confessed.

"That sounds good to me." Pen-rod told her. "So now angel dear take a look at this, and tell us what you think."

"With that (get under your hat) he brought his hand around having been keeping it behind his back all this time to test their shrewdness secretly. When he opened it there was disclosed a common every day big jack-knife with a big buckhorn handle such as might be expected to be found in the pocket of almost any boy scout, and capable when given a keen edge, of performing miracles in the way of shaving sticks, and cutting up apples and slicing the strongest kind of rope. So Argeline, gravely though eagerly took up the knife while her sisters crowded around her eagerly. She carefully opened the big blade, and seemed interested in the certain nick she found there.

"Pen-rod dear, that settles it" she said finally "it's Gerald Star-rings knife, I'm positive beyond doubt, and that must have been him that escaped hanging from this tree a bit ago like his three men comrades did. I'm beginning to suspect that Gerald Star-rings was Hen in disguise."

"But we captured him and his two companions about four weeks ago didn't we?" protested Joice.

"Yes, but that scamp could escape from a labyrinth." said Catherine. They escaped during the time Andrews saved us from the unseen spies."

When Argeline settled the matter in this convincing fashion, and Joice made her surprising statement of having captured the three boys before the nearest of the scout officers showed more or less interest in the outcome.

"But sure Hen Conditor could not be Gerald Star-rings in disguise." put in Daisy. "I know Gerald's voice in a mile and I thought that was his yell but did not care to admit it."

"I'm beginning to believe something is funny" said Violet "but that proves one thing to us, Gerald Star-rings is up here alright. If foul play has after all been done to Hen I know who is at the bottom of it."

"It proves a whole lot of things according to my opinion" added Jennie Vivian as she nodded her pretty head in a way she had of emphasizing her determination. "It tells us that after all poor Hen did not do anything bad, that he must be in the hands of Gerald's glandelinians, for the man must be one of the spies, and maybe the boy with him who looked like Hen Hen Conditor might have been Gerald disguised like him."

"According to my notions Pen-rod dear" said Daisy seriously "the hand of that unknown man, if not men stands back of poor Hen's troubles. Until we had captured Gerald Star-rings and his two companions Hen didn't seem to have a single worry. He was always a light hearted chap."

"What under the sun can it mean?" queried Hattie, looking distressed because to tell the truth, she and her sisters and the missing scout, had been getting quite fond of one another lately, and the shock had told upon Violet and her sisters more than any boy scout belonging to the Wolf Patrol itself....

"I can tell you what I think." ventured Violet just then (get you when) "If Fred dok Lowden could really duplicate himself to look like our dear brother Pen-rod, and so treacherously deceive her, that same boy must have done something to poor Hen, copied ways to disguise to look as him and then wrote that note. I don't see other wise how he could make him do whatever he wants unless at a gun muzzle he made the boy accompany him to the swamp with Gerald star-rings in their escapade. Yes I even believe he either forced Hen to write that letter or wrote it himself himself. Needn't laugh Jennie dear, I've been reading it up all lately and there are some queer happenings along that line."

"Pen-rod how about that do you believe in it?" asked Jennie furme.

"I decline to commit myself--just yet at any rate." said the boy prince.

"If that little treacherous snake could make himself look like me on that one occasion it might be so he duplicated as Hen. I'd like to get my hands on that reptile. I confess that queer things do happen and a fellow who always refuses to believe because he doesn't understand is silly."

But we do know that either Hen was captured by glandelinians, or something mysterious was done, and what it is we are going to find out before we are many many days older."

"I like to hear you say that Pen-rod dear" cried Jennie Vivian herself "because I just seem to believe believe the thing is more more than half done when you set your mind to the work. I can't but help think how poor Hen must be feeling right now, after that treacherous Lowden might have put him into such a fix."

"If it wasn't for my little angel sisters I'd be sunk." said Pen-rod. "It is you who are giving me the inspiration."

"How about those tracks we started out to find?" asked Joice just then, hoping to prevent Penrod from pursuing her sister's further as they disliked praise, though of course on how they liked to praise others though. They had looked around for James Andrews but he had not followed. He had slept through it all.

"We'll give another look before going back to our sleeping quarters," replied the prince. "Just bring the lantern over, Johnny, they'd be apt to head away from the barn."

It was really in the direction of the nearby swamp that they now commenced to look. The wisdom of Penrod's figuring was soon made manifest, for they quickly ran across what they were looking for.

"Here you are," said Penrod, "and now get busy sister dear Jennie and see whether it is Hens or crows or Gerald Starlings."

"Yes Jennie dear drop down and see what you can make of the foot prints here," Angelina told her sister anxiously. "We want to find out then we won't need to feel so bad when we thought at first Hen had so cunningly double crossed us after all we did for him. It seemed it couldn't be."

Now Violet or any of her sisters had had good training in all kinds of work associated with scout craft. They had even taken numerous lessons in following a trail, and always gave a good promise of being a shining light in that respect.

"Please hold the lantern closer Johnny," she said as she thrust her nose down near the ground. "Yes, here is a foot print as clear as anybody would want to see and I sure ought to know the boy who made the same."

"Tell us why Jennie!" asked Penrod, with a pleased smile. "That is a very easy thing to do, Penrod dear. You see, look closely, that is a diagonal mark across the toes of this impression—well that is caused by a patch on the left shoe. All right Gerald Starling had just such a patch put on his shoe a week ago after we had captured him. You know that for a fact do you Jennie dear?" questioned the boy prince, who did not want any guessing about this business.

"Why I and my sisters sat there with the prisoner all the time the army shoe maker was working at the same, having accompanied Gerald to the cobbler's shop to make sure he didn't escape from us," continued Jennie. "What's more I studied the tracks he made every time he stepped in some half hard mud that day after he left the shop. Oh I am as sure of this foot print as I am that my name is Jennie Francis Vivian."

"Well then we've had double evidence," spoke up Jennie Turner. "And I guess that ought to settle the matter. It is Gerald Starling, and I'm afraid now it's our Hen that was dragged away to cover their escape. Penrod will it please pay to try and follow the trail?"

"Hardly not just now at any rate Jennie," the other told her. "We might aim to do something of the kind in the morning, but Angelina, Jennie and James Andrews will be selected to act as guides. I don't understand how these enemies of ours could risk such a dangerous swamp. If once caught in quicksand it's only a miracle that will get you out. But even here it looks as if they headed for the swamp. That's a point to remember comrades..."

Indeed most of those within hearing, and especially Violet and her sisters were just as well satisfied. The idea of starting on a trail that might soon take them into a dismal swamp where even a road may suddenly end into a treacherous quag was impossible to be rescued from, and at midnight in the bargain with a cloudy sky overhead mostly dark smoke did not appeal to any one of the men and especially Violet and her sisters who wouldn't do it under any conditions. Accordingly they turned back, heading for the friendly barn, attracted doubtless by fond memories of those comfortable beds in the sweet hay.

"How about the bulldog Johnny?" asked Penrod, as they reached the barn entrance.

"I'm meanin' tuh git Moses up yonder and tie him to a dark place by the door," replied the boy. "Our house has got tuh be look arter more o' them turks if he's tuh stay up all night tuh do the trick. And lemme tell uh Penrod I kin make up another trap jest as cunning as any ole fox. I'll git em yit if so be they keep hargin' around these parts."

"I believe you would Johnny," assented the other, who realized that the bound boy was displaying several good traits that would carry him along through the world once his time of bondage with the farmer was up. There being no reason why they should keep away from their sleeping quarters any longer, the scout troops headed by Violet and her sisters and Penrod entered the barn.

"Now but it's awful dark in here though," protested a protestor. Penrod after he had knocked his shin twice against some projection and even slammed into a high post that chanced to be directly in his way....2.2. "We'd better stand still for a little while so as to let our eyes get used to the gloom," suggested Violet. "It is always that way when you step from light into an awful dark place, you remember, but a few minutes later you can see all around you. It is better to waste a little time that a lot of cuticle."

"Just so," whined Jennie Vivian. "Already I believe half an inch of skin has been torn off my chin and I believe my nose is swelling where I banged the same against that awful post."

"Yes," piped in Daisy. "I stepped on the teeth part of the farmer's rake and the c handle made a connection with my forehead. I thought I say that I observed daylight when it struck me."

"Well," remarked Joice whose ankles had not been bruised. "I believe I can see a heap better already." But I hope Daisy that rake handle did not bruise you. That happened to me once, and I had a beauty spot for a week on my forehead."

All of them found that their eyesight soon became accustomed to the gloom, and that it was not so very bad after all. They had just managed to reach the place where their traps were left, and started burrowing in the hay again, when Penrod so very acute of hearing called their attention to certain suggestive sounds outside.

"That must be Johnny and his big brindle Bull dog going past on the way to his front door," ventured Hettie as they plainly caught a whine, and then a low howl that was vicious enough to make ones blood turn cold.

"If any more of those Glandelinians hidden in the swamp should be reckless enough to come back and try to enter the farm house," Joice was saying, as though she could not keep her mind from grappling with Hen's condition and his troubles. "They will surely be surprised and then some, when that ferocious old Moses grabs them by the legs, and holds on like every O every thing."

"For one now," admitted Angelina. "I would like to be excused from any session with the big white c white teeth of Moses that sticks up from his lower jaws. But if you will ask me my opinion I would say one good scare a night for Gerald especially was as much as any ordinary Glandelinian could put up with, when his three companions were hung up so funny like," and she giggled.

"Nothing doing for me either," murmured Joice, showing that she too was of the same mind as her sister. At least it was evident none of the boys and girls expected being disturbed again in their slumbers, for they went about settling down as though they meant to enjoy a good long session.

"Don't wake me up too early mother dear," Catherine was heard to say half to herself. "For to morrow won't be May the Poist, and I'm not to be the queen of the occasion either. Please let me have my snooze but every body please." "If you was attired as the queen of may you would surely look the part," said Penrod.

"Maybe," would because as you say I'm your little Daisy Flower." That made Penrod blush but it was too dark to see it, and some of her sisters tittered.

Evidently nothing did occur within to disturb their slumbers which doubtless were additionally sweet after that one break, but let me tell you dear readers the watchfulness of the boy and girl scout guards taking hourly turns at sentinel duty sure did prevent an awful disaster and tragedy.

A man was seen by some of them trying to climb up a certain rope hanging from the open door of the hay loft, and when they came nabbed him and searched him he had evidence within his pocket as that was a shock that sent a chill down the back bones of the captors.

"So you dirty devil," hissing one of the girls. "A fire bug eh. Wanted to set the hay afire while they were all asleep. Well fix persons like you." "Throw him into the bog in the swamp," suggested one.

"No well, do better," said the girl. "Let Penrod decide his fate."

"But heavens it would not be right to let the poor prisoners hear of the awful narro escape they had," said another. "It won't be no sin to make away with a dirty skunk like that. Think what would have happened had we not seen him. On god, not a one would have escaped alive. You know how fast hay burns."

"Aw throw him into the quicksand and none will be the wiser," suggested the same boy.

The man was dreadfully scared and pleaded for mercy. "Mercy for a devil like you," hissed one of the girls. "Evidence against you to make you face a firing squad in a hurry. Who sent you to do this?" The man was silent.

"All right. To the swamp with him," she said. Half a dozen kids dragged him protestingly forward and had him by the edge of the swamp and now with their flashlights looking for a sign of quicksand but could not find any trace here.

"Tie his hands and feet and drop him into the water," suggested one. "If Jerry Mercury pleads the frightened man for to Glandelinians it was Hell to be captured by these ferocious little Abbeesian soldiers."

"You don't deserve mercy. Tie his hands."

It was done and his feet too and he even had no chance to struggle.

"All right. Throw him in unless he makes up his mind to tell."

"I'll tell, I'll tell, don't throw him in please, there is quicksand under that water. Mercy Mercury."

"Who sent you to do that fiendish work?"

"Gerald Starling."

"Who is Gerald Starling, what general is he?"

"A Glandelinian boy scout."

"Oh I've heard of them little devils, but you know you might die any way. We hold you prisoner only till tomorrow and Penrod will hear of it."

"Have Mercy Mercury."

"That depends upon Prince Penrod. All right comrades tie him to a tree at the edge of the swamp and have five guards watch him. We'll fix his head to tomorrow morning."

This was done and the sentries waited till the morning.

Penrod had them all up when he considered that it was night and proposed to turn the sun was only peeping above the horizon through a red colored smoke haze and the birds still twittering among the trees nearby (but Penrod knew what great hands farm people the world over are about getting up in the morning at an early hour, and he did not wish to keep Mrs. Jensen's breakfast waiting for any sleepy heads. The slight protestations among some about getting up so early ceased the moment he mentioned that word "breakfast," and they all immediately announced themselves as being wide awake.)

"Hm. seems like I could even smell the batter cakes frying right now fellows," Penrod told them with a smack of his lips. "Notice that, soon to give them the well known name of flap jacks on this festive occasion, because we are going to eat at a regular table under a hospitable roof; and it is only when in camp that wheat cakes are called flap jacks."

"What am I going to eat for breakfast?" protested Violet. "You know Penrod dear, and my sisters don't like them."

"Eat them for the sake of the farmer's wife" put in Jennie. "They won't hurt you and she'll feel sad after she has made so many and you won't eat them. They'll do you good for the trip you're going to lead."

"A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," chorled Angeline. "Hiccup."

"Yes but if you kept eating it an onion you would soon think it did not," affirmed Violet. "I'm eating toast and milk and butter for breakfast and nothing else and so are my sisters, but say do you reckon that bell was meant for us. Oh where is my other shoe; they pinched me so I took them off in the middle of the night, and the left one has gone and hid in the hay."

"Maybe the rats got away with it Violet," suggested Penrod suspiciously. "I'm certain I heard them squeaking all around here, and you know they like pieces of shoes to make their nests with."

"If I get the rat maybe I'll try him for breakfast" laughed Violet good naturedly. It turned out however, that there was no damage done to a missing shoe was soon discovered under a wisp of hay, and quickly Violet crept out in the wake of her six sisters and Penrod. A second time the bell was heard and at that they all started on a run for the rear of the house where a number of tin basins and plenty of soap, as well as clean towels, were announced that the farmer's good wife had gotten things ready for them. Penrod had guessed right, perhaps his keen scent had discovered the odor of pancakes in the air for they were plain sight several good sized pyramids of the golden beauties with a big pitcher of maple syrup and plenty of fresh butter to go with the same. Mrs. Jensen may only have had three little girls of her own but she certainly had been brought up in a family where there were good boys because she knew so well what their weaknesses were, what with the fried eggs, pieces of sweet ham, strictly at dietly home grown and fresh, a great asher of sweet ham for those who do not like wheat cakes, coffee with genuine cream in the same, a dish of oatmeal it was a wonder some of those girl and boy scouts were not completely foundered. Violet and her sisters exactly ate what Violet said they would to the evident surprise of the farmer's wife, though of course they made good with the eggs too but drank milk instead of coffee. Yet Penrod had more or less difficulty in coaxing James and drew away from the table. The boy could not hardly breathe, he was so full, but he heaved many a sigh as he noticed that a fresh plateful of those unexcelled pancakes had been just put on, with no one left to do them justice. Shaking his head sadly, James finally managed to get on his feet and leave the dining room. His last look indeed spoke volumes; it said as plainly as anything those fully expressive words "though lost to sight, to memory dear" and probably never again in the course of human events would James Andrews equal the astounding record he made that same morning of thirteen pancakes straight, and Violet had asked him jokingly, "why not down thirteen more and be done with it?"

unexcelled

Penrod knew they would have a big day ahead of them, and was really anxious to get started. He had made arrangements with the farmer and his wife to supply such provisions as they could conveniently carry along with them for a couple of days, while they were carefully combing the big and dangerous forbidden swamp in the hope of coming across the parties they sought. If any of the Christian officials with soldiers to help them should put in an appearance, Penrod hoped they might be given such information as lay in the power of Mr. Jensen.

"We are not chaggin' you must know Mr. Jensen," he told the farmer as they were making their last preparations before starting forth. "much as we want to be the ones who will round up those Glandelinian lunkers in the forbidden swamp for if the soldiers come to take a hand in the chase we wish them every good luck possible. Yes and what is more if we meet across with them I'll command the soldiers to get those dirty snakes dead or alive for they last night according to the stories of the guards set a man over to set fire to the hay where we all lay."

"All we want" added Violet seriously "is a chance to assist our chum Hen condit. We now believe him not to be a deserter but a prisoner among those Glandelinians, and we are bent on setting him free even if we don't do not capture our enemies."

Each of the seven little girls had a certain lead to carry besides her other main coats and their packs were supposed to hold the extra food supplies as well. People no doubt on seeing that these consisted of might might imagine the swamp hunters meant to spend a very long time in their search, but then such persons would in that way betray their gross ignorance as to what the appetites of child scouts, and even of poor good Violet and her sisters always so much out in the open in all kinds of weather amounts to. They were taking no chances of going hungry and two whole days meant at least three times that many full meals, with sundry bites in between, which if Violet and her sisters themselves even did not have they would feel too faint and hungry to do anything or even walk.

Penrod often said he believed they didn't eat enough, and though they had been so stubborn about their toast and butter he did succeed in tiring each of them to eat at least three wheat cakes, and no matter what the penance what wouldn't they do for him who had done so much for them.

From what Penrod had learned through Johnny Green it would be necessary to navigate most of the swamp by boat as most of it where there are no openings to be noddle ground was only treacherous impassable bogs. They had several flat bottomed skiffs, that were used for that purpose usually by the boy in his fur hunting expeditions during the fall and winter expeditions and seasons. Of course as long as Johnny knew the ins and out of the swamp he was drafted to guide them. Penrod had hinted at this to the farmer who at first said that unfortunately things were so much behind at the farm that Johnny could not be spared to accompany them, but Penrod told the farmer that nothing could keep his sisters from this expedition, and for their personal safety, and the safety of the scouts if Johnny knew the swamp so well, the boy would have to come along, and as Penrod was prince, his word was law and the farmer had to yield to avoid his displeasure. Penrod had hoped at this too not because he feared his own ability to get a sound but Violet and her sisters told him they always seemed to have a habit of getting caught in quicksands every time they tried to cross a stream, and the reason Penrod was determined to avoid this, especially when these quicksands in this swamp were of such that only God alone could get you out. When Penrod had soaked in all possible information the board boy was capable of delivering, he believed he was in a fair way to master the situation. If he and his unknown captives were still hiding any where in the big swamp Penrod fancied they could be found. What was going to happen after that event came about of course he could not say just then. Led by Johnny now they made their way along for some distance until the place where the three flat bottomed skiffs (biffs) were kept tied up. It was here that Johnny made a sudden discovery that gave them all a little thrill.

"Well I guess" was the sudden exclamation that broke from "The boats," muttered Johnny Green.

"Well what's the matter with them?" Asked Joice perplexed. "They are here for us can easily see them."
"Well then how many kin you count, tell me princesses?" asked the other beseechingly, still giving an occasional dubet his eyes as though doubts clung to his mind regarding their faithfulness.
"Why let me see, I believe I glimpse three --- no there are only two skiffs of looting in that little bayou." Jennie Vivian told him looking at him queerly.

"But the re ought to be the re I tells yuh." Insisted the v bound boy "Wun two year -old, a mother-built last season and the last un just this spring. Yessir - there on em in all."

"They was every wun th a re yist' ' day," persisted Johnny.
 "A - re you su - re of that," Penrod asked him.
 "Well P rince my name s , Johnny G re e n a in't it?" demanded the other grimly
 "I s m working out my toime with M - Jensen hy a r a in't it. Then I still got

"Yes that is a good sound fact." Penrod assured him. "All eight you enemies they gut one, th at's boz." Penrod expected some such result as this, so after all he did not seem to be very much staggered.

"But of these Glandelinians had been working and moving around in the swamp for a couple of weeks or more, more or less, could he do without a boat all that time tell me," continued Pen-rod.

"I guess he cud Pen-rod, though w' an yuh want s tuh trap muskrats yuh need a boat. I guess he cud Pen-rod, though w' an yuh want s tuh trap muskrats yuh need a boat."

"All right Johnny, believe you are backing up the p... said Timothy Croveton who had not spoken all this time and it looks as if one of the Glandelinians changed his mind last night and took one of your boats."
"Y es an' by gosh, the newest one o' the lot too." g roaned the bound boy, as a fisher... went to where the other rakifis floated, secured to stakwould give a quick chance, and there for they couldn't afford to dare take a ny more chances. So as a boat would come in handy for them, they must have took it. " We would wish the best in the bunch come to that," added Argeline.
...

"I consider that sound reasoning Angelina deane" observed Penrod who was never happier than when he eluded found that any one of his deane sisters could always play good judgement upon any matter." but the boats gone and

"It can surely be done as early as a boy can turn a hand spring," vowed Violet as she and her sisters and some of the others immediately spread out fan shaped, like hounds that had lost the scent temporarily, and were

[illegible]

"Oh sometimes queer things do happen to us little angels as you call us" laughed Jennie, "They say the race ain't always to the swift. But take a look every body and see if I am right. I want to be su-re."

"As plain as the Heavenly beauty of your loving face Jennie," admitted Timothy Groveson with great admiration in his voice. "No personal remarks about my beautiful face please Tim," said Jennie giggling. "I know my face as a little too beautiful, but it answers my

"And I'm afraid we'll have to divide our force, choose our best and make a start." Timothy Donovan was saying (not baying).
"Dinger but I'm glad I could begin along," said Johnny Green.
"We are glad of it too," Johnny Penrod told him, being glad the boy could

"As there are eleven of us all told," the marked Violet said, "that means eight in each boat - eight in one and eight in another so it would be easy to divide up. Penrod doesn't go, you better ride it. This new skiff looks to me somewhat

"Shuck we don't use no oars in the ole swamp, in fact yuh can't," declared the other A. "A push pole poles the best way tuh git along. Yuh see it is the ole shuck boat, it's a catch at the end."

"Ard a mighty good idea too," avowed Violet, "I myself have had a good deal of trouble about it, being very shy, much pols poles, and even got hung

The prince glanced over his force. It was only fair that he arrange it so the weight would be as nearly as possible. As there would not be a sufficient number to fill the other risk off equally. Perched called to that number of scouts the command of the second boat. And too there was another good reason for doing this, since James had always shown himself clever on the water much more than any other boy he had ever known. Johnny was already showing that he was pulling the boys in by means of a rope attached to a beach ash

When the two boats had been brought to the shore, packs were distributed into the name according to the direction of the leaders. These were not hunted up ahead, but placed where they could be out of the way of the one take his place" Though even if we do lose our break our role we can always cut another one easily enough."

"Yep, I saw a go into the swamp without my hatchet," answered Johnny taking his place in the leading boat which was to be Andrews. "Yuh see it come in mighty hardy when yuh want to make a fire or cut you way through gum tangled swamps or brush. Then besides, I find a use for the same in setting traps, for muskrats ain't the only kind of fur we traps around these diglins." Some of the boys in the boat might have liked keeping up the conversation, especially when it bordered on such an interesting subject. Penrod however knew that time was valuable to them all just then, with such a difficult if not dangerous task ahead. They had to find two parties of men who were in hiding somewhere in this dangerous swamp, and as Joice Vivian remarked: "It was pretty much like looking for a needle in a haystack. The farmer himself not had come up and stood there on the bank, and waved his hat to the Royal child and the scouts as he watched them poling away. They could almost imagine they heard the tremendous sigh that came from his breast as he too saw a glorious chance for real fun as it seemed to him pass from his grasp and his bound boy to get it all. "Good bye and good luck tuh yuh all," he called out.

Following the serpentine passage of clear water the two boats soon passed from the sight of the farmer, though doubtless he could still hear gurgling sounds as the pushpoles were worked and the flat paws of the skiffs passed over the numerous water lily pads. And now the swamp was before them.

Violet and her sisters, and brothers and the scouts with them in the other boat surveyed the scene with lively anticipations. They could easily understand that the immediate future might throw all manner of strange adventures across their paths if not perilous ones, and like the boyscouts themselves Penrod and his chums were ever hungry for exciting things to happen, though secretly in their hearts Violet and her sisters felt a little apprehensive and uneasy for they did not like the looks of the swamp and it was dark and forbidding within, and no sun shining, and yet too it was close, steamy and hot. But then at first too the borders of the big "Forbidden Swamp" did not look so very forbidding. However both Penrod and Johnny sawed them not to expect that this condition of affairs would last long.

"You remember what Johnny in the leading boat told us," she remarked to his sisters and him in a tone so that all of them could hear his words. "It keeps getting worse and worse the further you go in and darker too. Things are always easy to begin with you know but after a while we'll surely have our hands full. Above all things we must keep our heads about us, for if we do that we'll escape getting lost. And most of all watch out for those confounded boggy spots. They say it would take a miracle to save you if you went in deep enough. The farmer told me once you are in up to your arms pit. God alone could save you, then to be roped to a house and run the house would not draw you out, the ropes would only break."

"Then Johnny did admit a person could get lost in this place? Did he?" inquired Jennie uneasily.

"He used to lose his way often when he first started coming in here a few months ago," confessed Penrod, "and then he began to have some system about his excursions so that by degrees he got it down all pat. That is why since he knows the swamp we engaged him as a guide. He knows the quicksands too."

"Yes Johnny said he believed he could pole a boat pretty much into the heart of the swamp with his eyes shut or bandaged," remarked Tim. "Too bad Argeline. Nice after all couldn't get off and be along with us." lamented Violet. "And Penrod dear, if we'd only had told her to come along!" "Huh to bad you can't see Violet dear, and put it up to Penrod," laughed Timothy G. Overton. "I wouldn't worry about that if I were you, chances are we won't get lost much, for Argeline Hesse is in the leading boat or I'm seeing things, and by the name taken even if we do get lost it will be some kind of sensation to wake us up. Only we got to look out for the quicksands."

Violet searched her head, but not knowing how much of this was intended to be a warning to her she did not reply but looked at him searchingly. As they were gradually working further into the dense growth by now there was enough around them to chain their attention and arouse their interest. In some places they could see that the shore stood above the sluggish water, although covered for the most part with many thick trees and dense shrubbery that would be difficult to pass through. Channels too began to be met with running to the right and left so that it behooved Penrod to remember to keep the leading boat always in sight and also to remember the perfect directions given by the man at the appearance if he wished to avoid getting lost in the start. Johnny in the other boat was indeed using his knowledge of wood craft to some purpose. When it happened that the two skiffs came alongside he called out to Penrod as if to settle some point he had in mind.

"Even if I had not listened carelessly when Johnny was laying down the law to us about the main channel in here, Penrod dear, I believe, would have no trouble sticking to the same up to now if I was leading the boat," said Argeline Vivian.

"Why though Princess?" asked Tim.

"It's just this way I continued the brave child briskly as though only too willing to show her hand. "You see Johnny has followed the same passage in here so often now he has actually gone and left a trail behind him."

"Say what are you giving us Argeline please?" demanded Tim. "On she a trail is silvery well but the water leaves none. Once it settled down after a bust boat has passed, I defy anybody to tell a thing about the same."

Argeline giggled as she she easily was amused at the dense ignorance of some of her best friends.

"You have got another trick coming Jim dear," she said smiling. "I suppose if you sat down and asked you poor brain a whole year you would be no nearer it all knowing what I mean so I will have to explain."

"Guess you will that," muttered Penrod himself. "If you know yourself what that you are getting at, which we all doubt I bent even your sisters for they are looking at you doubtfully too."

"Well look there," said Argeline pointing with her finger. "Do you notice that where we make this turn to the right the bushes along the path point in a kind of badly frayed, like something had rubbed against them a heap of times?"

"Why yes it is so," admitted Tim and Penrod together looking at the spot and he as if they were seeing things.

"Zill right then," continued Argeline. "If you two good little boys of mine had kept your eyes about you all the while you would have seen that same thing at nearly every turn."

"And you see that dark as it is in here?" gasped Tim.

"Yes indeed. Trying to cut short when he poled along, Johnny has left a track of his passages at every bend. I always look sharp, and I can tell an easy as falling off a log whether he went on, or cut into another passage. And I'll bet Penrod will back me out now on that explanation too."

Penrod laughed when he heard his sister make this remark, and drawing her tightly into his arms said:

"Every word that you are saying Argeline dear is the truth sure enough. I've been watching those ragged edges of bushes myself and said that to see what you would say to Tim's argument. Of course you see the time might come after a while when I'd get mixed on the directions given by Jon Johnny and then indeed I would want to have some other scheme so as to find my way."

"But after a bit Penrod dear we will get to a spot where Johnny changed his course from one day to another, as he went to different traps, then how are we going to regulate our hunt then?" asked Tim.

"We have got to search the best way we can for a missing skiff," Penrod exclaimed. "If only we can find it hauled up some where on the bank we will know they want another at that point don't you see?"

"Why how easy," declared Jennie Vivian, "evidently lost in admiring for the simplicity of the scheme, that could never have occurred to her before."

"Oh then if that is the case I reckon we had better not make quite so much racket as we go along, for if there are many landallians instead of a few they could form for us a fatal ambush in no time and wipe us all out in a hurry."

"I was just going to remark about that Tim," Penrod added. "If all of a sudden we found the boat, and had been talking aloud and laughing, the chances are that if there are only a few landallians they would easily give us the slip. If there are many of them they would lay in wait for us and commit a massacre. They cannot escape however as the swamp is surrounded by all our followers but they could do us tremendous harm if there are many more than we in the two boats. So after this whoever is doing the pushing and who is going to take turns pushing try not to splash more than you can help, and when you do talk let us do it in whispers."

Penrod all this mystery added to the pleasure of such little girls as Violet and her sisters, at least their pretty blue eyes were sparkling much more than they went as they watched Penrod continue to ply his pole with the air of an avastian controller along the shore and canal. Once however he must have summed it too hard in the peeling ooze, for when he tried to pull it out there was considerable resistance. Penrod managed to stop the moving skiff in time to save himself; even then he might have been pulled overboard and hurried into the quicksand at the bottom of the stream only that any of his watchful eyes might anticipate something of the sort, there was that same man around his legs, and held on grimly until the poles could be extended, extricated. At his elbow two of them had slipped by since entering the big and dangerous swamp, and they were yet far from the heart of it and believed they would never need to get into its very haunts. As for the Glandellians, had no intention of going that far. It was very hot in the swamp now and the air was very steamy and all around them lay a solemn silence broken only by the splash of a bullfrog leaping from a bank the gurgling of some water snake or the solemn croak of a bittern in fishing nearby, followed by the flap of its wings as it flew away, alarmed by their approach. All of the occupants of the two skiffs were more than unusually impressed by this strange silence and also the darkness. It seemed as if some heavy weight were pressing down upon them. Violet even whispered to Jennie that it could hardly be worse if they were passing through a big country cemetery at midnight.

At the same time all of them being bright awake or wide awake children there was plenty of interesting things continually cropping up to arouse their interest as scouts.

Five minutes or so someone someone was calling attention to this or that thing though never forgetting the need of caution. If at any time a voice was raised raised more than Penrod or any of the Glandellians, his sister deemed wise a single "hiss" from his or her lips caused the speaker to moderate his or her tones instantly. By now they were not so much much concerned about where they went as the possibility of finding the missing skiff. As eyes were ever on the alert. A number of times Argeline Vivian or it might be any one of her sisters, felt a sudden thrill as some object caught their attention some distance ahead which at first glance seemed to open up great possibilities. Then as they moved closer and a better chance came to investigate, deep disappointment and chagrin would follow (not swallow) for after all it only turned out to be the end of a log, or some such simple thing, and not the steers of the old skiff after all. James Andrews happened to be a little ahead of the other boat at the time Argeline Riches consulting her wrist watch, found it was just ten o'clock. When she showed this to Andrews the latter grinned as though very much pleased.

"I nominated ten didn't I Argeline?" he remarked in a low tone when you asked me to take a squint up at the sun through the trees and say what the hour might be."

"You certainly hit it in the bulls eye that time James," admitted the pretty little girl scout guide. "and I confess I thought I half an hour later I'm still some shy it seems indeed, on telling times by the sun and stars."

A low hiss from Penrod just then, as he wielded the pole caused the two to stop talking, and turn their attention to what was going on. They discovered first that the leading skiff (not count de bluff) was now heading for the main narrow channel. Then looking further with the boys and girls could see despite the semi-darkness that evidently some good sized party must have camped there, for to the practiced eye many things indicated as much. When the prow of the flat bottomed boat ran gently up on the shore at the low side of Penrod, Jennie Vivian who happened to be further up in the bow than any of the others jumped to the land and began to draw the skiff up. There was a bank several feet high just beyond, but Jennie waited until the others had disembarked before attempting to ascend this.

By now the other boat had also landed, reached shore, with its crew tumbling out, though avoiding any sign of confusion, for they were pretty well drilled in the elements of obedience to orders, as all true scouts should be. No sooner had the boys and girls gained the higher ground than they readily discovered that it had been the site of a big camp fire at some time in the not far distant past. A good number of things told them this, chief of which might be mentioned the good extensive sized pile of ashes that lay in plain sight. They could even see the sticks that the unknown party has used when cooking some sort of meat close to the red coals. All of the carefully gathered around, while Penrod gravely examined the ashes, while the others eagerly waited to hear his decision.

"Quite some time old," said the police at last having figured out the solution by means of certain rules well known to those who have made wood craft a study. "At least a couple of years had passed over since this fire was left. There are no foot prints that I can see. That also goes to show it was some time ago, but I think it can only be a person who camped here though why he should have made such a big camp fire I cannot understand."

He pointed as he spoke to where soft hemlock browse, had been gathered for the purpose of forming a sort of couch, and there being but a single bed upon Violet or any of her denizens could easily guess Penrod was a scout when he sat one party had made the temporary camp, though it seemed strange that he had made such a big fire unless he was a lover of fires, or it had been cold at the time.

"Then it must have been that unknown man," said Argeline Vivian, and once again Pen was not with him at the time...."

They moved around, as if looking for further signs, because scouts are always very keen to find tell tale marks that will add to the size of the edifice they are building up founded partly on conjecture and also on many "give away" facts. Argeline Vivian herself it was who suddenly emitted a low whistle, and the others closed up, well knowing that she must have made some sort of important discovery, even her waving one of her pretty hands to them—she held a small pistol with the other of course.

"See that?" she told them when they reached her side amidst the bushes adjacent to the open where the long cold fire ashes lay.

"Fences for a cookie," Exclaimed Andrews, "and a heap of the same too."

"How we know what he cooked on the ends of those sticks," observed Tim.

"Yes, and now we know where one of the Glandellians went to," added Violet.

"This is more than Johnny here can across," remarked Argeline Vivian. "Because he only guessed the Glandellian chicken thief or thieves were hiding in the swamp, for he has seen tracks. Hold on, he did say there were another two, at the place he picked up that filled half circle of steel but it must have been in a different place from this."

"Well it is only a little incident after all," said Penrod, "and does not tell us much that we didn't know before."

"Only that we are on the track of those lost chickens, you know," giggled the line. "but see here Penrod dearest if they made a fizzle of that would last night how do you suppose they are going to keep from starving to death in here, places are hard to catch in swamp water a like this." "No make something easy will you please sister dearest," he retorted the other. "Though if I was in their place I think I could easily manage to keep alive if not keep from going hungry at times. There are lots of ways for doing that if you only stop to think."

"Are indeed there are," spoke up Jennie, eager to show that she had learned her lesson very well with such rot cleaving to being an expert at at some things as was Penrod and Andrews. "Now with some cold and a bait I reckon rabbits could be trapped or snared though oh how I would hate to hunt those poor little denizens. Then gray squirrels are plenty there if only you found a nest of the same in a hollow tree. But I wouldn't attempt that unless I was facing real starvation for my heart goes out to those poor little creatures, creatures."

"And" added Argeline with a yearning vain in her sweet voice "How we not seen shopping big green back bullfrogs plenty. If there is one dish I am fond of more than any other I know of that's fished for from a legs. Yum, yum don't I wish we could spare the time to knock over a dozen or more of those bullfrogs. "It is up to you if you wish to delay such a duty as we started on to fulfill Argeline" advised Penrod.

"Duty first brother dearest before pleasure" she said. "We must get Her first at any sacrifice or even peril. He is more important than our stomachs."

"Then there are fish in these waters too, as fat as fish as big as any I ever set my eyes on," continued Jennie, "and when you are hungry they taste very good, though who don't hate the bones I'd like to know, and I can hear you chomping to death once on a Friday. We are than pick-a-l according to my mind and that's saying a lot. Oh I guess a smart fellow with matches to make fires, could manage to keep the hungry old wolf from his door here all right right."

"But all men not even brightest of Glandellian soldiers are not up to one tenth of the reason known to boy and girl scouts. Ventured Tim "Which is why they have to be so low staying off hungry by hiding the chicken waste of poor Christian farmers. Let it be enough for this time Penrod. Suppose we go around again and continue our exploration of forbidden swamp before noon."

"It is so enough of a big patch of mud and water and bushes and mystery," Admitted Hattie as they began to climb into the boat against again before. "Add a from what Johnny just now told me we have not seen anything of the place yet it is so large, and that good part of it sure is absolutely inaccessible. Penrod announced them; where at the time we were all sorts of Incidentally, looks to the right and left, as though the magnitude of their task might by this time be making a strong impression on the minds of the boy scouts, and Violet and her sister too. A charge was made in push-ups as they started off once more. Any one of the policemen volunteered to take a turn too though it had turned out to be no child's play handling that long heavy pole which had a "nice" faculty for clinging to the ooze below the surface of the water and necessitating more or less exertion in order to drag it loose each time it was used. Penrod did not want them to do it but he couldn't shake himself of their intention. Though Tim, and Andrew and Penrod had done it no others had taken their turn yet, and out of love and respect to those as the work had been it really looked as though the three boys would strain themselves first before they would ask any of the little girls to do it, and none of them were complaining at all even though they were puffing with the exertion.

"Perhaps Penrod dear and you too Tim," said Jennie it will prove to be a case of the "last straw on the camel's back, and then casting discretion to the winds you will feel compelled to thrust the push pole into the hands of me or any one of my sisters. I don't seem fair to you boys to do it all. You are only putting off the evil hour as long as you can until you tire yourselves so much that you won't be able to even handle it a minute. That better be we that we should not lend a helping hand."

"But it is the boys' place to do the pulling and not put work upon little girls, especially of your kind."

"Oh yeah. In God's eyes you are as equal as I am any time and just as good too."

Tim grinned and patted her gently on the cheek causing her to blush happily.

"Yes," he said and every body were as good as you little sisters and all us Abbotnians were there would be no such things as wars, we would wide myst miss and so on."

So moon came and found them well into the depths of the swamp and still seemed to have made no progress. They went ashore to eat their lunch, Landy Andy himself begging that they have a small fire and make a pot of coffee for those who wanted it.

"I can pick up plenty of dead dry wood Penrod you know" he went on to say in his wheedling way, "so that there isn't going to be hardly a whiff of smoke that anybody could see with a field glass. And say when you three boys are all tucked out with pushing a boat through the grass and lily pad paddles, makes you feel so fine as a blissing cup of coffee. So please say yes Prince dear."

At first for fear of discovery, and peril on his own sisters especially Penrod said no but Violet and her sisters beseeched him to let the land have some saying:

"Even though I or my sisters don't usually care for coffee, a little would do us all good at this time so let him do it Penrod dear."

"You little angel sisters of mine could stir tea from a black stone" he told his sisters laughingly, "when you plead like that and look so beseechingly I can't resist. I reckon we might have a small cooking fire and a pot of coffee. A big fire won't hurt either as long as it don't make no smoke. None of us would object to it, and sandwiches of any kind and dry eating, all by themselves when you are hungry. So go ahead boys, but no chopping, mind, break all the small stuff you gather over your knees."

"But a hatchet would come in"-----

"No chopping please" objected Violet. "Do as Penrod says. There must not be the slightest noise Landy. That is MY command too. You must reason and obey."

Violet, and her sisters eagerly assisted, though at their request Penrod and Andrew who knew more than they on such matters kept a watchful eye on what they gathered lest they mix in some green or other stuff that would make a black smoke when it burned. When Penrod and Andrew said "not that stuff" they threw it aside. Another scout (not put) managed to find a good stick with a crook that would hold the coffee pot over the blaze until it boiled. Indeed the scouts were not in the habit of putting up with such apologies for comfort as these; as a rule when they camped out they had tents, blankets, and a little spide-contaption that folded up in small compass and which served as a small wind-on stove stove being placed over the red coals, with cooking utensils resting on the bars. The coffee was thoroughly enjoyed by every one and a vote of thanks taken for Violet herself who had called it to be made. Feeling for a short time afterwards the boys and girls scouts felt refreshed and refreshed when once more the task was taken up. Violet and her sisters looked at Penrod and Tim tumbling last into the middle of the old skiff, and as Penrod then took hold of the pole again Violet was on the point of saying something in protest, then she shook her pretty head as he picked up the push pole.

"Not yet but soon it has got to be; only I hope he won't strain himself." Tim had Violet matter to himself, not did he need a further hint to know what was passing through Violet's mind, she or her sisters were not going to evade this share of the arduous labor for even they thought more of the boys than even of themselves very much. It doubtless took considerable thinking and planning on the part of Penrod to make sure they did not "repeal." So far none of the boys and girls could say as they moved along that they had ever before seen the stretch of water and scrubby shore covered with so many trees and vines as this one was. It also had dense thickets and many of the trees were of all kinds of grotesque shapes and very tall. Out side of the unusual sultry atmosphere that always there smelled perfumed and sweet sweet as if from many unseen flowers and good smelling plants. This spoke volumes for the snappiness of the young boy prince, though some how some of his boy chums did not seem to consider it such a wonderful feat for Penrod. That is the penalty for being successful; others expect great things from such a comrade so that he is put constantly to his best efforts to satisfy them. It must indeed have been quite some time, perhaps as much as two hours after they had stopped to eat their lunch when without warning the brave swamp explorers, met with a surprise that gave them a new thrill. At the time James Andrews happened to have passed a little in the lead, though he would soon be dropping back again especially when the there came a chance to make mistakes in direction, for he wanted Penrod to decide such puzzles, however the boy must have forgotten his warning from Penrod or Violet, and her sisters, for he cried out:

"Hey every body looked what we are up against again. A big big black lake of some kind that that is."

"Silence everybody" hissed Jennie who knew it would but just like James and perhaps some of the other fellows to burst into a shot as soon as they could get command of their voices. It was certainly a strange large black looking lake with weeds growing out of it here and there, a strange black lake to be sure but genuine enough and not such as can be seen in some swamps, and at the edge of the lake sat blue berries as a small bear and he was engaged on sitting on his haunches and gathering in the bushes with his sturdy forelegs. To them all it looked as though he might be making a good lunch from the luscious big blue berries that grew in such abundance here and there through the swamp. Up to the moment that James Andrews thus called attention quickly to the presence of the strange black lake, the bear must have been ignorant of their being so near at hand, then he did notice them he simply gave a disgusted grunt, and slowly ambled away through the brush though he stopped several times to look slowly back at them. Jennie declared the bear glared back at her twice as he went off and even stuck out his tongue just as if he knew there was no one about to shoot at him.

"Say let me tell you this old Sassy Swamp isn't such a bad place for a game preserve after all," said Tim. "I think some of us could enjoy having a week or two up here. But it is too far from the Christiana river for us to stay."

"Oh I don't know about that," remarked Landy meditatively, "we could be on a good fat set of houses and start in the middle of the night when there was a moon. That would give us a whole day up here. Take it at Thank Giving Day and we could make it there with Friday and Saturday thrown in. Princeton dear think it over won't you."

"Plenty of time for that" Catherine smilingly assured him "But now we have our hands full as it is without borrowing trouble with game."

"And perhaps before we are done with it," Tim cooed again "we would be that tired of seeing nothing but swamp all around, that we'd never come to a round again."

"Put what sort of a lake is that?" asked Angelina Nichols.

"Peak bog it's no lake," said James Andrews. "I'd know that thing in a dark night, for the blackest night ain't as black as that thing is. Keep away from it I tell you as it is a quag and only our dear blessed Lord knows how deep it is. It must be in a big water hole in the swamp and it seems more than four miles wide. Harg it that we had to come upon it, but it is good the stream does not go into it."

"I am going to make a proposition Penrod," said Landy. "I'd like you and your sisters will agree. Suppose we go ashore and tackle some of those elegant blue berries ourselves. It's a shame that bears should be the only ones to enjoy such a feast. And it's tough pulling so low and that exercise gave me a home-sore sound" after lunch.

At that Tim grinned and looking almost eagerly at the speaker nodded his head while he muttered:

"That settles it my boy! see you-finish. You want to be more fat than you are I see."

Penrod seemed to consider for a few seconds and looked at his sisters.

"I was re- born," she didn't jump f- a little while, just to get asy handy," he observed to the first of the "at" and every one in for a mass of good - pipe like he - 193- 1914 in while the supply lines, but I'm sure let the little in and my sister especially got the - one a first and also keep away from the edge of that black lake. If you are caught we'll have trouble saving any one of you and I know what that is. That is not that. not pent. James th at a black quicksand the kind Johnny told us about. Once caught only God can save you by a miracle."

The berries were larger and thicker than any they had ever seen before and James Andrews declared he considered the judgment of the little brown bear "prime".

"He sure knew a good thing when he found it and so do we," He told those who were working for fingers and jaws near him. When Penrod and also Violet and her sisters concluded that enough as an food as a feast, "He they once more embarked and the voyage was resumed. There was a new pusher in the old skiff however and that was a little Vivian girl. "He've Penrod dear suppose you charge seats with me," Jennie Vivian had gently and smilingly remarked, as Penrod started to work the push pole just as though he had a mortgage on it and looked as tired as a boy could be tired. "My sacrifice you tell so much just because we are girls."

"Penrod looked worried.

"That for Jennie said he ventured to say looking at his sister with distrust plainly marked on his own pretty features. "Why do you want to push the boat now? Not but that I'm willing to do anything I'm asked you know sister dear, but sure wouldn't it look nice even to a bunch of Glandelinian soldiers if they saw you one of my sisters doing the push poling when a boy should be doing it. I don't like to see you doing it and believe me the pole is some heavy too and if you had even the slightest slightest mishap we might take chances of getting wet and maybe losing our packs in the bargain, because you know we all are a awful clumsy about these things."

"Well in this case we'll have to take the risk," said Violet almost decidedly but pleadingly. "The only satisfaction is that if anybody gets wet we ou- ourselves a lot won't escape. We are all in the same boat you understand brother and we sink or swim together. Now Pen-rod dear please fo-ou-sakes give you sail a break."

"it but--"

"Now, period dan r please, please, please climb up here and even if I don't know how to handle a pusher. Time I or my sister, a hunk lau ned a few more of the tricks a true blue state of you s ought to know." pleaded ed Jannie.

Period really wanted to do his best. He did not want to have any girls do such work out of respect and love but there was no way of getting the best of his sisters when they were afraid he would overwork himself. The really knew how to work a push pole for she had watched how Period, Jim and Ned had used the heavy pushpole and thought she and her sisters could easily do it too.

"Now that is the way Jennie does," said Per-od, reluctantly, "you can do it all right if you only keep on the watch. But I'd rather do it than see any of my little sisters work their pretty little arms off."

"I won't work my pretty arse off" he yelled Jennie with a happy grin. "I guess I fooled all of you if you think I am my sister's slave. I pushed a skiff before. We are very good at pulling canoes too."

"You think you were fooling me were you?" demanded Parred with a grin.
"You will have to go some to fool me." Athas told him all about you and my other dear sister and he said I'd like to see the best you could not do yet. I'd be seeing you tonight Jamie if instead of letting you know how row your brains to tiredness I'd be keeping you tight in my arms all the rest of the afternoon. You sure little are smiling to say so.
The way you look this afternoon, more of a little angel than ever. See

The way you look him up and down, at Delany has been in Tim's arms all this time already and bless his little soul she's as happy as a girl to see the Jennie dear - and don't speak so loud when you drop the pole and in again."
 Jennie smiled at this and showed herself as he said so perfectly that

He suddenly turned his attention to other things of interest they happened to see around them as they continued their journey.

Crows were in the trees above as the two boats glided under a north wind. It was strange to say they suddenly became quiet as a violet and he was a [unclear] undergrowth with them. This circumstance might pass probably unnoticed by who one does know little of the [unclear] of wood-craft, but to an Indian it would be a sign that the sharp-eyed birds had discovered something strange and seemingly unusual in the little [unclear], or that the sudden silence of the birds showed that they had discovered some human beings hiding on the boat, probably an enemy, and as the little [unclear] understood good wooded off they were but the birds were not, and the a force of men then moved against the poles. As the Glandellave they were looking for did not appear to be located along their line, they needed not to fear that their presence in the swamp would be betrayed through the purchase of a penis as a down currier, or flying about in excitement. Some time later James and even uttered a low "hew" that earned Jennie just then in the act of putting the pole back into the water to hold it suspended in midair.

"I'm not, I may be mistaken at least I hope so," said James and drew "But something suspicious like moved over in the branches of that giant oak tree a yard or so and unless my eyes do deceive me which they seldom do it was a big cat. It was a grey-brown color."

"You mean a 'wild cat'?" whispered Jennie, for the two boats were close enough together for the occupants to have shaken hands had they wanted to.

"Just that," meant" he pouted James, firmly. "I can't say that I see him now; he must be somewhere where up in the 'thicket part of the big trees; but it must have been something more than a racoon - a coon because, actually she stole the blaze of its eyes."

"Then" gasped Jennie who though brave as she was could not help fearing for the bobcats and looking as though she wanted to drop the push pole on the spur of the moment, "let you run Jim dear why don't you. Don't let us be jumped on and clawed something awful. let you run Jim please do, they are awfully vicious you must know, especially when they've got kittens around so they say."

"The haven't lost any cat," remarked Jim composedly, "And besides I don't more than half believe the fairy story. And we got to show me before I own up. I reckon some of my people must have come from Southern Argentina State."

"As they like a heap of miles and Jacksons there I understand we marked Tim Jaxon with considerable success. But I'm glad to see that Perod has thought it worth while to lay hold of his rifle so as to be ready.
 Of course we don't want any trouble with any old Puma but there is such a thing as a real armed peace. If she jumps for us, I hope Perod will give her a load before she lands that is all she may pick the little girls as his objective. So go on and too we have got to pass pretty much under some part of that tree understanding."

some part of that tree and examining it. A citrus under Penrod's initial initiative Tim was also picked up by his guns and James also was did so too and started to keep a continuous watch. As James and I were both said they could not really continue on their way without passing under the wide stretching branches of the tree where he claimed to have seen something that looked like a big brown wild cat. "Oh t busy ones of you the boys and help Jerrie with you pole too and push unplug," said Tim. "Don't stand there John Tim - just like you was frozen stiff, we ain't going to let any cat grab the little girls make up your mind to it. Get a move on you too Lady Andy for Heaven's sake." "Yes, yes," mind to let a move on you too, I am sure. To the victors, all Jennie's heart was beating wisely considered was the expediency with which she could get past that ominous tree containing James' secret. Perhaps too, Jennie's heart was beating a regular tattoo as she found herself actually compelled to pass under the tree itself owing to the new ownership of the dandelion at just that part of the way. Perched arching out of the tail of his eye could see how pale his good little sister had become, and he was secretly scared to feel she would yield to her terror and do something without consulting her self that would cause disaster.

"Hold still! don't move anybody" suddenly called Jim when their skiff was directly under the tree, and he proceeded to elevate him again in a hurry as though sighting the quarry. Something did jump down on the tree all right, and something banged Jennie on the right shoulder causing her to drop the pole overboard and fall backward in the bot boat which came near swamping. Then before anybody could recover on the pan c surprise it jumped out of the boat and glided away into the thick. Despite the excitement James and rows remained enough presence of mind to rescue the floating pole before he had gone completely out of reach.

"What in the world was that," said Tim.

"It was a Puam Puma" said Violet still looking pale. "It looked at me as if it was going to spit, and then leaped out."

"You see I thought sure I did see something whisk out of sight up there," said Arnie; yes and it had glowing eyes in the bargain. The men now that is enough for me."

"The afternoon is nearly gone, and we have not seen anything of Hen Conditt yet." advised Tim later on still holding policy he had swept on the counter the afternoon of yesterday.

"In forty of time for this is a another try coming," said Penrod. "We are here to comb the stump through from end to end but what we will find no one knows. Keep listening, too. It might be possible that we will hear a shout that would give us clues."

"Say now I have not thought of that before," admitted Tim. "If Hen is being treated harsh like by the Gladdellians who have him then prisoners maybe he might let out a yelp once in a while. There is no harm done in listening I believe, and Jennie Vivian here can tell if it was him giving trouble." Now and then some sound did come to their ears but of an entirely different character from the one they were hoping always to catch. "A grand daddy bull dog on some money leg sent out loud and deep tones demands for 'more rum more rum more rum.' Then a saucy blue jay started in to scold the boys in the leading boat for daring to trespass in its preserves and how the angry bird did lay it on until they were well beyond reach of its clatter."

Once a far-away glow floated faintly to their ears at which there was at once an immediate comparing of opinions. Some believed it was distant thunder and that they were bound to be soon caught in a storm which had been creeping up unnoticed on them, the dense foliage by which they were surrounded preventing them from learning the fact much sooner.

"If you ask me what it was Pearl" said Jim when he found that the others were not able to agree for it sounded often now "I'd be inclined to say that it was thunder from some distant Christian or enemy cannons."

"Bully say, I not meaning to be funny either," he remarked. "I hardly Andy to a I'd a heap more to tell. It was a few distant guns than a thunder storm having this way. It's bad enough to be in constant danger of getting ducked by falling overboard without taking dances over head in the bargain..."

As they did not hear the petition of the suspicious sound, the scout finally determined that Tim had purloined a light, and that someone somewhere must be in action. The more they pushed on into what seemed the impenetrable recesses of that mountain, the greater became their wonder as to how they were going to find those they sought. Sure indeed the chances seemed very much against them, but then they had abundant faith in Pen Rods and Johnny Greene's accuracy, and they seemed to be determined on winning out.

Butless too the others reasoned to themselves Perrod had some clever plan laid out which he would spring when the proper time arrived and this confidence did much to relieve their minds as they pressed steadily on.

I asked Jennie was evidently bent on making Penrod and Jim pay for their previous hard time with the pole, for she kept at work thorough frequently she had to hold her pole under her arm while she mopped her dripping brow. Penrod heard her plying very loud, and Penrod and Jim

7. I tried to get her to relent and give him a chance to "spell" with him but she continued on heedless of his sighs and half heard groans to which she enjoyed teasing them to sit there at the window, one of the boys with Dugan lay in his embrace asleep, and she too looked and smirked as though she were joined in the vulgar game of one-upmanship that they were so readily an-ained on the pillars and one was known whether it was a really an any movement or harsher or what, but the nature was a good, lucky ducky, coming to pop. Jenni, Jennie and I don't mean maybe. At that time all of the account had been looking very good in the time line some of them turning to come back to daylight and some of them take a turn. Then trying to coax her to desert and let some of them take it to turn. Then all they knew was that without any warning Jennie was dragged out of the stern of the ship skillfully struggle to clasp her unwillingly, pretty little about the push pole that stood at an oblique angle caught firmly in the tenuous mud, and then releasing her hold because she simply could not hold on and slip with a great splash into the dark colored water of "Forbidden Jump."

"My God" said Penrod "And there 'n quick and at the hot + om."

Her sister was later killed out of the militia and announced as an announcement became order - conditions to rescue her was impossible, and she was really a ghost, but the splash which was simply terrific was easily noticed by Johnny Green, and even as she vanished completely beneath the surface, Johnny broke in:

"Your misheken p'rice badly mistaken, guickward is not at the bottom of water that deep to make such a splash, n and if it is she couldn't go down far enough into it to reach it's great stuck. and if she had she would still be where she saw the splash splash and a swim on time would have been prompt."

"The man I was lost part of of the push role," said Juan Andrus who told his boat to stop the moment one of the other skiffs began to try to tip to the left. His push role against one of the boats, until Tim did better when that for the moment pushed up a thumb that he knew was from a star and started to use a video of a video loudly so as to check the position of the first boat. Meanwhile of course to know that Johnny was right, Jodie came to the surface like a bottle cork that had been pulled down to the life of a man.

"They help her get into the boat," came from Pan-od. The other boat had by now picked up a lone Algonquian, and Pan-od and Tim had leaped over the side, seized the little girl by the arms. There was no room for look of terror in her face as a new light had appeared to her, only a look as if some sort of nonchalant joke had come to her with plenty to laud a helping hand. The little girl was accomplished and leaped aboard the skiff from which he had fallen. The two new-comers were also covered still sticking up where it had not caught though with difficulty as it were stuck fast, and then given in the charge of Pan-od, for of course, Pan-od would not under any conditions allow her to continue that audacious task of pushing after she had been rescued from that dirty muddy ally water.

"It's wonderful attack," said Panrod as he cleared the pole. "There's hard sticky clay on the bottom here. That'll hold anything, without expecting it."

Tennis you - little girl - on - on a night indeed, it looked as if she had taken a half water, and mud bath. Two h of her - into a wiped the slime off of her - nose and face and also hol - as good as they are could with clean linen which they brought with them.

"So had a remarkably close call" said Johnny when he had removed his shoes and stockings to get rid of the slime while her sister wiped her feet. "It was lucky the water was deep."

"I'm terribly sad you boys were on deck to help me though if it is only water, I could have swam easily ashore. But my clothes with all that mud was heavy enough to make rock swimming. When there was no quicksand below the surface, I went in so hard I finally reached bottom and hit my head on some stone lying in the clay. I believe I went and got too confident, and I made no little curve lanes, but holy smoke how that clay can grip. I just couldn't get the pole out, and that's a fact."

"You're telling me," said Anderson, "who had been the one to get the pole out but had to have six boys to help him. It was stuck so fast." "It took me and six boys to get it out where it was stuck. We will have to add our efforts to float past without polling ourselves one else will get stuck that way."

"Here, there's I won't forget that you did boys and neither will my sister and I won't. I hope I'll be able to do the same for every lasting one of you some day."

"You are too kind Jennie. I searched and sewed. I made of us a carrying for an experience like that. Not that I want to poke fun about it but I'll never forget what you looked like, dangling there on that push pole, and trying to explain your lack of a wound if so as to climb down - those were against you as you have nothing on them by which to grip. I want to make you not to know that you made me think of Jennie deau."

"Go on and tell me," (glad Jimmie) "I won't be mad."
The boy now had a slight tremble in her voice for she was by this time beginning to feel the effects of her immersion for she now had been dreading cold for some reason, and she had been so hot with her work of pushing the pole up she fell in, he had really desperately tried to prevent that but could not do so.

"Why you see, remember how we once with Parndon went for our hunting after; got you here to Parndon, hunting in a small tent with a three foot line at the end of a stout pole and a small hook baited with a piece of red flannel? Well when we had seen a whopper big green huck we would dangle that red stuff close to his nose. It was funny to see him squat down like a cat does on sighting a spurrier or a robin robin, and then jump up to grab the flannel. Finding, however, that our light he wanted that spurriered by the most kind, and never went on to any" but as soon as he feels the hook he changes his mind. "Then he starts to do the greatest acrobatic feats you ever saw, twisting his mind round over his head like he wanted to turn a somersault, or else climb up the line. Well when I saw you dangle there on that bushole, I thought of a fair green huck frog."

"Oh Yeh. I guess you would have tried to climb too if you had been in my place." She giggled, but drawing her coat a little closer around her and shivering.

"No, I would not have allowed Jenita" said Andrews nobly, "to go back there. And you, in the kind and you, alone - too, you could have stuck to the pole until we reached you, or those who were against you." Jenita and also her sister a shot a suspicious glance at the chosen and the chosen and then they were silent. - different from what the child seemed to be. But now took a handkerchief in the discussion.

He said that he had been told that the man who had been shot was a member of the Communist Party and that he had been shot because he was a member of the Communist Party. He said that he had been told that the man who had been shot was a member of the Communist Party and that he had been shot because he was a member of the Communist Party.

"So soon in the afternoon Penrod, what a up-decked Tim the having said since last evening the pushpole did not understand why they should call it a days work at not much had done two to clock.
"If you look at my poor little sister Jennie, you'll understand why," continued the boy. "Since she couldn't bear to see his state-suffer anything.
"Why she is shivering, sure enough," exclaimed Tim looking up at the girl.
"You Jennie dear, I'll be your feeling cold on such a warm day as this."
"I don't know whether I am cold or not," stammered Jennie, trying to put on a brave face though her lips were a turn blue and quivering. "It's something though because I was so hot before, felt in and that state-in so icy cold."

"Go, you and my sister you have got to do one of two things, Jennie dear," Penrod said with a naughty naughty because wise Penrod knew very well something was wrong with Jennie and he couldn't stand for it.
"What is that?" stammered Jennie.

"Either take the push pole again and warm you - blood up, or else go and and dry your clothes. Otherwise we will have you getting a chill and sick in the bargain and then the father in the fire will be destroyed as far as your health goes. I don't want you sick nor want to see you hunt. Which shall it be?"

Jennie was going to say "she would use the push pole again," but Violet put in her word and said "she would use the push pole again," she said. If it is all the same to us all, we'll go off to the shore and every one too," she turned. "Head for that little cove across, and you too Tim."
"I'd like to lend her something I've got in my pack," he remarked Andrew for he saw a look pity on the shivering one. "Only you can see with one eye it wouldn't come within a mile of seeing it and he wouldn't look at two you would with me by mistake though how I got hold of it in the first place I don't know."

"I've got a good sweater she could put on while her clothes are drying," volunteered Tim. "Of course I can't be a judge by a jugful but then you know sweaters are at a premium. He won't let it go around here. I laugh it is no maybe she could fit it in it. She is as much as a sister as if she was born to us and we must not let her come to her, confound that clay."

"That's a real good of you Tim dear," said Jennie. "You have always done lots more for me and my sister than we ever did for you."

"You only think so," said Jim.

The landing was soon made, and when the dripping little girl got ashore the first thing her own sister did was to get her to jump around, and then the rough waves came back and forth. This of course was to induce a circulation of blood, so as to resist the chill following her late immersion.

"Tim, I've got my dear little sister to you to make the fire," said Violet.
"Use dry wood so that there will be no little or no smoke, and build it in that low spot over to the right. If we choose to keep it going to night, there is only a small chance that any one will discover the light in that dip..."

Nothing pleased Tim better than to make a camp fire. Besides the genial glow which he so dearly loved, being a fire lover by nature it doubtless meant that before a great while they would be cooking supper and as he happened to be away from a such a task was never-forgotten to the lanky scout whose appetite never failed him. There were others to help pick up the light kind of wood, even again Violet and her sister (except Jennie) joined, for every scout has to learn such things early in his career of wood craft.

Soon a crackling little blaze of wood was up which being carefully fed presently amounted to a considerable fire.

"Here you are Jennie dear," said Penrod when he could feel the genial heat at a distance of some five or six feet away. "Get behind the bushes and the fire and sit up off. Throw your clothes to me and I'll hang them on these sticks we have planted around the fire. They'll soon begin to steam and then dry out."

Tim took hard himself working each article dry as possible which was done off by Jennie before he hung it judiciously before the fire. Fortunately the good little girl had made out to carry some extra pieces of padding of clothing in her pack, and having done there, with the help of Tim's expensive sweaters she was all right. She even enjoyed it so good naturedly, a little fan and poked at her as she sat. "You're a pretty thing," smiling good naturedly.

"The one and thing about this dry day is because though Tim and I have saying to James who chanced to be nearby. "And that in the way clothes are after they have been wet."

"But I hope my clothes won't be dried up so I cannot get into the name 'Jennie' other and but not really. "But I can tell you one which if you won't other and but not really. "But I can tell you one which if you won't

"Don't laugh then something is wrong. It is a story but it really happened for, saw it with my own eyes near my palace home before the war when I was younger. It was that a fat hen bachelor was living in a house near from our palace, who had himself washed a suit of his new under-wear himself and hung it on the clothes line to dry. It hung there for quite a while and I being so young there took a special interest in playing a joke on the poor old fellow without meaning any harm. The maid had come along and I had went over there to say goodbye how charitable I am to lend her a hand even though I am a princess and did not need to work. While I was doing so unseen by the maid said, took the Bach's of under-wear, and hung up a cold suit of my own under-wear, which, still had the stained shirt, since I was four years of age. Then going back home, watched laughingly out of the open window to see what would happen. Then the stout butler stepped out to get his suit and saw that baby outfit hanging in its place he rubbed his eyes and heard him say loudly to himself:

"Great laughing, I said, and the clerk swore they wouldn't sink a bit.
Feeling he would go and bowl out the clerk of the store where he bought his clothes, laughingly went out and confessed the joke played on him and he being a good natured fellow chased after me as I ran caught me in his arms and hugged and kissed me tight saying, was the most little delightful angel in the world."

Every body did laugh at what the Bachs had said for that story was a funny joke on him.

After a quarter of an hour however, he assured Jennie that her clothes were drying nicely and did not seem to be losing any of their former generous proportions. When he was late on take in hand. There was no lack of results when it came to doing the cooking, but Penrod found he had his own sister to choose from even Jennie expressing a willingness to serve as she had to have her share the blame more or less any way, and might as well be busy, and believe me when any of the little girls cook for you, you'll eat.

Afterwards the fire was allowed to go down, though Penrod did not feel that it was positively necessary for them to let it die out entirely. If it was bound to be true they doubtless the mischief had already been done, in and having to shoulder the blame, they might as well have the game. It was a great delight to them all to squabble the fire around the fire and talk in low tones. There were no boisterous language or action tolerated.
Penrod and even Violet, and he pointed to the stand that they were now on serious business and all such conduct must be left to another time unless they want to war with the enemy of their presence. Still they found plenty to talk about most of it connecting with the strange happening at Pamlico, in which their unfortunate comrade, Hon Hen conditior, had such a prominent part.

"I wonder now," James Andrews was saying at one time as he sat between two of the Vivian girls in a room around each, as they did the same, "whether the Chief of all the Christian gentlemen, Jack Evans got a clue like we did that would fetch him up in this region of the country with a swarm of soldiers meaning to try and round up these escaped Glandelinian boy scouts, and soldiers?"

"There was a variety of opinions among Violet and her sister as who knew Evans well but none of them having contrary views.

"It would be too bad then," said Tim, if they managed to haul them all up with Hen in their midst before we could get him in hand, and hear his story of what happened."

"That is a fact," said Jennie. "I and my sister know and love Jack Evans like a second father, but don't help those who did us wrong. As Hen is expected of doing a wrong, those who would capture him would take him back to the Christian camp and thence into the town just like he was a real criminal. No matter what excuse the boy might give, the soldiers would not listen in leaving that all for Evans and my father before whom he would be taken with the other prisoners. Of course if a real big sin was committed by the boy we are sorry, we cannot and will not help him out as we would do wrong ourselves then, but I and my sister believe he is innocent and was only double crossed by General Starling and his two escaped companions.
Papa, all of you, including my dear brother Penrod, we have just got to confound Hen first, that is all there is too. If he is guilty just help him, but if not we'll intercede for him."

That seemed to be the consensus of opinion among all the rest too. By degrees they began they had come to believe that Hen conditior must be a prisoner of the Glandelinian boy spies to have acted as he did, or something was done to him by one of the boys who then duplicated as he and stole the money and papers from Andrew's safe and lit out. Nothing else would explain the mystery though you believed Hen if he only caught must be under a spell for

He had always been reckoned a mild, inoffensive good fellow, one of the best boys in school. He had no idea of doing any thing so terribly wicked as to commit a crime, but a number of the headquarters of Violet, and her sister, 2:22

"That is just what it is," declared James Andrews, as they again talked it all over in hopes of getting a better conception of the truth. "The claudelins who have got him if he is a prisoner must be some of those terrible hypnotists you read about over in the United States though I did not see any such things here."

"A what?" asked Violet, for to tell the truth these little girls never heard of such things as were in Abilene.

"A Hypnotist, I saw one down at the city of Chicago two summers ago at a show in Live Oak Park and he made fellows do the most ridiculous things anybody ever heard of."

"Such as what?" asked Jennie Vivian, looking surprised but also as though she might be very skeptical.

"Why one boy thought he was a goat, and ran all around on his hands and feet, hunting for tin cans and old shoes to eat, another thought he was a dog, baying at the full moon, and I nearly took a fit listening to him whoop. Then there was a third fellow who believed he was made of iron, so he stretched himself from one chair to another, and there a man stood right in his middle, and he didn't break either way it was the grandest sight you ever saw."

"Fakes all - rank fakes" piped up little Daisy. "Yes, one of those boys was so dumb a confederate to the effect that impostor and my sister know what you mean by Hypnotists. You notice as Penrod told me in your room county they were come to small places where every body knows every body else, but show in big cities, where a new audience comes each night. If I had a chance maybe, and my sister would like to see a circus like that just to laugh, but you couldn't get us to believe in hypnotism worth a cent. Then too there are those so called fire eaters. The trick is while only the oil is burning if they really can do it, it is the devil that gives them the aid to do it without burning themselves or a trick about it which they don't want no one else to know for fear every body will soon practice that. Such things are so strictly forbidden in our country that as to those who come here and try it."

"Well then" demanded James Andrews, "What do you think this or those claudelins have got on Ben Condit?" that he has made him do whatever he wanted, tell us that if you can."

"I don't know," replied Daisy promptly. "We are not sure either if Ben Condit is really in the swamp or not."

"See" cried James Andrews exultantly she backs down right away."

"There is a lot of things I'll admit I don't know" added the little girl with a giggle, "but if he really is a prisoner then it is my opinion that poor Ben is being held to those men and boys by some kind of force and they could soon make him believe he did something terribly wrong and he only hope to skip out before the soldiers come would get him, but let's wait until we find him, and then we'll know it all. There is no use of even a most fiercely loving argument over something none of us know anything about. We'll get the help on us afterwards."

"A sensible conclusion" remarked Penrod who had listened to all the talk with considerable interest, "and as the hour is getting late suppose we begin to settle now on how we are going to sleep (peep, peep) through our first night in a forbidden swamp."

Up to the moment of them had apparently bothered about figuring how they would make themselves comfortable, so that Penrod's suggestion was like a bomb thrown into the camp.

"I should think we had better get busy indeed, if we want to have a good place to sleep on," Jennie Vivian exclaimed, "for even as good and hardy as the little girls were the hard ground did not appeal very much to Violet, her sister, accustomed as they were to feather beds, no matter where they slept, and yet here the ground was wet, spongy and soft in places and no fit to lie upon."

"We have no blanket or a blanket" said Annelise Riches here and that is why I laid out to keep the fire burning in a small way through the night."

"But luckily" and added James Andrews, "who had been looking around for a while since they came on. The men are plenty of fire and fuel and fire can close by. We can make our beds like turtles or as in the United States used to do, away back in Daniel Boone's time."

"Every fellow will have to a bit of fire if then," said Penrod, "so lots start in and lay a foundation for a soft and warm bed. Every one of you would like to sleep in a warm bed, wouldn't you?"

make you be a good command it."

"Hay was good enough for me last night though" declared Tim, "But I have got a hunch that I can sleep as sound as a log."

"Headlock for mine every time," announced James Andrews.

Then there was a bustling time as the entire number of boys and girls started to break off small branches and twigs from the adjacent trees or to pick them off from the ground, laying them in neat piles until they looked as if they had secured enough for their purpose. The beds were arranged something like a circle around the camp fire, and acting on the advice of Prince Penrod who in his younger days too had been on the cattle range range and knew what was right, each sleeper expected to keep his feet toward the fire. They took good care though not to put anything too close to the fire for if something should catch fire when they were asleep on my. "Looks a heap colder as if it was a big cart wheel," observed Tim.

"If so then the fire is the hub, and each one of us spoke, that's right too," Penrod agreed, and also Andrews acted as though they would never get enough of the fire, and browsed for violet and her sister's Jennie Tuome and Annelise Riches. Long after the others had stopped gathering it, they continued. Then even Violet and her sister joked them about being too gone to them when there was no price to pay, James Andrews had a ready answer.

"You and your sister and the other two girls are a whole lot more important in position than anybody else don't you know princesses," he told them, "and on that account you nine little girls ought to have a higher pile under you. Besides I always liked to gather things in."

"Well we nine fairies will remember than that boys" declared Joice Vivian, "the next time we need a big supply of fire wood. You have fixed it up good and tight and you'll find us the most obliging lot of 'fairies' east of the heavens."

"And you'll find us the most obliging of boys" the two put in. "There ain't enough good things done for you little girls anyway. You should be in heaven instead of on this cruel world."

"We will be there some day, and will take you along too" piped in Daisy. "You are just as good as us."

"Yes and no matter how good you are friends have been to you girls you were never spoiled" said Penrod with a smile. "You are good in every way."

"How about you giggled Violet. "When I had a slight toothache one night didn't you put me to sleep and hold me in your arms all night, staying up for my sake."

"Yes and yet often do the same thing I'll warrant" said Penrod.

After considerable work, and playful fussing and joking, they finally managed to get fixed in fine style. As none of them had slept so soundly on the previous preceding night owing to their strange environment, and the wild alarm that had sounded when Johnny's chicken thief trap had sprung, the boys and girls were both weary and drowsy. As they were in such a swamp and as it did not seem necessary to the referee for any one to be on guard duty, all being too sleepy, they all went to sleep. Penrod was readily the last to drop off, and he smiled with love and pleasure as he laid his head to glance around at the stretched out figures of his sisters, the two other pretty little girls and the old boy scout, besides counting Andrew and Jim. You couldn't hear their breathing and finally after he said a few extra prayers for before all going off to sleep he had led the night prayer, he also gave himself up to indulging in a refreshing slumber. He was awakened by a horrible crash that made him instantly sit up and he was horrified to see that all the beds they had worked so hard to make were starting fire and to be aflame. Other figures were tottering up all around and he was up quickly pulling the girls off the flaming boughs before the fast spreading flames reached them. They all saved themselves in the nick of time for each of them was a blaze that would do credit to as number as they were in the big camp fire. Penrod looked at the camp fire and saw that it was only a smolder.

What happened gasped Andy the first thing, for he was digging his fat knobby knuckle into his heavy eyes after having jumped from the burning boughs and no thought of trying to get out the last atom of consciousness from them.

"It was me" replied James Andrews, promptly, "did the suspicious action of firing my gun."

"They had by this time edged off from the heat of the black blazing beds."

"That at" demanded Penrod excitedly, thrilled and horrified in spite of himself at the danger now escape.

"A careless man," came the mocking answer. "He must have set the fire."

"You, what's all that James Andrews?" Tim exclaimed. "You must have been dreaming. You, what's all that James Andrews? The wind must have been blowing embers from a neighbor's fire, and did it in your sleep. The wind must have been blowing embers from a neighbor's fire, and did it in your sleep. The wind must have been blowing embers from a neighbor's fire, and did it in your sleep."

"It's a good thing, none of us especially the little girls happened to be in a hurry of going to bed that night."

"But that's and fishes I tell you," said Andy, and sitting up, "then I'll be the tallest of the boys' accouters."

Of course by this time all were standing busily watching the destruction of the beds and indeed excitement and anger had gripped hold of them for now they realized that James and Andy was really speaking most earnestly, and showing no symptom that his suspicious action had been no practical joke, and too the camp fire had and could not have started their bough beds ablaze.

"No, tell us all about it, James," he commanded.

"Well it's about this way," said the other obediently. "I smelled something like pine wood burning first, and there was a heat that woke me up, and just as I sat up I saw some of our beds all of a sudden aflame and something with a flaming torch move over in the bushes about twenty five feet away. Yes I heard the fire picked up just then so brilliantly that I could easily make out what looked to me like three men peering at me through the bushes one of them shaking out a torch—fact is, I know that is what it was and nothing else. I was scared at the sight and unable to move for an instant."

"Tell me what you did then," asked Penrod.

"I always keep my knife close handy when I sleep out in the woods you remember Penrod," continued the other, without pride in his voice, "so all I did was to grab up the gun and blaze away as quick as I could then saw the same to my shoulder I knew the shots would awaken you so you could save yourselves as the flames didn't just then spread that fast to prevent your getting off."

"Penrod caught his arm in a fast grip."

"I hope you did not miss at least one of those dirty devils only twenty feet away, James—didn't tell me you were silly enough to do that?" he asked somewhat hoarsely. "They'll escape and tell the others we were here."

The tall boy chuckled and Penrod's fears were instantly dissipated.

"I'm not a fool Penrod," he said lightly. "I am sure I hit two of them with the same discharge and the third I killed. If the others are not dead they are wounded."

"Good enough James," Penrod went on to say in a relieved tone. "I could not believe you would be so reckless as to let all of them get away."

"It was apparently Andy and a turn to appear skeptical now."

"Huh, I suppose they lit out then like a streak, after you wasted a good charge of shot after them, and knocked branches from the limbs of the trees—is that what you want us to believe James and Andy?"

"Didn't you hear the how those made who did escape rushing away?" demanded the other severely, "but then all of you started yelling at once as you leaped from your burning beds of branches, and I guess you didn't take much notice. I suppose you think the camp fire set our beds aflame."

"I heard some sort of noise off that way save enough," asserted Violet pointing.

"Correct Princess Princess, for that is where the fourth one was was kneeling, right over there in those thick bushes. You see I might not have noticed them at all only they happened to move just when the flames of the burning branches of our beds lit up the scene more brightly."

"Oh I admit that you may have seen something," persisted Andy, "but the chances are ten to one it was a white faced heifer that had hit on our camp, and was looking to see who and what we were. They come too when there is a good sized fire burning in one spot, for I know by experience I made a good fire near a cattle farm once at night it was a dark night too, and I tell you, to my amazement found myself surrounded by a lot of cows looking down at the fire. I managed to scatter them. We happen to know there is a good sized stock farm not a great way off, and I reckon their cows get into the swamp once in a while. Am I not right Princesses?"

"But maybe Andy is right," said Violet with a little shiver. "Surely our branchy beds did not catch fire from the blaze in our middle, the beds were too far off and there is not a bit of wind."

Let James prove it though to settle the argument.

"All right," sneered Andy. "I'm going to show you Andy where you are way off your line. When I've got eyes and pretty good eyes too and know how to handle a white faced heifer with my smoke that is all."

With that the indignant boy handed his gun to Tim, and stepping over to the fire picked up a half burned branch from which a little flame just shot up and this he whistled loudly around his head several times until he had it crackling and taking fire afresh, so that it promised to make a very good torch, if used for only a brief time.

Penrod made no objections to the programme. Indeed he was deeply interested in the outcome but that was it might prove to be. After having made sure of sufficient light, James and Andy boldly strode directly toward the spot he had indicated as the hiding spot of those whom the said had almost caused the dreadful non-tragedy.

"O slow please, please, please James," warned little Daisy. "If only one is only wounded he might be laying for you then. Keep him covered with the gun won't you?"

"Oh Daisy please give us a rest won't you didn't I tell you I shot three of the and the fourth was after the shots gave him a scare? Who is afraid I got a good trusty knife in the other hand?"

With that James and Andy reached the bushes indicated, and the others were close on his heels every boy and girl eager to find out whether what he had told them was in fact true, or if the apparitions had only been a figment of James' imagination, the suspicious ailment as it were of a stirring dream. Every body gasped. There a man lay there, men in gray uniforms too. Two of them were easily dead, they having been kneeling for other in such a way that the same big bullet went through their heads at the same time. The other man was too badly wounded to even move. They paid no attention but went ahead a little ways to see about the fourth man.

"Here's where he pushed back the brush as you can see for you fellows. And there lies the three others. Yes and there is plenty of foot prints besides. Look where the fourth man knelt down, because here's the mark of his knees as plain as anything." Now what do you say Andy? Is the law on me after all?"

Lundy had to confess that it did not look that way.

"Oh I'm ready to own up you did see four men snooping around our camp James and Andy," he confessed frankly, "and when you let fly with your Winchester and killed his three companions or at least two and wounded one badly he lit out like all possessed. Penrod of course the chance of it on a the Glandelinians some of those who had kind kidnapped. Don't you think?"

"We know of no other in this," he given looking ruefully toward the burned up beds which were now glowing smoking embers. "They must have discovered our camp fire and had crept up and set fire to our beds before Andy saw them, and also no doubt meaning to kill us and steal our food supply. We happen to know they are short of grub and now that the country is being closed against them these Glandelinians are beginning to be more or less afraid to venture out of the swamp to secure another lot of fowls, or anything else along the entire line. Ha, and they thought they were burning when I was around they had set fire to the bog which my slavers were sleeping on first. First a man attempts to set fire to the hay in the barn on which we slept and was captured in the act, and now this."

"But it looks as if these Glandelinians came alone," Penrod Penrod, feeling he could only a set of men foot prints," he marked James.

"Oh Harvey I certainly hope now they have not done anything terrible to our chum, Hen Corbit," quavered Catharine in a panic.

"There is no reason why we should believe such a thing," announced Penrod, decidedly. "We already agreed that they may possess some sort of strange power over poor Hen and I suppose the boy is being held a prisoner by the rent, while they are waiting for the four men to come back with provisions."

They walked back slowly and the fire was revived, for since no one felt like trying to sleep again after the destruction of their beds they concluded to sit up a while and talk it all over. This attempted dutifully done on the part of the four men had apparently put a new face on the whole matter. It might change their plans to considerably too, some of the scouts feared.

"I don't see why that should be," Penrod explained. "Of course after this we will have to keep a watch a very right, so as to catch them if they try to do anything to us or get away with any of our stuff. It may hurry things along in the end for the whole swamp is thickly surrounded by the well armed scouts and they could not get through the co-don. If they have little to eat and the Glandelinians are finding it impossible to go out aside the swamp, knowing the boy and girls are waiting to arrest them they may finally make up their minds to surrender to us."

"Then you believe they know why we are here do you Penrod?" demanded Tim.

"It seems possible, although of course we have to jump at conclusions because we really don't know," came the answer. "But why the two first of us try to get the hay in the barn on fire while we were all asleep, and now this new fire of course?"

"I knew, but this is a little dark mystery," confessed Tim. "And I have a much better account of the guessing to the answer than I did on the night these Glandelinians, how did Starling and his two companions make them get away, what are they holding over Hen Comditio's head; why should our chief do that awful thing if he really did, and then so leave such a silly letter behind to convict himself, and why the two attempts to burn us as we sleep? I'm all in a swirl and if anybody can straighten me out, I'd be a heap obliged."

Apparently, nobody could, at least there was no effort made in that direction, that made Penrod mad was that the bough beds of his sisters were the first affair and only it was a miracle he had saved them at all and several of them had not received a single blow of flight burn, and some burn but not holes in their clothing. Some of Jennie's beautiful golden brown hair had been partly scorched. In fact to tell the truth all the boys and girls felt that they were agrouping in the gloom, and even the most guesses had only a slender foundation. Violet and her sisters even believed that F. A. Wick rowden was Hen Comditio in disguise.

"We have enlisted in the war though," said Landy Andy grimly, "and we won't be kept back by anything. Try to set us all afire and even burn up our good beds in the bargain. Of all things try to burn up such good little angels as Violet, and her sisters and our two others. That makes me feel so mad I could bite my self like a mad dog. If any more of those Glandelinians come snooping around they stand a mighty good chance of getting the same dose, that is all I'm going to say about it."

"And we'll run across Hen, sooner or later, you can put that in your pipe and smoke it," asserted James Andrews firmly.

When they had discussed the subject from every side without picking up much additional information worth while, the boys themselves began to feel sleepy again. So Penrod told them off in watches, two scouts being assigned to duty at a time. Landy was left out to the last for they wanted him to be the longest on the watch. Though Penrod hardly believed there would be any other watchmen from Glandelinians that night it seemed the right thing. Little girls were said to go back to sleep once more. They were greatly upset by the attempt to burn them that way, and knowing the nature of Glandelinians feared some other dirty and wicked trick might be attempted.

Strange to say no one had paid any attention to the wounded fox except tying him to a tree and roughly digging out the bullet and binding up the wound as unceremoniously as if he was nothing at all despite his howls of pain. However, Penrod was too good a boy scout to take unnecessary chances and not wishing some other disaster to come or to lose the main part of such supplies as they had fetched along for several days, Penrod took all due precautions. No one dared to make any more beds of the same stuff, but had to take the chances of lying on ground as dry as possible to be found, and the camp fire was kept up good and proper the balance of the night in the bargain for they felt as though the illumination helped to guard them. Complete darkness might have tempted the other Glandelinians to try again while they would be afraid to attempt such a risky move while the flames crackled and lighted up the immediate surroundings.

Finally all of Violet and her sisters except Jennie were able to fall asleep again, but Jennie remained close to Penrod shivering with the fear of what might have been, not that they really were scared of lying, but who in the world wants to be burned. Penrod knew how to soothe her and after he had half her in his arms for about fifteen minutes he had her as deeply asleep as he had wanted her, and then slept with her in his arms all the rest of the night. After all nothing happened to disturb them. The sentries stuck diligently to their duties and changed at the time appointed. This had been laid out by Penrod as the sky had cleared, and the stars could be seen in places. He figured time from the position of certain bright planets, and their setting would mean the different changes in the round mount. Boy and girl scouts who have been in camp have learned these methods of telling time by the use of the heavy watch, and few of them after a once mastering the interesting method find a need for rings or bells.

When the light shifted in through the tree tops overhead, Penrod was the first to awake and found he still held Jennie in his arms and she was still sound asleep. He looked around at his own sleeping comrades and then setting Jennie down very gently he slowly awoke to his feet.

Then he first glanced at his sleeping sister, a lying cloth close together on a large stretch of dried grass the boys had pulled up for them to lie on, and then he glanced at the still smoking embers of branches that once just a number of hours before had been beds for his sisters and the rest.

Looking down at his sisters lying there he had a sneering grin as he said, "So they have come to this eh. Tried to burn them in the hay in the barn, and then here. Ha. Ha. Well that is something. He turned and looked at the prisoners who were asleep, and then again he glanced down at his sisters and there was a scowl on his face.

"Don't let the Glandelinians," he said to himself. "I'm more than tired of them. I'll have to find a way to stop this and, shall it be more than tired of them. That attempt to burning was not meant mainly for us boys and confound it I know it. It was not meant for us at all. It was meant for them, and THEM only. Ha, ha, well I'll have to look into this" he added with what you may call a wicked grin. My sisters. Heaven knows I never thought I would ever have sisters, and yet sisters like these. And yet what did they have to go through, before even I knew them and now, --ha--ha. Well I'll make it short work."

He went over to where the prisoners were.

"How can that devil sleep and with his wound in the shoulder no conscious in him to bother him. Sleeps on like it was no sin to try and burn little girls and boys out camping. Wake up you 'SHAKE' and Penrod thought it seemed queer to do so, it was righteous any how for he kicked the man in the side.

"Wake up you snake." and he kicked him again.

The man was awakened and being tied there looked on the boy in fright. To be in the power of boy scouts was worse than in the power of the old devil.

Penrod looked down at him with a sneer. "You snake in the grass" he hissed. "you and your two dead comrades set our beds afire last night. You intended it only for the girls. I know it."

"It--it--it's fair in war," gasped the prisoner.

"Yeah, go is this," and Penrod kicked him in the shin. "I ought to tie you up tighter and make a slow fire around you. Make you eat the fire you try to burn children to death with."

"If you are a Christian dog you wouldn't do such --such --cruel things," complained the prisoner.

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Penrod. "So Christian dogs wouldn't do cruel things. The one kind of things are, not cruel when justice demands it. And I'm not a Christian dog. I'm an American even though my parents are the rulers of Abbeism. And the princesses are my sisters. You know Americans are very very mean."

The prisoner looked aghast for when you arouse us Americans you sure find out something. Americans as America proper are not to be trifled with. We Americans we have justification demands it are then very mean indeed to enemies who do cruel things, and what would any American do who would see a couple of skunks try and burn little children to death in bed while they sleep, and especially such good little girls like Violet and her sisters and the two others and such good boys."

"You, you, being a prince, am not an American."

"I am one since I was brought up there," hissed Penrod. "I have learned American ways, what they would do to you over there for this attempt would be plenty. I guess I'll have you burned."

"Mercy please have mercy mercy."

Penrod only laughed. He was really cruel when driven to the point when when he knew often what plight his good sisters had been in. That and his sorrows for them made him cruel and heartless.

"Mercy, ha, ha what a funny word. Mercy. I never thought you Glandelinians knew the meaning of the word. MERCY, he, he, he. "and he kicked the culprit in the side. He went over to the camp fire and picked up a large smouldering brand.

"What---what are you going to do?" gasped the prisoners squinting hard by the fire.

"I like-- to like to play with fire," said Penrod. "Hold still. I want to hear you yell."

"No, no," screamed the prisoners loudly please don't please."

At that noise the boys first gave sounds of rising.

"Do you know anything about Hen Comditio?" demanded Penrod. "Tell me or I'll stick this torch in your face."

"He--he--is our prisoner."

"Where is he at?"

"I--I--don't know."

"All right I'll burn you."

"No, no, I tell you please don't. Put I'm telling you the truth. I do not know. When I left they blindfolded me so I couldn't be able to tell location in case I got caught."

"Is--is he guilty of what he is accused accused of?"

"Accused--a accused of what?"

"Of stealing that money?"

"I tell you truthfully I don't know."

"You are a liar."

"So, I hate you the death," said the man loudly in his denunciation, for the looks of Penrod frightened him. All the boys were awake now. Lundy, Andy standing besides Penrod. Even he had been quite heartbroken over the affair of the night, and especially at the looks of Penrod and his associates and the two girls over their escape from such a dreadful fate. Lundy, as usually most fat boys are, was very good natured and almost always had a gleam of good humor in his eyes but he did not feel good humored now. Since the experiences with the princesses and Lundy had Penrod had begun to fear that Lundy had lately shown signs of developing a new trait in his disposition.

"Aw don't play with the mouse Penrod," sneered Lundy. "Let's hurt him. He tried to burn the little girls and us last night. I believe he intended it only for them."

"Oh, please have mercy, please have mercy."

"We don't show mercy to Glandelinians as they don't know the meaning of the word when they have children in their clutches," said Lundy. "We accounts give no quarter but we'll consider on one condition and that will be told later. Come away from him in Prince Kash you hands of the snake." Penrod obeyed, though he gave the prisoners the darkest or blackest looks. His sisters were still asleep and he hated to awaken them but that he must and did. It was while they were eating breakfast that Penrod expounded a new scheme, and after placing it before his comrades asked them what their opinions were.

"The question now is," was what he said looking with a snarl toward the covering prisoners, "whether we keep our skiff along the water ways with a cowardly prisoner in our midst, or handcuffing him and shouldering our packs, take the shore from now on, and make him accompany us in our midst under heavy guard, and as our rule always has been majority votes carry the day."

"But that old skiff suits me all right if we have to take that old treasure house snake along with us," objected Lundy with a dirty look toward the prisoner, who did not particularly fancy to tramp through marshy land such as must be their portion when a prisoner who with his two companions tried to burn the little girls, and the boys the night before. All looked very crossly at the prisoner while Lundy and her sisters stood with their backs toward him.

"Why ought we to make a disagree with that prisoner with us Penrod?" asked Tim looking with disgust at the Glandelinian, and a loathing in his eyes, also unable to grasp the meaning of this new move with him. "Better either shoot him dead there, or leave him tied up the way to starve. We don't want that no more mere nothing with us."

"Oh please don't do that," pleaded the prisoner, but no one answered him. It's no fun to be in the hands of a merciless band of boy scouts. Instead of answering they only gave him the meanest and ugliest pugnacious looks.

Then James Andrews who was quick to see things especially when some suggest ion on the part of Penrod was conceived said:

"Why what ails you fellows? Don't you understand my sighting that escaped man, the shooting of three others last night and the fire of our beds" and he looked angrily at the prisoner "might alter the whole business. Now there is no need of looking for a needle in a haystack, for we have got a real trail to follow up, and if we lose the trail we'll make the prisoners lead the way, and if he won't we know where there is quicksand, impossible for any one to rescue you from and we'll just throw him in and--"

The man cowered before James stare and winced.

"That's right James, and we scouts are ought to be able to accomplish the task." Tim remarked in his superior way, which showed every body knew was skin deep, for he was a splendid fellow at heart and well liked.

"But I'd rather leave him behind where he is and let his comrades find him or starve or one or the other."

"What about the skiffs then if we abandon the same?" asked Lundy.

"Oh we'll make the place, and Johnny can easily find his property, when we are paying him fifty dollars or more for the same," said Tim lightly, and boys better make a start with their packs right now, and we'll rope the prisoner round the neck and have him tied to some of us and the rest keep him covered."

Lundy sighed heavily, and seeing there was no escape of having the prisoner come along he started to carry out the suggestion of the trail scout James Andrews. His lack of ambition was so noticeable that James Andrews could not resist the temptation to say:

"I see Lundy is brooding because we are going to take our 'gentleman' prisoner along. I am just thinking the other fellows that Lundy is going to play out on us for the prisoner is going to give us no end of trouble, so we might lay the snare tied hand and foot in the skiff and send him silent in the skiff and let him be picked up by Father James. I'll let him stay there, he can't go and I'll let him come and rescue him."

"What me stay here and let him go to death," ejaculated the prisoner. "Have mercy."

"One paid no attention to him."

"I know what we can do," James Andrews went on maliciously. "We could have Lundy hold the rope and pull the prisoner along with him. He's not only fat but good and strong, and too heavy for the prisoner to escape from."

"What me have that dirty skunk near me," ejaculated Lundy, commencing to put considerable vigor into his labor. "I guess not if I know myself and I think I do."

"Oh for that matter you could do what you please with him," continued the generous James, "though for one good mile any way."

"No thank you if you please not any in mine unless Penrod commands me to and then if I have to--well the prisoner will be sorry he had me that's all. I hate the sight of him, I'm going where the rest do make up your mind to that. If none of you don't like to do it either why push it on me. The rest's plenty of pick and I'll this swamp and you can put it into use. I'll if you're too soft to do that I'll let him tied up and if you're afraid he'll escape stay yourself with him James and Andrews that's all. You could go so I don't care to have him with me if you tried and I'll do you so you'd like company but not human snakes and if I have to I can put up with you as a steady James Andrews. Now that'll do for you. I don't want to be considered for a second. Of course if Penrod or the princesses command me to then I'll do so but I'll be too bad for the prisoner and feel like kicking his teeth out right now."

Of course James Andrews was only noting a little fun with the fat boy because there was no thought of making him pull the prisoner along and least of all would Penrod or his sisters have dreamed of appointing the fat scout for such a duty.

On deciding on such a radical radical change in their plans Penrod did not forget that it might be better for them to cover the two bonds. He thought of the Glandelinians chances to come upon the skiffs, they might think it was policy to remain in the plank to such an extent that they could be used for a while, and possibly the scouts and the little girls would be glad to get out of the dangerous swamp by the same means they had taken when entering it.

"First of all lets hide the boats some where," he suggested. "They're a pretty heavy lot of boats but never of us ought to be able to carry them one at a time."

"They need not be taken very far either," James Andrews answered them. "here is a handy place close by. Every body on the job and see what you can lift. I'll lead a hand."

After all (here a haul) it was nothing to speak of, for the two skiffs were easily hauled, and nicely covered for concealment. Then the boys had moved all traces of their passage any one might walk by within a few feet of the patch of bushes and never suspect that in there so neatly hidden.

"The job is done," said Penrod. "Now I finish packing and we will be off."

Lundy himself heaved a sigh, for he had lightning fear of lingering fear that no Glandelinians might come up and rescue the wicked comrade. The prisoners too had a lingering fear that there might be more in that case. The boat was by James Andrews and as they appeared on the surface the noise he could not help being left alone in that dreary swamp tied to a tree made him very nervous. He also kept a wary eye on the tall scout and had he commanded all the leaves and leaves him remain to the trees he would have been a good deal better. He felt that could have been heard all over the swamp. Of course it was Penrod's intention to examine the skiffs left by the mysterious Glandelinians who had wanted to escape and see whether it would be possible for them to pick up the trail. He was of course taking it for granted that the party was to the same man they had been hunting ever since they reached the swamp, and obviously too he must be the last man among the Glandelinians, so far as Penrod could see, and that into consideration he had seen with that of the skiff. Although there was really nothing remarkable about then to distinguish the indentifications and indentations about all the prisoners. He knew that they took certain chances in figuring that out. After all this man may be one of the leaders of the five spies, maybe he was that Matt Fellow. Well no matter which of these two solutions to the mystery proved to be the correct one Penrod meant to stand close upon the party should he will not be before him. He still favored in the original plan and in fact were both led by the other. Speculation to his comrades, that that fellow was a dummy, was false, and almost impossible to be captured, even when taking him by surprise. All of them being ready they set out, with the prisoners roped between them and guarded by well-armed boys. Penrod, and his sister and also James Andress led the van for they were recognized as the best equipped scouts in the Vindicator Patrol when it came to a question of trailing. There was nothing in experience that Violet, and her sister did not lack, and they were good also in their position as well as their constant practice in these lines. It soon became evident to them that the fugitive had not thought it worth while to try and hide his trail at the time he fled from the camp. At the death of his two comrades and the wounding of one, too, these sudden shots and the result also must have given him a nervous shock so that all he could about just then was to put as much distance between himself and those boys and glimmers as possible and get feeling the first scheme failed.

The fact that they all carried weapons and would not hesitate to use them if a name must have convinced him and by the proof of the death of two of the men that it was a risky thing to have around that region any longer. Half an hour after the boys moved on, the prisoners complaining of the pain of his wound because of so much walking. Some times it was at a fast walk, and then when again the trail grew fainter so that those at the head of the column were compelled to exercise all of their knowledge in order to make sure of the things mentioned more or less to the relief of the suffering prisoners, to those complaints and moans they paid no attention, believing probably he was putting on much of it.

The boys had been warned not to make any unnecessary noise, not to allow that the prisoners to do the same, and if he did not obey, why they had permission to do with him what they choose. Talking save in the lowest of whispers was strictly tabooed, and even at that Penrod did not encourage any conversation with even his good little sisters. They also had to take care of their feet (not down the street) and not put any weight upon some stick that would break with a loud snap, even such small things have spoiled the little glory before now, and the backs of wild beasts of human fugitives cannot be too careful. If fat lady puffed a little the other made no objection, since he took care to do it half under his breath. It was not such easy work, lugging a wounded prisoner along, though an account of them enjoyed every minute of the time, being constantly thrilled with the expectation of suddenly coming upon a camp where those they sought might be found, and taken by surprise. James Andress often thought the prisoners with his gun, warning him bravely that it would be as much as his skin was worth if he did not keep still and stop shouting and growling.

It was in this humor that they came to a long that lay directly across their path. Here the trail ended, but of a course such clever boys and girls as Penrod, and Violet, and her sister and James Andress and the others would understand a little trick like that.

The stumbling fugitive had not really taken to the log, panned as it along to the other end, and then jumped off....

"You my dear sister take that side, and I and my two boy leaders will cover this one," said Penrod in a low voice, and without the least hesitation, "Ten to one we'll get him again."

They did for Jennie Vindicator herself, quickly found the tracks once more. This incident however told them that the fugitive had begun to fence would be followed when no more came, since this was his first effort to battle a baffling pursuit....

"I'm so sorry that happened," said Penrod softly to Violet. "Because it is going to make out track all the harder you see."

"Do you mean he has begun to fence he will be followed?" asked Violet.

"That is just it," said Violet and Penrod. "If that idea gets a firm hold of him he is bound to do away with it by fence out how so on to law in the bush. In the end he might even try to quit the camp, and take his chance of abandoning his attempt to reach his comrades and boys of getting away from us to lead us not away."

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

"I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face. "I'll be don't quit at that point," said Andy with a grinning face.

line if it takes all summer with glad to have you say that Penrod. But he is a very smart fellow, and he is a very smart fellow, and he is a very smart fellow.

This time the fleeing man had reached a new point, for his tracks could be plainly seen, but the trail abruptly ended....

"It's an easy guess" said Violet he said after a brief examination. "You can see that he stood up on the ends of his toes here, for the indentation is very deep and then besides look at this large piece of bark lying fresh on the ground, with a few small pieces mixed, but surely soaped from the trees above us."

"That's thing Violet" declared Jennie herself, while the others stood and watched the actions of their comrades with the utmost curiosity. "The fugitive just grabbed hold of that lowermost limb, gave his feet a fling against the trunk of the tree, and hoisted himself up yonder."

"Then perhaps he is some where up there still," suggested Andy.

"I don't think so," continued Violet, "but we'll sent up an expedition to find out after we make sure that all avenues of escape are closed. My own opinion is that he passed out along some other low hanging limb, and dropped to the ground again, perhaps thirty feet away from here."

"It's look and see," said Jennie eagerly.

"He came full," said Andy, "but unless you step mighty fine you may cover up the prints of his shoes where he dropped down."

Penrod himself had already decided just about where he would have descended from the tree, his sister simultaneously having the same opinion. Her opinion seemed to have settled on the same spot for she was just at the heels of the others. Instead of looking down, they kept glancing up. It might be they were mentally following the startling figure along that great limb....

Presently Violet who was in the lead abruptly stopped....

"I can see signs that tell me he came this far, but they end up there," she told her companions.

"Yes, and here you see fresh leaves on the ground," said Angeline. "Look sharp Argillitide, Jennie dear, and it may be a beautiful eyes will fall on the fresh trail."

"Yes and you may pick them up," she told Angeline with a giggle as she examined the ground and then from Jennie's low but eager cry told that success had been accomplished. She pointed to the mark of feet close behind beside them, but at large to say thinking of throwing them off the trail the fugitive had moved his shoes.

"He has moved his shoes," said Jennie.

Undoubtedly the fugitive had dropped on a moss to the ground and then he moved his shoes.

"Say let me tell you he's a slick article, that chap," said James Andress, after they had once more made a fresh start. "I wouldn't be surprised to learn he's been in the plains of Western America in his earlier days he seems to know so much about Indian ways and all that."

"But he's met his match in our policemen for a fact," insisted Andy, full of genuine admiration for the pretty and yet extremely good little girls, who had many a time led the boy and his scouts to victory over tremendous obstacles.

"Silence every body now," came from Penrod, though naturally it must have given him a very warm good feeling in the region of his heart to know that these good chunks of his felt so kindly toward his sisters and were not backward in expressing their sentiments.

So they continued on for another stretch.... The fugitive must have come to believe that by this time he would have thrown any possible track-off the scent, at any rate it was evident he did not try any new game a looking to baffling pursuit.... Gliding along like shadows, the bunch of scouts accoutred and nine little girls with their two princes made fair progress.

Penrod, and also his sister were of the opinion that at any minute now they might come upon the spot where the unknown alien had his hide out, or where he might receive direction and help from the Glandellian camp. He and the little girls had communicated their plans to the others before then, and they all knew the party they would be expected to play should it all come to a desperate fight or a hold up.

The prisoners wisely made no sound as he was forced to follow his captives but he showed some signs that he was not able to stand as much as walking so steadily as the scouts, and the little girls were. Then if it came to a pass, covered by the arms of four of the scouts it was doubtful whether the prisoners could get around his neck as he was and two boys holding the other end of the line whether the man would dare take chances and try to flee. Then another idea they had in mind was that if the man they were pursuing would reach his comrades and warn them, they might try to flee the camp and leave the boy behind them to take him or kill him.

Somewhere too. Penrod and the little girl also believed they would find what they were seeking in the unusually large patch of brush that now lay ahead of them. They caught glimpses of the water beyond which proved that the arm of the swamp extended in this direction. Pushing steadily on as miserably as possible, they were presently able to part the bushes, and discovered a still slightly shrouded light in plain sight. The boat they had been searching for lay on the shore, with one plank smashed in, doubtless either by design or by the result of an accident, that had wrecked the hopes of the Glandelinians. Eagerly they surveyed the prospect, and then Tim Groveton gave a grunt of disgust.

"Skipped out, that's a merely shame," he exclaimed wrathfully. "But what is that white thing stuck in the clutch or clutch of the wand yonder?" demanded Daisy.

"It looks to me like it might be some sort of communication from our poor papa and Hen Conditt," because that is an old scout and Indian way of leaving word, you know," said Joyce.

Violet, was already hurrying forward to possess herself of the message. The others watched her take it from the clutch of the stick, and open the soiled paper on which there seemed to be more or less crooked writing in pencil. Then Violet turned to her comrades, a look of satisfaction on her argal face.

"Is it from poor Henry," asked all of her sisters and Penrod at once "that be the important fact stamped upon their minds. At the same time they realized just as well as anything it must be so. Violet would not be smiling so sweetly and then frowning too (not a few hoo poos) as she deciphered the meaning of the crooked scribble. As all the boys knew, and the little girls too, for some reason or other though it was said because of a bad shaky right hand, Henry was one of the poorest writers in the school of boy scouts, and to avoid such trouble had tried to learn with his left hand as it was not shaky, but had not succeeded yet. It may be remembered that in speaking of his other "note" some of them brought this fact forward, stating that a teacher had once declared the boy well named, since his efforts looked like hen tracks on paper. But it wasn't that the boy didn't try to learn, just any one try and see if he can write with a hand that is not a wful shaky.

"It's lucky and Thank Our Dear Blessed Lord that I'm able to read any so to sort of old writing," remarked Violet, and even without the slightest touch of glacial pride. "It's a gift with me from Heaven thank God, and Hen some times came to me to ask me to tell him what he had set down, for after it got cold he could not even read it himself. It was I and Jennie who he seached him to try and learn with his left hand as that is not shaky." "Then you have somehow sensed the meaning of his present communication have you Violet, dear?" questioned Penrod, a little bit given to stilted written language himself....

"I can read it all right, and I believe my sisters could too," was the reply she received. "But understanding the English of it is another thing. The sentences seem very badly disconnected, and some of them are queer. When Henry wrote this he must either have been out of his mind or else he was in great fear of something, or some body."

Of course when the leader of the Vivian girls said this it produced something of a sensation among her six sisters and the others, for they were seen to exchange grave looks, while Jennie Vivian was seen to sadly shake her pretty head, and give that little rattle of her a little tilt upwards, as though she now believed more than ever the time was near at hand, when she would be compelled to make some sort of use of the same, in order to save the kid napped a drum.... 2.2.2.

"Please read it out to us Violet dear," begged Penrod.

"Yes, we are wondering what it can all be about," added Tim Groveton.

"Then listen and please don't any one interrupt me until I finish," said Violet. "This is indeed what Hen has written with a lead pencil on this sheet of paper, which I believe he may have torn from a little memorandum book I happen to know he always carried about in his pocket, and while he had almost filled with writing about me and my sisters that would make you think we were all ready in Heaven. Don't grieve sisters you know very well for you have seen it."

She held the crumpled paper close to her eyes, for in places the writing was rather faint, and in two particular spots, Violet, a had to guess away at a word or evidently a drop of something, perhaps a salty salty tear had fallen on the paper blurring the work of the lead pencil stub.

"Dear sisters and my good boys and girls friends, perhaps you'll get this" said Violet. "He says he's in the swamp some where, that he has seen us, and know that we are the princesses, and that the others are boy scouts though whom they are he doesn't know for every one except us girls wear the child scout uniforms. Of the scouts he thinks you boys are the scout militia. This is what I managed to write from the notes."

"Dear princesses, I know you are out looking for me on the charge of having stolen James' and my good money from his safe in his home occupied occupied by you and your sisters and your grandfather. I came here to tell you as you have entered the most dangerous swamp in this country which once you lose you yourself you'll never get out. Unless I can find you or you follow my tracks you're a goner, or if lost will be the most miserable kids on earth----but I say on the honor of a scout, I never stole a cent of money, I was tied to a chair in Empress Vivian's bed room by three Glandelinian boy scouts who escaped from the Christian camp with some few Glandelinian prisoners, and my truth is well founded, for your father, Mother and Evans will tell you so as they found me securely fastened to the chair and gagged. They are dreadfully worried since you disappeared in the dangerous swamp, and have a strong number of men combing the place at all risk to locate you. Oh what hard luck when they surprised me, the three little rascals rascals, but as they pointed guns at me and were desperate I had to do as they said no matter how hard I rebelled and had to give them the combination of the safe."

Then with a gasp they fastened me to a chair and gagged me so I couldn't holler out for help. I'm meaning to leave this note behind in the scout way, and don't I hope you'll find it, and listen to reason Princesses. If you come upon them don't think one of them is me for he ain't. That I is one who stole my uniform left me half naked when tied to the chair and so posed me copied me so he could look like me. Better though I leave them where they are and quit the swamp before you go so far in you'll never get out. It's name is a right one. That's all. Henry Conditt."

"Great Jumping hooting Cassan" exclaimed Timothy Grovetonia, who with the rest had hung on every word read by Violet. "That proves of one or two things. Fifth our poor papa had been caught napping by these Glandelinian boy scouts, or else they surprised him in his own room and made him do as they asked. Any way he may also be looney for I always knew Hen was weak in the upper story just a wee bit. Poor chap, we've got to avenge him, we got to get those three young snakes again if it takes us till Christmas. Our house is taking now."

"Yes, and we all say the same," but not from James as he doubled his unusually expansive fists and looked in deed savage. Indeed a hasty glance around them would have told any observer that this strange message filled with warning and telling all the truth, left by Hen Conditt in the clutch of a stick thrust into the ground had renewed their former resolution not to give over the search until they had either found the three Glandelinian boy scouts or exhausted every known device looking to success.

"If you ask me," said Violet, "I'd say the answer to the middle answer to the middle lay between the several things you mention, Tim. Hen is crazed a little so they say but it is with fear now what might happen to us out in this dangerous and dismal swamp. He fear a now we will be in the power of a dangerous swamp and that if we once lose ourselves there is no getting out whatever a how it is to be done of course we can only guess, but the boy tells us in this letter that he did not rob you James, that one of the others did after trying him to a chair, and that he believes a strong party of soldiers are searching for us with the intention of preventing us from going too far into the swamp. That explains his panic."

"And say, he tells us right at the end of his note that we should quit the swamp before we go so far in we'll be lost." Jennie Vivian went on to remark and according to my notion, that condition is next door to being insane. Why maybe the poor fellow fears for us more than for himself. I pity him more from the bottom of my heart than I ever did before."

"Notice what he incidentally says near the end," added Violet. "Better quit the swamp before you go so far in you'll never get out. That seems to strengthen our theory that the swamp is a dangerous place to be in. So that settles it."

"All this mention of his must stand for the three Glandelinian boy scouts who had gotten of course and tied him to the chair," ventured James. "You could not be any body else" Violet made answer looking closely at Penrod. Penrod who so far had not spoken a single word in fact had just now does not seem to think of any other three persons."

"These three Glandelinian boy scouts are no common mammals let me tell you," Penrod finally declared. "They must have had plenty of experience along their own line of work."

"When the truth comes out Penrod, I'm positive that you three will be found pretty near the exact facts," affirmed Tim. "But all the time we are jabbering away here," warned Joyce. "Remember that they are getting further and further away from us."

"As to that," Penrod assured him, "a few minutes don't make so much difference, and it is always best to start right, so as to avoid a loss of ten minutes ten times as much later by making serious mistakes. I'm not worrying about the dangers of the swamp as long as we have Johnny Green and Angeline Rhoe with us. Then again, I'm pretty sure that those three Glandelinian boy scouts are much too smart to think of trying to leave the forbidden swamp before night comes, even if they plan to do it then."

"Some how this intelligence conferred the more impetuous ones. They had had such unlimited faith in Penrod knowing what course it was best to pursue that his judgement was his judgement was accepted on its face value every time--just as the Treasury notes of the United States Government are relied upon to be without the slightest doubt in specie. "About how long ago would you say they had slipped out of here?" Catherine asked, as they still lingered, looking to the right and to the left as though wanting to make certain nothing valuable in the way of a clue could have escaped their scrupulous scrutiny."

"Jennie, I mean dear we are depending on you for that information," suggested Penrod and he sister, Violet together, although it could not be doubted that he and she too were able to give a pretty good answer for they had observed certain signs as well as Jennie."

"Not more than two hours ago," said Penrod. "Jennie ventured with considerable confidence manifesting in her manner as though if put to it she was able to muster all the evidence necessary to establish her veracity."

"Just about what I thought myself," added Penrod with a satisfied smile at his prettiest and good good sister. "Two heads are better than one any day dear sis, especially when they seem to work together as well as ours do."

"Then the three Glandelinian boy scouts, did not think to skip out right away after the other got back here, did they?" asked Andy. "Knowing there was not apt to be any sort of pursuit in the night. Then again that one fugitive we trailed so far relied more on his own having blinded his trail as a man as James said had spent some time in the Western part of the United States among Indians and cowboys could have done. It was not a great while before dawn when he must have aroused the other Glandelinians if there are any and the three boys and told them they must get away..."

"But when do you think our chum could have scribbled that message and how and what is he doing here also in the swamp?" asked Daisy.

"Evidently he must have known about our being within a mile of him," replied Violet with a promptness that told how she had figured it all out. "I suppose that man told him about the uniformed boys with us Princesses and the other good little girls who were in the swamp looking for them, and the before the three boys guessed the truth about our coming after him, and the before..."

"Then discover our own danger in losing ourselves in a swamp sooner or later," Jennie continued. "Then not with the foe after all, took the first chance he had to write that message. He must have fixed it in that split stick and then stuck it here in the ground scout fashion."

"We seem to have it all sized up to a dot by now," remarked Penrod, preparing to move, "and there isn't anything else for us to do here, suppose we get busy on the trail again, Jennie dear."

"I'm your pretty little chicken, you can depend on me when it comes to scenting out a trail brother dear. Wonder if that man will be up to any more high junk in the way of walking along logs, climbing trees, and such."

"At times! We will keep a good look out for such capers, believe me." "And if it is really those three boys," said Violet, looking at her sisters as if she knew sure they would agree with her. "We ourselves will have to look out for them." "I do not know whether they fear you boys scouts or not but the scoundrels know we are argel possessed, and that only makes to them more defiant of me and my sister. Just recently when we did capture those three boys they gave us the awfullest fight you can imagine and yet we seven against the three and we armed just as good as they. They are not the least bit afraid of me and my sister and so in case we do meet with them, you boys keep close to us to protect us."

"Indeed we will!" they all shouted. They were soon moving along (go to to hog knog) the seven or eight trackers in the van as before, with the others trailing after, dragging their unwilling prisoners along, whom they had not since spoken to nor to them. They treated him as if he didn't exist, but kept watchful eyes upon him just the same. Landy this time brought up the rear though James James Andrews kept a careful eye on him most of the time, as though he feared he might step up close and start a row with the prisoner and cause noise enough to be heard by those they were tracking. Fat as Landy was he was never care less clumsy, but though he took jokes, and was humorous he was sometimes treacherous to Glandelinian prisoners. They had known him to do such things as to torment prisoners more than a few times in the past, and as this prisoner was one of four who had attempted to burn them all in their sleeping camp beds the night before the escape was no telling what was in Landy's mind, and as James didn't like Landy's face just now he made it a point to drop back and keep him company when he imagined the situation became acute, so that he had any consideration or sympathy with the prisoner. It was just to avoid unnecessary noise."

From the rapid manner in which Jennie and Penrod picked up the trail it was plainly evident that so far the unknown fugitive had not bothered to resort to any of his tricks looking to blinding the tracks."

He had been compelled to wait for daylight before trying to move through the swamp because it would have been impossible at night time unless one were familiar with the way occurred a lantern, and there were parts of the swamp too that was absolutely impassable, because of extensive bogs and dangerous marshes. Neither of these happened to be within his scope, and so he had to depend upon daylight. Daylight."

Of course none of the boy scouts knew what sort of a trap they might expect when finally they overtook the man they were following, or came upon the three boys and their soldier companions, the former of whom Violet warned as a good deal more late and feared no one not even the argel possessed little girls. That little they could gather from various sources included them to believe he too must be a pretty desperate fellow if he knew he was closely followed he could easily ambush a few of the boys on the girls. But the mention of him being left out by them was what made them wonder."

He might be dangerously armed for all they knew. Such Glandelinians usually are, though in this case it might be otherwise, Penrod had told them since he believed the man had been also a prisoner making his escape when he first attacked the "Forbidden Swamp" and concluded to have of his hide out in its day. Violet had also warned that if taken by surprise and seeing no chance of escape the three boys might chance anything before allowing themselves to be captured. She remembered when once when on the train, Gerald Starring had attempted to kill himself, he and Penrod by jumping from the train to fall down a steep place and that only by landing on something soft was that saved them. Still Jennie was not for taking too many chances. As he moved along, she managed to keep her little small and short rifle of her in position for quick use, should an occasion arise calling for service."

She also tried often to glance ahead from time to time in the hopes of detecting any suspicious ambushes. A sudden attack that would suddenly disconcert once every one and leave every body in a hole might throw the entire party in a state of helplessness, which would always reflect on the ability as scouts. They spent half an hour in this fashion though the trail wound in and out so much that at the end they could hardly have been more than a quarter of a mile from the late camp of the fugitives. When they were halted by a wide and extensive bog of dark brown color. Water was seeping up through it, and the ground at its very edge was fully soaked under their feet as they stood there."

"Here here's where we are stopped," said Penrod.

"Put the trail changes direction and goes this way," said Jennie as she examined the ground. She looked down close to the ill smelling queer mire and suddenly gave a start."

"Did you hear that brother dear?" she whispered suddenly, then they cut a hand no as to clutch the others' camp; while every one became rigid with suspense."

"It certainly sounded like some one was coughing," admitted the others.

"But I'm damned certain it wasn't from in front of us, but over to the left."

and now see the bog in which would be some queer thing. I had seen it in the quad, which she had indicated with out atatched finger.

"I thought the same Jennie said," Pen-od told her, "But then this t-tail is a little bit more so much it might get around the slough that way as any enough."

"Of course it might Pen-od."

"All we can do is keep going along and follow the t-tail in the new direction and some of us watch for signs of the three boys and their Glandelinian companions over yonder."

"Then you don't think it would pay to strike out to the left?" questioned the other, who seemed to be hesitating between two opinions.

"It would be silly to suicidal intentions to try and catch one that t-tail slough for a certainty," said Pen-od decidedly. "Even if we tried it by means of using the t-tail and the like as some do, it might catch one of us. After all our a-s might have deceived us and it might have been some queer hunt of a fork, or a strange sound that at some times comes from a slough, a he on fishing for minnows, or a muck at choking over his dinner we must keep on and follow by the new t-tail. It's a short cut to the left of course, but I wouldn't let any one chance crossing the quick sand even by any safe device. It might catch some one and then we'll have an awful job getting her or him out, and we member Johnny says it's almost impossible to rescue any one if they sink up to their shoulders in it. No we must follow the new direction of the t-tail that's all."

Indeed Jennie, and he sister looked relieved. After all it pleased the little girls to have some one decide a puzzling question like this for them for they dreaded even the sight of any kind of bog. Responsibility weighs heavy on the shoulders of many even on noble boys and they are only too glad to shift it on occasion.

"Just as you say brother dear, and I reckon you are quite right too," always in a low sibilant tone that would not carry farther than a dozen yards at the most... They again turned to take up the t-tail which just at the point happened to run through some bushes coming up to their hips and along side the bog. They went forward very cautiously to be sure the one who they were tracking did not turn off just to way lay them, and cause them to step into any bog. Hence it also atatched without being seen in this direction too, but it was not so. It was easy to see where those ahead of them had brushed through, for they had trampled down the lush grass and brushed aside the tender branches of the bushes. Pen-od had bent over to take a good look down at the ground before setting forth when he heard Angelina Vivian give a sudden violent hiss. Now that was a well known sign among boy and girl scouts of the Vivianites and which had saved them in good stead many a time in the past. Heard under such threatening conditions it could only mean one thing, Angelina had discovered some sort of danger, either that they were about stepping on an unseen quag or some other danger and Angelina was warning every body in order that they might step back and drop down out of sight. Pen-od looked at her, and she made a signal with her fingers. Pen-od then did the same and every body seemed to understand this instantly. Instantly for as though they were all moved by the same certolling influence, they allowed themselves to sink on their knees amidst the friendly bushes that afforded such splendid shelter. Even as Pen-od dropped down he had shot a quick glance toward the right from which again that solemn cough had now once more come, and saw saw something which startled him, and the rest who also saw.

No wonder the young prince was surprised and thrilled by what he saw as he crouched there amidst the high bushes, and stared over their tops. But more than sixty or seventy yards away at the least there appeared to be a violent commotion among other bunch of bushes as though a number of unseen parties might be forcing their way through the obstruction. Even as Pen-od and his sisters and boy and girls clung as well looked, a fugitive came into view, quickly followed by a second, a third and still more until in all there were sixty in the queer procession that seemed to be heading directly for the late hide out of the swamp fugitives.

What startled the boys and girls most of all was the fact that they knew several of those who went to make up that strange company. First there was Walter John Starling and just behind him was a tall, consequential looking person dressed in a uniform of a very high official of the royal guard and with a glittering gilt shield fastened on the front of his lance. Next came a tall, thin, and violent and here came and all the boys here and others know Jack Ambrose Penn. Behind him came a second and third and a fourth man, also in uniform of high rank, whom they knew were also high generals, while the others were Angelinian soldiers carrying weapons that ought to be in the hands of the demons themselves.

"Oh and All Fish hooks."

"That was Tim letting off steam," he would have admitted it, but he uttered in a favoring expression so very low that there was not the slightest danger of it being overheard.

"Don't wink an eye lash if you can help it fellows," whispered Pen-od, who apparently for reasons of his own did not want even these good friends of his to know of their presence so nearby. Of course the other instantly knew what he meant and if they had been made of stone it is doubtful whether they would have maintained a more dignified attitude as they crouched there in the bushes. Fortunately all of those of the posse of soldiers seemed to be looking ahead. Perhaps they had been warned by Walter Starling that the place to which he was taking them was not very far distant, which would account for their eagerness. So they passed on. Pen-od kept whispering to his followers not to make a move unless it was to drop flat down on their faces. Apparently not even Landy felt inclined to do this. As long as the Chief of royal officers and his gallant posse remained in sight every one crouched there and took it out in staring. Then when even the last soldier had been swallowed or had disappeared in the scrub bushes might have been heard arising from some of the boys lips as though they were relieved to have the suspense ended.

"Never glimpsed us," remarked Tim triumphantly.

"A kind as bats in the day time," added Landy.

"They didn't happen to turn this way," said Pen-od. And since you all kept so still I don't believe they would have noticed us even if they had looked. I want to say it was well done boys and good little girls."

"That was Walter Starling wasn't it?" asked Jennie. Turner as though she wanted to have some one corroborate what her own eyes had told him.

"It certainly was," said Landy. "He knows how to lead people through any swamp."

"And you all noticed," he asked. "A marked violet." That they were making so slight for the hide out where no doubt Gerald Starling and his comrades must have spent the night. That shows Walter Starling must have figured out after we left him that it would be a good place for hiding. What do you all say about it?"

"Oh there's no question but what you are so correct Violet dearest," Jennie Vivian told her in her queer way. "But I'm tickled pink because Pen-od didn't take a notion to hail Jack Evans, and take him in on our deal."

"Would he not have a right to it since he is our guardian and has been so good to us," demanded Joice.

Pen-od laughed at that.

"It was not any hall to the chief this time you see Jennie dear," he remarked. "As to whether it was or is his right or not Joice dear, we have borne the heat and the burden of the day, and therefore it would not be right to fight that that crowd coming in at the tail end of the chase, should share alike with us. Besides you remember we decided to get at those three Glandelinian boy scouts and show them they can't put it over on other Christian boy scouts and get away with it."

"So we did," muttered Daisy.

"But just the same it don't seem right," still protested Joice.

"Well then we can change our minds and call to him," put in Pen-od.

"No, no," said Violet. "Too late now and besides if we did the fugitives would hear us and be wise and escape both a crowd."

"But Pen-od" objected Angelina, "supposing they go to that place, and find the Glandelinian fugitives flown, don't you reckon they'll just the same notice that we have been there?"

"So far as Jack and his men goes," he turned to the other. "I don't believe they capable capable capable of finding out anything except that the camp is empty. But all the same I suppose they'll know about us."

"Meaning that Walter Starling will see our tracks and read the story there is that it Pen-od?" queried Hettie, quick to catch on the meaning of their brother's words.

"Yes Walter Starling will tell, because he has been a boy scout so long that he knows more than the most slick Indian about following tracks. When he finds out that there was a lot of boys and girls in the camp he'll guess we discovered the place, that is proving that ain't a position of those reported by him looking for us."

"Maybe they'll take it for granted we ought caught the fugitives and be ready to throw up the game then and there?" suggested Daisy.

"Hardly that," advised Pen-od. "Walter Starling ought to be able to tell them different. He would soon learn after looking things over, that all our tracks were made after those of that man when he left the camp."

You see sister, that must tell him we were pursuing, pursuing the fellow. I put myself in Walter's place and that is how I believe I have figured it out."

"A good way to do to believe me would, Joyce."

"Then in that case," Jennie Vivian continued, "They will be coming along after us before a great while. Now if this doesn't beat every thing I ever took part in with you and my sister, it's a continuous procession, boys winding in and out through the high lands of the big swamp-- first getting news from Hen, and we go chasing for him in the swamp after escaped Glandelinians who went with him, then us and so many bold boys and girls scouts going into and also surrounding the swamp on all sides, and then to get a proof written letter of the real thing that Hen was not guilty that he had been captured and tied up in our headquarters and our father and Evans discovered him, and finally Evans and his valiant posse were bringing up the rear."

"But we don't want them to overtake us now do we?" asked Andy actually meaning to hint that they had better be moving on, for though no scout he was not really a fatty fatty, but all muscle and as strong as an ox for his age, and loved and feared and respected by his comrades.

"We do not unless Violet otherwise insists, do, it's up to them," Tim informed him plainly.

"Maybe I'll give in too just to see which is the best of us for hunting fugitives we can," put in Joyce and the rest expected to be on the jump again right away, doubling our pace it may be. Andy, the worst is yet to come, he remembers."

"Hugh you can't scare me any more," the strong fat like scout told her for he knew fairly well that with a trail to follow they could hardly proceed any more rapidly than before and if they did he could keep up better than any of them, and faster too for despite the stoutness of his legs there was not one of them who could win a running race with him. "Any way why should I be scared when there are seven beautiful little angels amongst us," he added.

"Yes but when we meet up with the three little Glandelinian desperadoes like Gerald Starling and his companions, we seven beautiful little angels need your protection," giggled Violet.

"Well we are an addition to the possession angels," said Andy grimly brandishing his rifle. "Here we are. We'll run away all right, but I'm afraid in the wrong direction."

Violet and her sisters giggled for they knew what "wrong direction" he meant. She and her sisters knew the three Glandelinian boys were not afraid of her and her sisters by no means, angel possessed though they were but they couldn't understand why they were so terrified at the sight of boy and girl scouts. Progress was immediately assumed, and the prisoners stumbled because the rest period was so short, only the length of time the conversation continued. They went forward in about the same manner as before with Tim keeping Andy Company at the tail end of the procession for often he and Andrews did not like the looks he often cast toward the unwilling to go prisoners.

"Get on, on, and don't drag so much," he told Andy at last. "You are not so tired as that, and you are only making believe you wound hurt that bad. It was only a scratch for wasn't it? who dressed it?" The situation was now growing more and more serious and much depended on whether they could manage to overtake the fugitives before night came on, though it was of course not yet near noon (on the moon moon moon moon) yet a whole day's prospect of tramping through the intricate recesses of a swamp just where dry land afforded footing, and much work to avoid bogs, and do watch and do all that Johnny Green directed without a word on his part since he started to lead them was a monumental task that must try the nerves of all of them, and it was feared that so tired were they becoming that they would either have to compell a halt or drop out of the ranks long before sun set came, and they had intended to eat their dinner while continuing on.

Penrod, however, was hopeful that at they must overtake those they chased long before such utter weariness seized them. He knew that even Gerald Starling and his two companions, although no weaklings could not stand hour upon hour of continual walking, especially when it consisted of such uncertain footing as fell to their portion under those conditions. Complete exhaustion then got you when on the biggest might compell the three Glandelinian boys scouts to beg their companions to either leave them or else order a halt.... One way or the other suited the scouts and Violet and her sisters just as well, so long as they overtook them. When Andy found that the prisoners were puffing from his exertions, he took an extra grip on him, and would not listen to Jennie's

Vivian when she proposed that the prisoners better have a momentary rest. "All he has to do is to sit for a time while we wait on him," Jennie said or you can remain here with him where we leave you, Andy so you can watch him, and after we have done our business we'll surely look you up again, won't we Penrod?"

"Nothing doing," snapped Andy looking wickedly at the prisoners. "I'm supposed to hear you say that Jennie after that night of horror we just went through on account of him and his two companions. What do you take me for? He could stand it without even a feeling of any kind to see you and your sisters sisters burn to death so he can stand this forced march too. I'm a stickler I want you to know and I'll make him go on too. Adhesive plasters have not got anything on me when it comes to standing by you and your sister a thick and thin. Don't waste any sympathy on him prisoners, he doesn't deserve you a slightest consideration. These accused Glandelinians like to make you suffer all they can, so why not they get a taste of their own medicine, and no use wanting you breath my good little angel, save it for you work, say I and don't pay any attention to the prisoners. A nation of these Glandelinians ain't worthy of one of you little princesses."

"Let him be Jennie dear," said Penrod as she was going to speak again. "Why bother with him any further?" snorted Jim. "I'd release the rascal or tie him up some where so he can't even if he gets free get lost in this dismal swamp. It would serve him right."

"Why yes Andy is doing all right," added James Andrews. "and the prisoners prisoners is not stumbling as we supposed he would in the last half hour which is some record for the prisoners under stand fellows. And I believe too is is he is playing more tired than he is just to delay us in our work so the others can elude us."

"See Jennie dear he is right," said Andy. "What I'll get there is we have to bust one of his or own or own blood vessel in trying. That is the Abbeemian nature every time, but I don't believe that Glandelinian prisoners is so tired. I believe as James says there is hope of stopping us so in the delay his comrades may outwit us."

Having heard Andy talk in this strain many a time the rest of the scouts could easily put these expressions in his mouth for looks however counted more than mere words. However they had been making splendid progress all this while and must have covered considerable distance since the time when they watched the Royal Official posse wind its way past their hiding place. Jennie Vivian and Penrod, and also her sisters too (not a Jew) had once or twice held a low consultation after making an examination of the tracks they were following. The others listening to what their eight main leaders said found they were comparing notes and that it appeared to be the opinion of them that Gerald Starling and his followers were getting pretty tired. This they could make out in various ways known to Christian scouts who had made it a business of reading the story to be found in certain tracks.

"You can see even now how uneven Gerald himself walks most of the time," said Violet herself, "he wobbles even worse than his companion Fredrick Fredrick powder who goes to show he is getting pretty well tired out. As bad as he is I almost have to pity him for you blame the poor wicked little sinners, when perhaps he is weak from hunger hunger if any of us had to go without a bite to eat all day we would get unsteady on our legs too."

There was no dissenting voice raised to this assertion, eating is so necessary to the average boy and girl that nothing on earth can compensate for a dearth of food at the regular intervals.

"Then we saw several places where the three sat down to rest you remember and at range to say also the foot prints of a little girl along with them," Penrod reminded Jennie.

"Yes and the last time it struck us both that two of those boys had pulled her roughly to her feet again by main force which I take it was not nice and kind of that but those little little bullies as you might expect," Jennie went on to say.

"Oh the wicked little cowards," Tim was heard to growl and the look on his face as he said those few words told what he meant to do if ever the opportunity came his way to strike a blow in behalf of that little girl.

"I would say," began Jennie.

"Oh please help me somebody," came a plaintive wail from some little way off. "I hear you coming by you whispers. Oh God help me I'm thrown in here by three boys."

They were shocked to learn this cry and they had just come within sighting distance of a small stream, generally only half full of yellow mud, water, which is also called "Forbidden Hole Bottom Creek." It is an ugly, dreadful, forboding looking creek, whose shall banks are covered over with floods during the heavy rains and whose currents cut treacherous new channels at such times in the soft silt. It contains too at many spots that dreadful menace of swamp streams, sucking or quicksand.

They heard the cry again.

"Quick," whispered Jennie. "It came from that creek over there."

They all ran wildly in a hasty twirl toward the creek, pulling the prisoners a few feet as unconsciously as if they were with out him. The road ended about a hundred yards from a large stretch of water. Then they reached the creek bank. For a moment they all stood transfixed at the dreadful scene before them. Forbidden Creek reflecting in its yellow depth depths the darkness caused by so many trees above, branches and other trees that bent over it seemed like a pre-conviction of something any one would dread to approach. And up stream just beyond each of an overhanging branch of a big tree was an almond shaped sand but very smooth in appearance and of a strange reddish brown color. And in it they saw a little girl embedded nearly up to her waist, the water coiling slightly around her. The child's face was white and strained, and she seemed to be struggling against a sort of pressure that was almost preventing her from breathing, for she was at times gasping.

"Quick and of the worse kind," said Johnny Green under his breath.

"Can we save her? Oh don't tell me it is impossible," screamed Jennie. They all ran through the brush to the place where the child was sinking.

"It's all right little girl," Penrod called. "We'll have you out in no time." Then he said to Jennie, "You and my other sisters stay here and talk to her to keep her spirits up. You other boys, and you two girls do as I say."

He uncoiled a great rope and fastened one end first against the tree near the creek. The helpless little girl looked wistfully to where she thought she saw angels of small size standing on the bank and her eyelids dropped shut and she acted as if she could not hardly breathe now at all. It took no acuteness to see what had happened. The child may have been a prisoner of the Glandelinians who finding her a bother to carry along while in flight in order to get rid of her then and yet refusing her to be rescued in case they got overtaken had thrown her into the treacherous treacherous quag. No doubt she had only been first thrown into the water but as the water closed over her head she had struggled some how up to this sand bar only to find that it gave way under her like dough, that she now sank and sank, and could not pull herself free.

"Oh when are you going to help me please," she called. "I'm afraid I'm being swallowed up by this sand pool."

She now held both arms out flat but the sand was rising, creeping steadily up to her very neck. Terro-struck, Violet and her sisters like an icy wind, and Jennie before any one could think of stopping her, ran down the bank and plunged into the yellow water. She swam only a few strokes and managed some how to wade and dug paddle her way to the little girl feeling sure the possession angels would aid her in being freed later on and saving the little girl in the bargain. She sat down beside the child and with her cupped hands began to scoop the sand away from her neck and chin. She worked frantically to free her, while her sisters screamed and would have run down had not the boys held them.

"Come back Jennie come back," they screamed. "It will suck you down too. Please come back." Yet Jennie worked frantically to free the little girl, tears and perspiration rolling down her cheeks. She prayed constantly as she scooped sand, telling her sisters not to fear, and a moment later the other boys who had gone off swarmed down the creek bank. They had shovels and ropes and where they got them so quick no body knows, but had a couple of big doors. They laid the doors flat on the sand bars thus spreading the weight so that they would not sink and pulled, they soon to the relief of her sisters dug Jennie loose and pulled her to safety. Penrod and his other sisters being relieved praising her now more than ever for her bravery though on they were so frightened for her safety before. Then came the real problem.

To get the other little girl out and without hurting her, for as hard as they worked the stubborn sand would not release her an inch.

It absolutely looked utterly impossible to save her, but Violet and her sisters also gave forth all their own energy at the ropes fastened around the child's arms, and chest, and after two hours desperate work they had at least pulled her so far forward that she was now to be within reach of the hands of a number. While Violet and her sisters held tightly on the ropes to keep her from sinking any more for they had her up about a foot now, the boys managed to go down the bank, and finally got hold of her arms.

"My gosh," gasped Penrod. "Hear the sucking down will you." Full hard every one. It holds her like a vice."

They worked manfully every one of them, including Jennie, Violet and Angelina, while the higher they managed to pull her inch by inch the more Violet and her sisters drew on the ropes to keep them taut, and soon with a word of "Heave" she was out.

Four hours of desperate work and only a six year old girl too.

"My that quick sand can grip fast and hard," said Tim. "But thank God she is out."

"It's a miracle you save her," said Johnny Green. "My arms are sore with my efforts to pull her out."

"It sure took us four hours without hurting her to extricate such a little girl from the dreadful clutch of the quick sand," said Penrod. "But Jennie dear were you not reckless in doing what you did."

"As long as you were all here I wasn't afraid to," she said tearfully. "If I didn't do that you all would never have got her out."

"You are right," said Johnny Martin. "That is the bad bog I spoke about. Many others the same I'm saying. We got any one out once you are in, and yet we got her out."

"I'll bet I know why," said James Andrews.

"Why?" asked Penrod who with several other boys was scraping the sand from the now weeping child.

"Because your sisters are with us. I'll bet if they had not been we would not have succeeded. You know they've angel possessed, and angels will do what to us is impossible."

"Violet and her sisters smiled but Penrod said:

"My Gosh you are right. Don't cry little girl. You'll be all right soon, but I hope she won't get sick," he added. "These that get caught like she was usually do because of the pressure of the sand around her you know." "Make her jump a few around," said Joice. "That'll restore her blood to circulation, and as we resume our march we'll have her walk along with us. I guess she'll be all right. Then we'll make a camp fire and clean and dry her clothes."

Penrod did as she suggested and after understanding what he meant her to do the child obeyed. When they thought sure they had the child warm enough they decided to resume their journey right away. They did not intend to ask any questions of the child because the mere mention of the three Glandelinian boy scouts made the child look so frightened and made her at first hang back as if she was afraid they would return her to them that they finally suspected how the little girl came to be in the quagmire. Filled with renewed determination the four after this stirring incident they once more took up their task, assuring the little girl that they would not give her up to the bad boys, but were bent on arresting them for what they done to her and for other reasons too. Jennie turned likened their progress to the ways of the dread Sibirian Wolf that follows its quarry day and night untill in the end its very persistence wins the victory.

"We are in this to a finish now," Penrod was fond of saying whenever he had the chance. "And soon we'll get the little scoundrel and then the Glandelinian friends. I'd like a nice meeting with Fredrick Lowden in special as I have an account to settle with him. I could never forget Jennie dear what he did to you, making you think I basely betrayed you by disguising as me and I have never got over it the way you looked and acted and fainted that dreadful day. The boys of the Vivianite Wolf Patrol mean to stick to their name and run the prey to earth. The little devils just can't get away now, and throw a little girl into the quicksand. All we got to do is keep on moving and believe the game is going to come our way. Every body put his best foot forward again. It's for the honor of the Vivianite boys and girls, that we get hold of those three boys before Jack Evans does. I'd just love to be acquainted with Fredrick Lowden. Oh he'll never want to see me again."

It was now two more hours since they rescued the little girl and more since they had started on this new trail. Before this time no doubt the posse must have reached the deserted hide out, and learned that the Abianianians had flown. Yet it was even possible that they were now coming along the plain with all the boy scouts and the nine girls and Princess had left behind them. Figuring that Jack Evans and his men could not exceed their own rate of progress despite their four hours of delay, they could count on over two full hours advantage over the others. That surely ought to be an abundance of time in which to carry out their plans, granting that they could overtake the fugitives. Penrod had again cautioned them to keep very still. Too the swamp was very silent where they now found themselves and sounds could be carried to some distance under such conditions.

But suddenly Jennie had raised her hand for a halt for she had come to a full stop again, looking at her in surprise the others found that the little tracker did not seem to be bending over to examine the trail more closely as had occurred many times before. On the contrary, Jennie Vivian was now raising her head in an expectant attitude. Penrod even conjectured that she must be observing the wood pecker that was boring a hole in some nearby tree top, as it sat, at that "could be easily heard, and as she and her sisters too were very interested in all kinds of birds, and was about to try and follow the supposed line of vision on the part of his pre-tent sister, when he heard her say something. It was only a brief sentence but it meant words to those tired trail followers. "I smell smoke, wood smoke at that," was what Jennie hissed, as she continued to sniff vigorously.

Indeed it was no time for talking now, (let you know) and indeed every one realized that fact. If they were close enough to the fugitives to catch the scent of burning wood, the camp could not be far away. Penrod, and his sisters seemed to hit upon the same idea at the same time. They took note of the prevailing direction of the wind, and guessed that the fire must be in the quarter from which it was blowing, even though that was not exactly straight ahead, but a little to the left.

Making motions to indicate extreme caution, Penrod led the way. Now was the time for the scouts of the Vivianites to prove the value of the instruction. Many times in the past they had practiced this very same difficult feat of creeping upon the camp of an unsuspecting enemy to make a daring and desperate raid just as a bunch of red Indians might do, and what they had learned under those conditions was going to prove of great value to them all.

No one tried to hurry. Indeed what was the use, when those they had followed had come to a halt, and there was no longer any need of haste. They went on yard by yard, at random, their vision all the while, in hopes of glimpsing the column of smoke, or the crackling flames ahead. The prisoners and the rescued little girls were forced to do the same so they would not be seen by the enemy. And in making this advance they were careful to creep along as close to the ground as possible. This was an easy matter for all the rest, but to the prisoner who was "rather quite a stout fellow" it was quite a different task, though he succeeded in flattening himself out wonderfully well, all things considered and especially since he had to do so. When finally smoke was discovered, the concentration increased if such things were possible, for they knew not how many of the enemy there were and they would like to capture the whole without a fight if it was possible. Fortunately the nature of the ground proved favorable to such work as creeping, the re-birge certain amount of grass high enough to be used to conceal their movements.

Presently those in the advance could catch sight of four figures seated on the edge of the bank at the spot a place where the water extended. Back of them a good sized camp fire smoldered as though feeding upon good sized logs that had been thrown upon it some time before. One did look like a Hen condit but they could see he was too broad, and the others no doubt were Dargar and Starling. There was another boy with them in civilian clothes, and some like imagine imagine the thrill that passed through Penrod and his sisters and those other boys and two girls, when they saw that it is out to be a fact (go sit on a tack).

Pretty soon as they looked that saw that the smaller boy seemed to be engaged in industriously fishing, for he had a ude rod in his hand and baited his hook with some worms even as they watched. Their backs were turned toward the scouts so there was no opportunity for the newcomers to open negotiations with the four who should they want to.

And now at catching their backs at rifle more they soon made another discovery. There appeared to be only one man in the case, and he was lying on his back, and he seemed to be asleep, whether he was or not. Apparently the four men made could take things easy and rest themselves, but the slaves must keep constantly employed in order to try to take in something.

that would stay their hunger. It made Timothy G. Novaton and his teeth when he saw this, and Jennie Vivian who was closest to him had to touch him on the arm as well as shake his head warningly in order to convince him that nothing desperate must be attempted. With victory almost in their grasp they would indeed be foolish to ruin things by too much haste. As motions must from this time on take the place of speech Penrod began to make use of a beckoning finger to tell the others what their next move might be. This of course was a further advance. They must continue in some way to push closer to the camp, so that when the crisis came, they would be in a position to prevent any move of the man or the three boys that they might make looking to carry off with them. How whom the rescued little girl told them was her brother. And he did not even know no doubt what had been done with her, thinking probable she had escaped.

All this had been arranged before hand, and each fellow directed by the princesses now knew exactly what part he was to play in the round up. Jennie Vivian and her sister told tales - sister had indeed been warned that it would be up to them to be sure that the smaller boy did not run away, filled with a fear of the consequence, should he be taken, by even boys in uniforms and girls too whom he couldn't tell were friends or not. Advancing in this careful fashion, led by Violet and her sisters now in person the scouts had covered many yards, and were now almost within striking distance of the camp. It was at this particular moment that a sudden thing happened calculated to bring matters to a climax. After all that patient waiting, and the baiting of his hook, the persistence of the small fisherman who in a way as they could see even did not know well how to fish, was rewarded. He was seen to give a quick jerk, and then with a mighty effort throw a far fairer large, shining fish over his hand, almost accidentally hitting one of the other boys on the side of the face.

No sooner had it landed with a thump on the ground and commenced to flop furiously, than the little prisoner gave vent to a cry of delight, such as any hungry boy might utter when he found himself favored with a good chance to break his long fast. The sleeping man jumped to his feet as though at first he thought the Christian soldier had found them out. Gerald Starling himself had struck the poor little boy over the head roughly.

"Look out who you are hitting with that fish care less, or I'll throw you into the water!" and then telling him to get busy again if he wanted a bite to eat for himself because there was only enough in that big fish to take the edge of the appetite of himself and the three others. Tim G. Novaton came very near upsetting a lot of Penrod's plans when he saw this brutal act of the boy, for he started to gain his feet, and had to be pulled down by violence, shivering with excitement. The poor little boy had gone back to his task again looking completely cowed and disheartened. Gerald handled the man the fish, and the way the lad spoke showed though a boy he was in command of them all for he said:

"We've got this fish ready for the four of us and please hurry up." The man taking the fish in his hand, held it up as if you admire its looks, then he stepped down to the water as though preparing to clean the prize without any loss of time... possibly spurred on by hunger.

Penrod again began to advance a foot at a time meanwhile keeping close watch on all that was going on ahead. They had the situation well in hand, the line covering the ground, while the water underneath which was sure to be a quicksand cutting off escape in all other quarters. Even with out those so vicious guns the boys and girls might have proved themselves masters and mistresses of the situation, for clubs could easily serve in lieu of better weapons. As it was Penrod and his sisters felt positive things must go their way. Just then the poor little boy in turn suddenly to reach his supply of bait, changed to see that line of creeping figures of what he at first thought were seven beautiful little angels in human form as girls and a line of uniformed boys and two other girls in uniform on each side of them. Only the seven angelic little girls were not in uniform but in plain white clothing that little Abianianian girls wear. The mingled expressions of astonishment that crossed his face told what a flutter the sight must have brought to his heart.

Penrod instantly put a finger on his lips, and made a gesture warning the little boy not to betray them. The child also caught a glimpse of a man with a rope around his neck, and also a little girl which though not in appearance he recognized to be his sister. Perhaps it was just as well for the poor fellow seemed on the point of crying out in his his mix of joy and fear, fear of the beautiful little girl in the who looked so beautiful to him to seem absolutely supernatural. He did succeed in making some sort of sound that attracted the attention of the man who raised his head to growl.

"What ails you now you young little fool. I'm almost sorry indeed I want to be the bother of staying here and not being you to the Glandelinian camp as I had at first proposed with the three boys here, but as you complaining about I would like to know if a couple of more fishes if you expect to cut off you - hump - the first of the spoils always belongs to us."

"I caught my finger on the hook, that's all Mr Frank," stammered the little boy, and telling the truth too for in his sudden shock of shock of excitement at seeing the pretty supposed to be little angels and the boy and girls scouts he did really do such a thing and badly too.

"Well suck it then," said Gerald standing and get busy doing your work thats all while the man cooks the fish, and perhaps another you may take.
Yes and while you are about it, don't think of praying that our appetite may be stayed with this one for it won't and you'll have a small chance for a bite unless they come in faster than they've been doing."

Well the crisis had passed, and there had been no discovery; but then Penrod was coming very little now. He only wanted to post his troop a shade better so as to cut off all chances of escape, when he intended opening up the game himself, by springing a surprise on the men and the three Glandelinian boy scouts. One thing he did mean to look out for and this was a possible move on the part of the Glandelinian soldier and the three others from laying a hold on the small boy, such a man and the boys too would think first of all how they could use the boy for a shield, while he made terms with the enemy.

It was an old trick, when Penrod had been known to be used with more or less success.

more or less success when up on that Canadian Ranch, where a bad man was occasionally met with, who gave lots of trouble before they were rounded up, and this Glandelinian or his three boy companions might try the same scheme. Two three minutes passed. Penrod did not believe it would be good policy for them to continue to advance any further. He did not wish to get so close to the man and the three little brats that they would by a sudden rush reach them before they were able to do anything. By a low hiss he warned his sisters and the rest that the critical time had arrived when every one were expected to do his own duty.

Then slowly he got up if first on his knees, and then on his feet. Very boy and girl duplicated his move, so that the entire group were now standing there forming a long line slightly inclined to resemble the new crescent moon, and there was the little boy turning his head round around to stare at them, his face at the appearance of violet and her sisters as white as snow as the chalk they were accustomed to use up on the black board in school, his eyes were round as circles while upon his stained face, hope, fear and expectation, almost a dozen emotions struggled for the mastery.

"Hullo there," said friend Orditer called out Penrod, without the slightest warning. The three Glandelinian boys suddenly turned around, and up goes the head of the man who was busy cleaning the fish, if not fresh. When he saw those seven beautiful little girls standing there with a line of boy scouts on each side, and two girls with them, and every one with a dangerous rifle bearing directly on his person, and cowering the three boys as well he was too all appearances at duck dd dump dumb for the moment, his eyes stared and his mouth fell open. Fish and knife dropped from his no longer hands, while the three boys stood in absolute bewilderment, though instantly in the act almost of drawing their own weapons, but saw it would be rank suicide for there was thirty to their four, not counting the nine girls with them.

"Caught by thunderation, and by a bunch of boys and girls at that."
There was a pause but at from his lips after which he started to use some pretty pretty strong language until Penrod put his foot down sternly.

"Stop that kind of talk in the presence of us and my sisters Mr Frank."
he ordered. "We have got the four of you rounded up, and there is no use kicking. If any of you make a move to run or jump this way, we'lliddle iddle you with plenty of bullets do you have ought to do it any way of that you did to this little girl here" indicating the child they had rescued.

This time he had a hold in the bargain Mr Frank, and you three boys mind you," said Tim Goveaton, still talking with indignation as the he collected how they had seen one of the captives cuff the poor little boy, and also of the difficulty they had in rescuing the little girl from the treacherous quicksand, and perhaps deep down in his boyish heart actually hoping the four might take a notion to get away, when they could be justified in adding him with bullets. The three boys looked defiant and scowled horribly at Violet and her sisters but did not make a move to run or anything; as they saw no chance to do so without disaster for Violet and her sisters no doubt would be the first to open fire if they did.

"Oh I guess the jig is up with me kids," said the man with a look of sheer disgust on his face. "I've had a little run for my excitement, but you have the upper hand this time. If you were plain soldiers I would dare to defy you and so would these boys, but so much is said about you kids that it would be a suicide for us to try and make a break. I was a fool to bother with the kid here who happens to be that little girl's brother, you got with you, though how she got out of the hidden creek is a mystery to me, but when the scheme came to us at first I thought it too fine to drop. I suppose it was you kids who rescued her though rescue seemed impossible and here is what, and they get paid for being silly gumps. What do you want us to do boys. I'll obey with as much cheerful alacrity as I can seeing that we are standing to death just now."

"I will stand to the boys next," said Penrod looking coldly on the three.
"First of all Mr Frank, lie down on your face and put both hands behind your head. We are going to tie you up, and then I have something to settle with red neck wooden while we wait for the Chief of paid generals with his poems to come along. They're coming soon, so you get that Mr Frank."

"Sure I suppose I do, and since there is no other choice for me here goes."
"I suppose you fellows must be Christian boys and girls scouts, you are in uniform though. The prettiest little girls are I know not once organized a troop of the same in Glandelinia but never named I'd be interested by the Christian child scout crowd, it's all in a days work though, even though the girls with you are unknown."

"They are the dirty Vivian," began stammering.
"Keep your mouth shut," said sh snapped Penrod with a wicked look in his eyes. "You call them dirty, if all the scum in the world and all the water in the oceans were used on you three brats you'd never be clean out wardly and spiritually."

The man accordingly stretched himself flat on the ground, then they could see that he had held his hands behind his back, and conveniently crossed at the wrists, seven of the boys advanced.

"Keep your guns aimed at him, and the three brats the rest of you."
commanded Jennie Vivian herself, and if he or the three tries any funny business let them have it good and proper. Many months before we thought we were able to bring these three boys to their senses because we thought they were only making a mistake and understood but it is different now. We are true and we are afraid of said boys and our forgiveness. Here Landy you and Tim are good boys, sit on the man while I secure his hands."

The man attempted no resistance, for he realized the folly of it. He was one of those kind who would never let soldiers take him alive, but he had a heart for boy and girl scouts that was almost paternal and the appearance of violet and her sisters appeared like little accusing angels to him. He did groan however, when Landy squatted down on his legs, and the other fellows could not help but blame him for running. It was like a big load of bricks to him. The job was quick and neatly dispatched, Jennie wrapping the man's hands many times around the wrist of the prisoners. By this time Frank as his name was seemed to have recovered his nerve and made out to consider the whole thing more in the light of a big joke than anything else. Meanwhile there was the small boy standing nearby and he hardly knowing what to look delighted at seeing one of his cruel "bosses" tied up, and the three other also prisoners, to show the despicable fear that was gripping his soul as he contemplated what must follow.
That at duck him most was the rear nose of the seven little girls standing there and he was afraid to come forward and very shy of them too though his little sister was near his side.

"Cheer up little boy," said James Anderson, stepping over to grasp his hand, but to his amazement the poor boy immediately broke down, and began to sob as if his heart were broken.

"You don't know the worst that's what," he said plaintively. "That man sent a letter to my father saying I ran away and stole his money, and even wrote to the Christian general I killed some body so that, wouldn't dare be taken if I did escape. I've never had no peace of mind since he told me that. He told me if I didn't do as I was told he would kill my little sister and I've just had to even when I felt sick enough to want to lay me down and die."

"What's this confounded man you've been giving to the boys father?" He Frank? "I heard Penrod steal money, and he faced the man who with his hands tied behind his back had been popped up against a convenient tree. The man looked at Penrod and then burst into a loud laugh. "I know there was a soft spot when we captured him and his little sister at day," he said. "And I made up my mind I'd work him for a while. He did not steal any money from his parents, but it was the way we wanted to cover up our escape from the Christian lines. On it was almost too easy when I wrote that letter to his parents knowing their address. I was all alone when I set up that clock gaze on him, waiting for his father. That the boy had actually killed an Argentinean officer and that the soldiers were looking all over for him. Oh indeed it was almost too easy I'll say again. He did just what we wanted him to. It was I who stole the money out of Padre Vivian's Vivians headquarters. You'll find every cent of that money in my pocket pocket because I never had a chance of a chance to spend any of it. That's all, now you understand how the silly fool."

The little boy had listened to this with that look of abject pain in his face. Then with the substance of the man's confession dawned upon his mind he began to show fresh interest that at once another emotion, that of wild hope to swiftly take the place of despair on his countenance. "Oh do you mean then Mr. Frank, that you wrote a letter to me? Please oh please tell me you didn't yet send that letter and I'll forgive you for every thing you've done to me," he begged.

"I wrote the letter, but never had the chance to send it off in the mail and when I did, I found I had lost it in the swamp," the prisoner truthfully told him. "I had other comrades with me but they escaped and are bound for the Glandelinian camp. I'd have joined them only I didn't want to pull up until I had stolen some important papers; and I thought there ought to be some pick-pickings for a close-up in Padre Vivian's headquarters in Pando. I didn't want the old money, but you'll find an important despatch between the dollars which I discovered there without knowing it. That's where I made my one big mistake. And now I'm going to be compelled to take my medicine. That's all from me you hear. Only, say kid, you are lucky to have such a fine lot of angel girls and boy scouts to help you out of a bad scrape."

"I can hardly believe it is true," muttered the little boy helplessly as he looked around him at the serious faces of the boy and girl scouts. "Just seems to me as if I had awakened and found it only a lovely dream."

"Well it isn't just the same little boy," said Jennie Vivian herself as she swung the other's cold hand as though it had been a pump handle, and she the honest milkmaid. "The money's been recovered and every cent of it and there is a reward out for the capture of this gent here and the three boys," she looked severely on the latter who broke away from a Christian camp with this man with a pair of hand cuffs on his wrists which he must have filed off weeks ago up in this same swamp. And you'll get the reward and may share it with your parents."

The boy looked very awed indeed as she looked at him, and though he said nothing so great as his feeling as he sister came around him he thought something which she could read through his mind and he sister too. "But I didn't do a single thing to get them, and that wouldn't be fair," and now the boy had his arm linked in that of Penrod upon whom he seemed to lean in this dreadful crisis of his young life.

"Didn't hey," said Violet. "I guess you loved him along, then again helped helped to blind their eyes which were put noisily close and close. Evidently you were part of the reward little boy."

At hearing that unique remark, Gerald staring himself burst into a hearty laugh. "Evidently that boy having made up his mind that he was going back into the clutches of the Christian camp, could enjoy a good joke as well as the next one, he undoubtedly was a sort of a devil's backside sort of Glandelinian boy any way."

"That's fine for you an Abbeurian Princess," he told Violet, turning theascal on is a good one. That poor little brat was too easy for us to work, so he fell into our trap as soon as we pulled the string. Why had as we were we felt ashamed of ourselves sometimes, it was like so much to king on him candy away from the helpless baby. But he isn't a half bad sort of boy and let's hope this'll be a lesson to him never again to throw stones at us. We are as human as any one else and have our own feelings."

"Yes, and you wouldn't have any feelings for us," said Violet. "We had hopes once to be able to convert you boys and bring you to your common but all our words were wasted on you and your two companions. But I'll admit I don't believe you're as mean as Fred Wicklowden. There is something noble in you even though you are one of our worst enemies."

"If you and your sister would remain home and keep out of this squabble we would not part you," said Gerald.

"Our country is as much at stake as you claim you are," said Jennie herself. "We have a right in the army more than you have in yours because you are in the thick of the cause and you know it. But don't speak to us again. We don't like to talk to such boys as you."

Having made sure that the desperate spy character whom they only knew as Frank, and the three boys could not escape, the boy scouts built a jolly fire, and proceeded to cook something, while the little girl who had been in the quick sand was made to stand near it to dry her clothing. The little boy himself was so savagely hungry they had to lead him away while the meal was in preparation. He vowed he was dreadfully tempted to jump in and devour his food raw. And when a good supply had been made ready, the scouts did not forget to feed their five prisoners, who certainly seemed to enjoy it very much.

"I'll even you a Christian dog you boys are a great bunch after all," he told the child as he out leader who was looking after his necessities in the line of food. "And after all I'm not so very you were the ones to get me if it had to be, and the boys either the wild new-fangled myself if the soldiers had gotten me for I'd have fought to the last bullet, and turned the gun then on my self."

You see before then the man had guessed that Penrod and also James and was must have spent some time out West in the American country, from various things he had heard mentioned. Indeed he had asked plainly if such were not the case, and as he had shown to be a sort of more humane Glandelinian than his three companions Penrod had told him something, and afterwards he told the scout leader a few interesting things connected with his own checkered career. His real name he did not reveal, but he knew, for he was not a born Glandelinian but a foreigner and had come of a good family, which he would not wish to divulge. He admitted that he had every chance in the world to make a mark in the line of law or the ministry and had even been a professor at one time in a college, but some how a love to serve in the Glandelinian army dragged him down until finally he did so assuming another name where he was not known and commenced his service in the Glandelinian ranks."

All this time Penrod had not spoken to any of the Glandelinian boys scouts. They were not tied up like the other Glandelinians were, but they were watched so closely that to try and break out of the strong ring of the total forty-four child scouts would have been a rash suicide.

For a time Violet, and also the sisters were surprised and wondered exceedingly why Penrod had said nothing at all to the three Glandelinian boy scouts. That after all he had not make any other remarks to Fred Wicklowden who still had his disguise that made him look like penrod. Penrod however did not so much as look at either of them as he prepared supper, and though the prisoners got their share, the boys and girls you must remember got their share first and all they could eat. Then the prisoners did get their share, Penrod did not give the best out, and did not serve them himself. The man himself told the scouts to take a lesson from his blasted career, and not ever enter the enemy's lines for any spying intentions, though they hardly knew whether he really meant it or not. Tim Grovaton was constrained to say, was "talking through his hat."

The camp fire was kept burning and fed with more or less green wood in the hope and expectation that the thick clouds of black smoke thus formed might draw the tracking posse to the scene the more rapidly. Evidently they did not appear and finally in a sarcastic tone of voice Fred Wicklowden said:

"Well if we are prisoners what are we hanging here so long for? Take us to camp if you're going to. Are you kids afraid to do it?" To his surprise and chagrin no body answered though Penrod gave him such a scowl that he was turned away from turning his face away.

It was almost two hours before the ones they were waiting for arrived which seemed to indicate that probably Walter Starling might not be quite as expert at following a trail of boys and men, as some of the other scouts were. Great was the astonishment of Jack Evans and his men when upon approaching the fire by slowly creeping up they discovered that at the about it were thirty scouts and nine girls, adding Penrod and even he recognized in the sad bedraggled figure a little boy they were looking forward to rescue. Violet too, and the rest at one place seated in the midst was a prisoner with a rope tied around his neck and held at the one end by two boys, and there seated with his back against a tree and his hands and ankles tied securely bound scout fashion, was another man they wanted, and seated in the midst of them was the three Glandelinian boy scouts. The Glandelinian prisoner seated against the tree G. G. greeted their coming and the look of amazement on Evans' face with a look of amusement.

"Bette's late than never," he called out. "While you were sleeping over it, these smart boy scouts, and angel girls as they were called did the business and took us in. All the cold cash that was taken from the King's headquarters has been recovered to the last cent, and I will soon explain how I forced the silly boy Han to write that letter, when it was really me who stole the money. So don't blame the kid for that for he is innocent. He had his lesson chief."

Penrod thought it was pretty handsome of Frank and he did not hesitate to tell him so. He could see that the man was a strange mixture of good and evil though it seemed that bad elements were on top.

The prisoners were hastily given over to Jack Evans and his men except Fredrick Lowden for Penrod looked menacingly at the bad boy as he said; "I'll keep that snake. I'm going to take plenty to him when the proper time comes."

"Bette - not keep him with you" said Jack Evans. "You can have it out with him when he's safely in camp."

"I guess I'll accompany you back with them" said Penrod.

As there was no need of remaining any longer in the swamp they started. To leave Johnny Green himself said he would go back and take the two skiffs out, towing one behind him. Late on he would come and mend the new boat by fetching a good plank of wood to replace the one that had been staved in by striking a log at full speed.

"Hope we see you again at you - from Johnny," called out Jennie Vivian after the bound boy.

"Yes and we won't forget that clever chicken thief trap of you."

Added Tim "The one that caught three Glandelinians at one time. By the way Fredrick Lowden, here's something of yours that we found. You are my enemy but I don't keep things belonging to you nevertheless."

"My knife with the buckhorn handle," exclaimed the boy holding it thinking that if Jim would give it to him he may have a chance to use it to gain his freedom. "I missed that and I thought I would never see it again. Where did you pick it up Master Tim?"

"Huh you dropped it from your pocket once up on a time when you were near the men whose heads were some higher than their heads. That helped to give us some clue and there fore we knew that we were on the right track up here near the forbidden Swamp. Next time you are chicken hungry Master Lowden, bottom up your pockets, you never know what is going to happen these days."

Fred turned fiery red, and then laughed in a confused fashion.

"Well," he said boldly, as Tim still retained the knife "All of us were terribly hungry, and since I'd jumped in to my neck you know, an inch further I did not seem to mind. I suppose that is the way with all boys who go to the bad, the first step leads to another until they don't care a much what becomes of them. But are you going to give me the knife?"

"I'm going to retain it until I see fit to give it you" said Jim Outtily. "You may take a chance to use it on some of us as we don't trust you."

The other little boy who was rescued then hugging his little rescued sister said;

"Oh I'm sure hugging my little sister to know she had been rescued, and to also know it is all going to be like only an ugly dream now, that I don't owe you fellows and you little angel guardians. All my life I'll remember it."

Once out of the swamp with the prisoners, and they were soon at James' Jennings place. Here it was found that the chief general and his posse had come in their own magnificent horses. The boys and girls took to their own horses where they had left them but Penrod warned Evans that there was no need of haste.

"We prefer to take our time, Evans" said Penrod, after consulting with his companions and sisters especially like as not as it is getting dark now there we will make camp and have a jolly night of it, a living to the camp and then into the city before sundown again. But I'll send one as a courier to tell the generals and fathers too that we are on our way and expect to turn up some - late."

The scouts did with the Vivian girl as guardian, and the prisoners did camp that night in a wood along side the road. Fortunately the weather proved very kind to them. Jennie Vivian herself said the "wind was tempered to the shambles" by which she undoubtedly meant that since they had no tents or blankets or blankets it considerably did not turn cold because no doubt of the big fires still swamping the country, nor were they caught caught out in a heavy rain or thunder storm. This outing and with prisoners in the midst proved to be a fine one.

They had all passed through a novel experience when exploring the depths of the mysterious Forbidden Swamp, and Bette still had managed to save their poor, mistaken comrades from a fate, the very thought of which would often make him shiver even when months and years had crept by. He had saved a little girl from quick sand, and her mother too from the possession of the foe. They had a great night of it there in camp. The little boy and girl tried to forget for a time what they had faced, and joined the boys and girls in their songs, as they sat cross-legged around the cheerful blaze. Violet and her sisters were had the most beautiful little voices, for singing, and even their worst enemies the three boys listened enthralled as they heard them, and felt almost half sorry they had been so mean to them; but then their country's wicked cause got the best of all other feeling and they remained obdurate. Too for the Too for the scouts and also the girls there was no longer any necessity for repressing their childish exuberance, for the gloomy dangerous swamp had been left behind not was there any hiding Glandelinians to take alarm. So they laughed and talked and sang to their hearts content, even the men joining in at times. Even Lady Amy helped out with his fine boyish tone. The morning found them as active and after breakfast they all again started on their way with the prisoners. None of them were in a hurry and it was really about the middle of the afternoon when the expedition entered the outskirts of the Christian camps surrounding the territory of Pandora city. The news had been of course widely circulated, and every body within camp at that entrance was on tip toe filled with excitement and watching for their arrival with the prisoners.

A great crowd of soldiers and boy and girl scouts had collected to greet them, and there were several militia bands and one of them played a solemn tune which some of the scouts believed must be "The conquering hero's come," though none of them felt quite sure of it, and then the other band took up the "Abolition National Emblem March." All before the three boys were taken in hand by Penrod. He and Conditte's innocence was proved, and Jack Evans was a awful sorry for him, and also shocked when he heard all about the terrible time the rescued little boy and his sister had, and Penrod and his chums made it a good point to see that the story was justly and widely circulated and the balance of the scout troop sided to the best of their ability, for when was wall liked. The consequence of all this was that most people decided that it was a good capture when the three Glandelinian boy scouts had been released by the Christian scouts. Besides it gave a moral lesson to hold up before the town Boy and Girl Scout leaders a fine moral lesson to hold up before the town followers how to always recapture a runaway prisoners, and hence for a long time to come the narrow escape which Men Conditte had was also used as a means for all boys and girl scouts to become watchful for the doings of foe spies. In this way it did doubtless much good if that could be any satisfaction to them. Up Violet and her sisters wondered whether Penrod was going to take the three boys into Pandora and then have it out with them or Fred Lowden, or whether he would do it in the camp. All this while Penrod had never spoken to the three, not so much as even gave them a look and this coldness on Penrod's part froze the three more than anything else.

When they were finally within the heart of the main Christian lines Evans acting under the boy prince's advice then finally halted the column and asked him what he desired to be done with the prisoners. "Take them all away" Penrod said, "except Fredrick Lowden. I understand his name is Prince Penrod, instead of me" he added with a sneer, and he said his son Bepero Vivian would be very glad to see him. Evans bowed respectfully and led the other prisoners away. Lowden remained with Penrod, his sisters and the boy and girl scouts. James looked disadvisedly at Lowden as he said;

"Prince please do me a favor will you?" "I sure will for what you have done for my good little sisters." "He answered putting James lovingly on his back. "What is it?" "I would ask don't dirty my father's house with that snake please." Violet and her sisters if they died horribly for it could not suppress giggles and Lowden turned red in the face, and scowled at James. "I see" said then Violet when she could put on a serious face "Not even for Eugene we have any use for you, Lowden. It's your fault. You have brought it on you - self."

"And don't worry" said Penrod to James. "Bepero Vivian wouldn't have him brought in. He'll meet him outside. Forward boys, and remember I hold any of you here responsible for the escape of this prisoner. Don't hesitate to shoot to kill if he tries anything. Shoot first and explain afterwards. It's my motto. I prayed hard for this day and the prayers were answered. Into the city with him."

After the long tramp through the swamp and from the swamp within the last twenty-four hours, and because of the singing and talking of the scouts way into the night, Lowden had not been very much rested, and also had not even given a horse to ride on all the way either. When the city had been reached, the child scouts were going without horses, and in the streets plenty of street cars running, Lowden had expected that the scouts would take a car, so that he could rest his weary feet, but instead of doing to they proposed to go to James house on foot, claiming it was not so far away to them, though of course to tell the truth it was some thirty-seven blocks.

The fact was too not a scout of them had a cent in his pocket, and they wouldn't use the money recovered from the safe, belonging to James father. After some distance had been covered Lowden complained of being sore on his feet and all Penrod said then was:

"You'll ride if you got money enough on your person to pay for all of us. If not you'll have to hoof it. We are not going to stop now. You brought this on yourself. Remember when you so treacherously betrayed Jennie to the enemy after disguising yourself to look like me you sure showed no consideration to her. We are broke."

Lowden however had only three cents, but he complained of; "You have a thousand dollars on your person, you sign boy. You could use that sure enough."

"I'll not use my father's money for car fare without his permission for you sake, even if he didn't object," snapped James. "If the others and the girls wish to ride the rest of the way then I'll pay car fare. It won't hurt you to work your feet a little. We only got thirteen more blocks to go."

"Only" meaning, Lowden. "Have a heart and let me rest or take a street car."

James looked at Penrod for a moment but he couldn't help feeling a little sympathy for the prisoners but Penrod said:

"It's up to my sisters. Remember it's your father's money not ours."

"But one of you could replace it," protested Lowden looking at the Vivian girls for the first time in his life beseechingly.

"Shall we do it?" Jennie didn't say it would thought it to her sisters for they could read their own thoughts as well.

Violet then looked at her sisters and then at Lowden, and then said; "Of course we ought to sympathize with the poor fool, and it was foolish of us to forget to take a little money with us, but under no conditions can we or will be spend a cent of James money when it belongs to his father, and I won't let him do it either, even if we could replace it. But we'll see if we can't get a cart of some kind from some one then and let Lowden ride in that."

It seemed for some reason or other that the angels did not seem to be with them that time, because they met said said said failure.

Every body looked at Lowden who had a cart and curly said "no."

"Another said. "On he is tired on his feet is he? What is that to us."

"Let him walk," princess said a second. "A little blisters on his feet won't hurt him. He did you no good."

"But the luck," hissed Lowden. "Every body is against me?"

"It certainly isn't our fault," said Violet.

"If you are possessed of angels as they say," growled Lowden, "they should help you out."

"Not in your favor; don't suppose they won't and why should we ask them?" said Daisy.

"Be patient and you'll be better off," said Angeline almost viciously. "Your soul is more important than your tired feet."

"But can't we sit down and rest a couple of hours?"

Jennie looked at her sisters, and then they glanced at Penrod.

"No what you angels make you feel like doing," said Penrod.

"No what you angels make you feel like doing," said Penrod.

"It's a good penance for you," said Tim. However it seemed that the angels didn't assist for Violet and her sisters seeing only thirteen blocks to go were certainly going to continue now, having delayed enough in vain trying to get a cart, the first time in their lives being refused anything by their friends, but that did not make them feel bad. It was only because their friends did not want to accommodate Lowden, having heard plenty of him.

So Lowden had to hoof it along even if he had to stop before he got there but finally after half an hour of more or less he finally felt relieved when Violet said,

"Well we are there at last. Sit down on that curb, Lowden and rest until my brother fetches out our father. He'll be sure glad to see you."

"What is he going to do to me?"

"How should I know," said Violet with a shrug of her shoulders. "I ain't in his place. But why should we worry. You didn't worry about any of the other good people and us. We'd forgive you but you won't repent. You and your companions are the biggest fools an earth. You'll rattle with us, and on what we could do to you if we wished, and would not need to bring you to our father either. We're doing it as it is your easiest way out and you ain't no penitent."

"You wouldn't let me rest?"

"We were not going to delay what was thirty-seven blocks."

Penrod finally came out but without Emperor Vivian. At that moment Jack Evans was seen coming, with Walter Starling, and on foot.

Penrod came up and said;

"Father will be out in a few minutes. James you better go in and replace your father's money."

James then went in to obey for he knew his father would be glad it was so easily restored, and Evans and Starling went in with him. Lowden sat there on the curb very sullen and quiet now, though secretly wondering what had been done with his two companions. He had wanted to take off his shoes to relieve his feet but no one would let him Jennie saying awfully;

"The idea taking your shoes off in the street. You'll have plenty of time to do that where you will be taken."

"You are not so good," he sneered. "You scratched my face up so that the sea is my main and I thought I was blind."

"I'll do it again and worse if you try any more tricks on me like that." she retorted. "I was justified in doing it."

"Be patient and you'll be forgiven," said Angeline. "You have no right to treat us so despite the cause you are fighting for and it's a wicked cause and you know it."

"It ain't a wicked cause."

"It is." And she said it so vehemently that he saw it was useless and fully to argue with her. 2..22

About fifteen minutes had passed still Emperor Vivian did not come out. That however seemed a relief to Lowden who knew that as soon as he did come he would have to stand up no matter how his feet still felt, and oh what he would give to take off his shoes. Still Emperor Vivian did not come, and even now Penrod had not even said a word to Fredrick Lowden not so much as even looked at him.

"I wonder what is keeping father?" asked Daisy.

"When I spoke to him he was in conference with some high generals," said Penrod.

"Why don't you let me go into the yard," protested Lowden. "Why sit out here in the street at rest?"

Nobody answered to him at that question, though James looked as if he was serious, for a time they continued to wait silently and finally as Emperor Vivian did not yet come they decided to change their location and sit some where else where the blowing sun did not hit them so much.

To have to walk in made Lowden angry but there was no help for it, but the distance was only a few yards further, and while they squatted on the fence of James yard, they made him sit near the fence but on the side walk, where they could watch him for fear he might make a break for freedom. But Lowden felt only too sure that that was what some of the boy scouts even wished so that they could have the excuse to pepper him, for boy and girl scouts don't like prisoners and don't usually give a quarter to no one who is of the four sides. Therefore he was prudent not to do anything rash even when at times it did seem almost an opportunity present to do as he wished however that the Vivian girls and the rest showed such utmost patience in waiting the coming of their father. He hoped that he would be long all the rest of the day, which would probably give him some ease but he did not dare say anything for fear that they would be lent of their waiting, and go and see what is wrong themselves. Any one would have thought no doubt that even the fittest forced company of the beautiful little princesses would have turned that boys army hearing after but not so. He had often looked anxiously up and down the street hoping that rescue in some form or other would come, for even had he the opportunity to make a break he could not well succeed, for he was not lying to get out of it, when he said his feet were so tired.

In fact he couldn't have taken a step.

It was all he could do to stand on his feet now. Too he had gone so far in his love for Glendelina's wicked cause, that even the angelic appearance of violet and her sisters did not make the slightest impression on them, in fact he shunned their company and wished he was anywhere else but near them, you know the wicked hate the good.

old Jidna thought he had heard O. P. and would have been so given up that night if he had not wanted of it. Neither is God obliged to forgive any sin if He wills not to and yet He is so merciful that He does. So why should we not also if they are so ready to forgive in our friendship and forgiveness they'll have to do a lot of forgiving for us, for they owe us plenty for what they do to us."

They were soon inside and the four slipped and while they were waiting it from the sounds appeared as if a thunder-storm was coming on, venting its rage in the distance.

"Are you little Princesses afraid of thunder-storms?" asked James. At that question Violet, and her sisters giggled, and some looked out the window.

"You don't know the half of it," Violet said finally. "To tell you the real truth, that is one of the most interesting things of our whole lives. A thunder-storm can't be loud enough for us, and as long as we are in shelter we are not afraid of our kind of violence either, called Typhoons or what else."

"And," said Jennie, "we don't know a number of them too." "I'd bet," said Jennie, "if you want to know one of those American no-madnesses you wouldn't like to again. I did and was injured badly."

"I may say you are right in that if they are such winds as you say," said Violet. "We never have those kind here where there is a long narrow cloud hangs down and pulls every thing away in less than a second's time, not only foolish people are afraid of even the night, and darkness. Only foolish cowardly people tremble or hide in places when a thunder-storm comes on, and shrink at the flash of lightning, and the rain does no more damage at the window if you stand watching one than the rain would be hiding under you, as many people do in dark closets as they do in your room, James. I believe why they are afraid is because their consciousness must be bothering them, and it is very foolish and also cowardly to allow the natural sounds of the night to upset the nerves, disturb mental calm, and bring the cold sweat of fear to the forehead. In fact when we are sleeping within the fire lines, we often found the right was the best friend we had because the darkness allowed us to easily escape while the day time was a too dangerous to try it."

"I have known many persons," said James, "to be superstitious and think of many strange things when an owl hoots at night."

"Yes, that is true and it is only foolish people who may think of so many foolish things when an owl hoots in the wood at night, but nothing really could be more companionable than the friendly call of the owl."

"I used to think many foolish things when I slept at night in woods and the owl came in," confessed Tim.

"You did?" said Angelina. "Why I'm surprised, and you are so brave."

"That's not it," said Tim. "I used to think what I would do to them if they didn't shut up and let me sleep."

They all giggled.

"The owl never bothers me to sleep," said Violet. "We slept once with some foreigner who were friends of ours and a bat flew into the room and those poor people were so foolish and began talking of vampires and said the bat will divide one and if it settles in the hair and speak of it as an animal that lay eggs, and goodness knows what. Only man mostly in foreign countries and that must be because of sin is afraid of night. We have seen ourselves with our very eyes that the thunder-storm sets the cock peepant and even posture as crowing in defiance. The heavy clouds drive the birds home to their nests but this is only so they may shelter their eggs or young, or keep themselves dry and many birds do not like to be wet. Lyn Hens and chickens and other fowl are not afraid of lightning or thunder, though they'll go where they can keep dry. Until the rain actually begins to fall, rabbit calmly continue to nibble grass and other vegetation they like though the thunder-claps split the sky."

"I used to think that day is the safest time," said James.

"Because of the Glandelinians now for you," said Catherine. "Early the night is a safe time for us than day, we learned that from many experiences, though of course it may not be so for some animals that can see in the dark, and we do not need the danger of walking accidentally into a river or a lake, providing it is all water for we sure can swim even against a current. Then we have been escaping from the fire lines so often at night, and we would be on a strange ground, we preferred rather to push our feet forward along the ground with a sort of skating motion, than to walk with the confident free swinging step of the day time. We have even developed the sense of touch to our feet, so that we can feel the way as we go, and are sensible to every crash change of ground beneath us, and that is what we always endeavor to touch out to our boy and Glandelinians, every thing we can do. Then they can save themselves from any foe that tries to shadow them. We can detect at once a change from a subtle to a false, or a wrong path to a sudden road, and an odder can tell as what we are in danger of walking into quick sand or weak horse. Feeling the ground with our toes (so many I own), we never put the full weight of our body on one foot until the toes touch has told us that the going is good, for we are just as cautious as an elephant crossing a rocky bridge. And at the soot of times when we can detect by even small sounds we are surrounded by the Glandelinians and in the darkest places and the tightest corners we were so comforted by the knowledge that what hides our foes if they be only for soldiers hides us. Indeed we being Glandelinians and spies too for that matter, and better still Glandelinians trained in woodcraft, we hold a great advantage over the enemy, we know how to walk as silently as those so called ghosts they often talk about over in the counteries, how to hide, how to hood wink our foes, and even how to shadow, trail and even catch them unaware."

"But if pursued by a foe," interrupted James, "isn't there nothing at all to fear?"

"What is there to fear when you are walking up a dark lane at night?"

"Put how about wild animals," said Tim.

"You know very well there are no wild animals in this country," said Daisy.

"There can be now when the enemy had destroyed all traces and let loose animals."

"That doesn't matter," said Hattie. "We got good toasty guns. People sometimes suffer from nervous attacks when they hear foot fall which come and go mysteriously, and though that will put us on guard we do not fear, and if they are shadowing foes we can hide and try to plan how to surprise and capture them ourselves which we often succeed in doing. Yet sounds of that sort, where foot falls suddenly cease and perhaps a head again at a different place ought to be studied. The solution is likely to be that the person who has the friend or a foe has stepped from a hard road on to soft mud or the grassy ground. If you are puzzled by a sound that comes and goes, and does not come again, and you fear it was a foe shadowing you, the best thing to do is to stand still, crouch down, and put your ear to the ground on a gale post. Then you will hear every thing that is to be heard, especially on a frosty night."

"What would you do if the question if you believe some one you are suspicious of is following you secretly?" asked James.

"Well," said Joiea. "If you have an idea that some one who may be a foe is following you, to no good purpose up a country lane on a dark night, several courses are open to you—thus you may stay and show a bold front, or hide or run away. At running at night is a risky business; and the self confident scout is not usually persuaded to take to his heels. He relies upon his weapons, to climb into a tree and to wait until you follow over his lost trail is a plan highly to be commended. While the darkness that he does a nice possible Glandelinian foe also hides you James, there is also the chance that the sound of your footsteps may betray you. The best is to a foe lying in ambush. Supposing one of us Princesses was obliged to pass up a road alone where he had reason to believe that at any moment some of a band of Glandelinians might appear upon him—what would be the best plan of defense, James?"

"Why Princesses don't you know?"

"Sure but it is best you should know too."

"Why I'm sure I do as I was instructed that way by my scout master in the United States. If I were to walk silently on grass, so much the better, other wise my best course would be to keep to the middle of the road, so that I may slip to one side or the other in case of attack, and to be sure too that I have a good heavy stick handy, and when I can wield it perfectly should I be attacked in the open, and too Princesses if you were the one attacked, and you were wearing a coat, it may serve as a useful weapon, not only of defense, but of attack. It should be worn lightly over the shoulders, the sleeves hanging empty. Then if you are attacked, when seized you may slip away, leaving your coat only in the attacker's hands. Or you may swing the coat at his head blinding and enveloping him for a moment, and this will give a fair chance for a scout staff of walking stick to come into play. A lucky thrust in the body or face is one of the best strokes with stick or staff, and especially with a paracord or umbrell which your little girls usually carry for sun shade on hot days. If weaponless there is nothing more effective than a knockout blow in the pit of the stomach."

"And," said Daisy, "when walking or watching in the country at night, there are sights and sounds which will tell us very early if there is a moving. These sounds and sights at night form an important study, and it is always well to know what sounds are perfectly natural, and what are unusual. The lowing of cattle and bleating of sheep at night to us are usually natural sounds, yet a low head sheep and cattle utter anxious and peculiar lowings or bleatings, which often told us of unusual happenings and made us keep on our guard. I have heard bleated at night, when anybody was passing by the fold a low and queer sound. The sheep may have thought it was the shepherd coming to let them into a new fold, but it warned us we were being followed."

and also when we were in the night going down a road and we have heard suddenly the cattle of some farm lowering, which no doubt proves to us that at any rate we are passing through the field, thinking perhaps he was the man who brought the cattle back, but then we ourselves were ever on the watch for such a noise attacks upon us. This lowering of cattle when uneasy will carry for some than a mile on the air, to give warning to any watcher, that some one has passed their way. Cattle mobbing and pursuing a man and dog make a most awfully howling, once heard never to be mistaken. And when cattle stampede that also is a very sure sign that a dog has intruded on their pasture but probably a dog they are afraid of. A fox on a badge is likely to stampede sheep, who then possibly break out of their fold, and break their legs perhaps in a mad rush over feeding troughs or uneven ground. The passing of a fox at night gives rise to many sounds for any night watcher to interpret.

As the fox goes through the field where the rabbits are feeding, they rush pell-mell to cover, and as they scattle past, you may hear the thudding of their feet like miniature cavalry hoofs. The squeal of a rabbit caught in a snare at night may attract a fox as well as a night watcher, poacher or know this, and that if a fox has once found a rabbit in a snare he will come again on the chance of another. A half a dozen snares have been set, he may take half a dozen rabbits away, so that after one visit from a fox, it is very unwise, as poachers well know, to set the snares again in the same place. Also in winter, the short snappy bark of the fox as he goes about searching for his mate is a common sound of the woods.

When a opening and is haunted by a fox, no fox or human being may cross over the river without arousing the alarm of the birds; not the short cry, a single "peep peewit" which is uttered in the night as they fly in recognition, or to keep the birds of the flock in touch with each other, but a succession of long drawn out plaintive wails. The ever-vigilant peewits are at times some what vicious and will follow the fox on a person and swoop as if to strike him while they loudly wail and scold, and unless you go headlong on your way they surely will and they'll bang you with their wings or peck you in the face with their bills. A watcher standing silently and motionlessly in the woods at night may hear the stilling sound that good pigeons make when suddenly they launch themselves, with a mighty flapping of wings from the trees. Or he may hear the cock peasant's hurled cry of alarm. Either sound means that some one has passed by their roosting place. As the way far acrosses along other birds are alarmed, and give warning, and the watcher who notes the line of it and the line of disturbance, knows where the disturbance has gone, or in what direction he is coming from and make steps accordingly to avoid or meet him. In case in the latter situation he is a friend instead of a foe. There are in our places of our country especially in winter a large family of birds which nobody may pass by unchallenged, the field faeries, those cousins of our thrushes, that comes to us for winter harboring from the far north. Field faeries roost in companies, not scattering themselves all over a wood but haunting favorite parts, go the scout who knows he must pass at night through a wood where field faeries roost, and would pass unchallenged, should be careful to give a wide berth to the roosting places.

The birds only come in from the open fields when dusk gives way to dark; but their roosting places are easily to be noted by day. They love some warm sheltered spot, where the undergrowth is old and so sprouting, and they settle on the top of the undergrowth rather than in the high trees. As in the case of starlings there will not be venting on the bushes and below those signs in the shape of whitish splashes which tell infallibly of the birds that roost above.

We ourselves have come often to the roosting places of field faeries in the woods, and have tried to pass by unchallenged—even crawling slowly and most carefully on hand and knees—but never have we quite succeeded in seeing the birds sitting at roost. Always they have been up and away before we could see them uttering as they went that throaty chuckling as if to tell us they were never to be caught napping. You will never catch a field faerie napping, or a jessal asleep—and there's the call for supper. So's go, and then off to bed for us. We need rest and sleep.

The next morning his sisters still asleep. In fact he could not allow any one to disturb them as it was yet too early for the infant Penrod stepped from the door of the shed, and passed to be busy all morning cleaning his dusty horse and the horse and the horse and the horse, after that wonderful and stirring adventure in the forbidden camp.

"Almost six o'clock," said Penrod, Penrod and thrusting his hand into his breast pocket (not pocket) of his uniform working shirt (if not shirt) he drew out a rather crumpled bit of yellow paper.

"What time did General Vivianenna Ritchee say he'd be here?" Inquired Tim who like Penrod was attired in a business like uniform of working uniform, topped off with an old landolinian uniform hat which he always scornfully wore for duty work, and who was helping Penrod. Penrod who had been busy poring over the telegraphic message inscribed on the bit of yellow paper, read it aloud:

"Prince Penrod, High Tower Headquarters, of National Imperial Army, Pandora City, Calveinia

"Can I see you and your sisters about noon on Monday next. Wish to talk over a new plan with you, your sisters and your Father the Emperor. Wire if you can see me at that time and, will call you. Plan is important. Landolinian armies concerting at Podgie and Podinda on the edges of Big Hill Knoll. Good. Biggest foe armies ever mustered yet.

General Vivianenna Ritchee.

"Podgie, Calveinia."

"Wonder what he can want," mused Penrod in a speculative tone. General Vivianenna Ritchee father of Angelina Ritchee is one of the best known Christian generals in the country. I guess we all ought to feel honored by his wanting to consult with us Tim."

"Indeed you bet we ought to. Wonder what sort of a man he is. I never saw him. I suppose because you are a prince and your dear sisters princesses he may have feared you as may be included to look down upon him as a ordinary officer when he does see us. But hello Penrod!" he broke off suddenly. "What's that off there down far in the road at feet—over there about probably ten blocks away?"

"That speak yonder down the street! It looks like—yes yes—by Gorge it is—it's a horse man of some sort."

"That's what."

A sudden idea struck Tim.

"Say Penrod don't you recall reading about General Vivianenna, and his strange red horse which he named 'Red Hawk'?"

"Yes, I do. Indeed I do very well indeed. He could race any fast horse with it, and he captured the M & M Malton speed and long distance cup in a horse back race with Red Hawk."

"That's right and I'm willing to bet the hole outfit is right out of a doughnut that is the Red Hawk approaching now. Podgie is sixty miles away from Pandora City in that direction, and what is more natural than that General Vivianenna Ritchee should take an up to date way of paying his bill?"

"I do believe you are right Tim," said Penrod. "Let's go in and spruce up a bit and then we'll come out and meet him. But if my sisters are still asleep don't let any body awaken them. They need plenty of rest believe me." However they decided not to go into the house to wash after all for in the room of the barn which housed Penrod and his sisters he saw was a good sized wash room and to this the toys hanted to move some of the game of their morning's work, while they were thus engaged, and the horse man is coming closer since no chance has been yet to make it is a good time to tell something about the house and its grounds. It is so early up in the morning Penrod was always the same wide awake good looking brother of violet and her sisters, and was now well known for his achievements of success. The name of Penrod was becoming one of the best known in the world to say along the line of his chosen field of endeavor, and dreamed by the foe. Tim too almost as bright a lad but not so good looking, with a tough fighting face and taller, was like Penrod, having a family but his sisters and brother were too young to be boy and girls. His father James Grovetonia was in command of an army too. James home on account of it had a good high tower got the name of high tower being James father's estate, and was located on genteel street in Pandora City. It was a fine old place and consisted of a big rambling house, of mansion shape set in the midst of oaks and alms with unusually broad lawns stretching on every side.

But the most interesting feature of the place also was a big lake near a park also owned by Mr. and Mrs. a group of shops, work shops and medical laboratories in which Doctor and Mrs. usually worked at times when not busy with patients. Though only friends, and fast friends by now Tim and Penrod were more like brothers born to each other than friends. Tim was unusually fond of violet and her sisters, in fact he loved the

"That I'm suspicious," said Penrod. "And they are the very last things I want sneeping around the shed trying to find out about our heroes."
"Which reminds me," said James. "That Zackie Peke-ton spoke of some unusual horses once to me that would surprise us. Wonder what kind they can be?"
"Give no idea," began Penrod, and then broke off suddenly; "as by the way I have, though I do, recall hearing, the last time I was down at Westerville Avenue, that he and Jack had bought some sort of racing horses to ride down the street in to show us off."

"The very thing," said Penrod, "I'll bet it will feel good to be riding home again."

"Yes I want to get some copper wire and some bolts for something that went loose on the carriage. After that we can take a horse back ride into the Christian armies beyond the city."

"I don't think so," said Penrod shaking his head. "It's coming too slowly for that. Maybe a flock of sheep being taken to the stock yards or ---"

By this time they had almost halted their horses some of them having appeared

It, between the open sat Zuk Zucka, with an awkward look on his face, in the out back behind him was a small pony like horse on which in full reg. in readable sat Jack Gaunde was, encouraging him not the boy scout Jack Gaunde - e).

But Zacks paid no attention. In fact he fell off it and taking all his effort to get up and hurry to manage his odd machine.

"Well what ever else I will do it to won't fly" declared Tim and all the rest of us better stay back the other side and look out for it. I don't believe he has it under control." "Come along here" said Tim and we followed him down.

Indeed it didn't appear so. Zacks would now be seen standing with his arms crossed and the motor of the odd machine gave out a continuous volley of sharp reports as that I couldn't make heads or tails out of house windows.

report that I would be by [redacted] [redacted]

"Get you who was out of the wood. Get you who was out of the wood. I can't control this thing. I'll run you down."

"How ray. That's it. Zucker. You're flyin'." shouted Javk Jack enthusiastically. Of course it is very doubtful if he would have cared to change places

The sentence was never completed. As Tim uttered it Zacke gave a wild

"If he is still alive, it will be the fault of your silly friends those girls," shouted

"Why you fools got in to my way and made me lose control of my flying machine.
 took it back in a real voice.

"I hope you are not badly hurt back," Zuckerman said. "Take a starling, in a mild tone."

"It's all your fault you got laid out on horse back," he roared. "Think you can make me take it because you are so prett' pretty. I'll get even with you." "You can't," she said. "You just see if I don't."

"Don't talk nonsense" said Walter Starving quietly. "It had nothing to do with me. I was as good dead that is what the trouble was. You are not re: 14. J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Washington, D.C., to the Honorable Earl Warren, U.S. Supreme Court Building, Washington, D.C., dated 10/10/54, regarding the whereabouts of his craft, "Well, Mr. boy scout you just mind you" (indicating James "

"Spying on you. Well, so like that," said Sam, with a half-lighteous indignation, and his eyes flashed. "Who was in our shed this morning looking around to see what you could see. I would like to know."

beside Za che "I tell you of 'la what" "I went up reading up a good mind to-to" --"
"What to what?" said Tim Govevoria. "wading judgment in his la -n.
"What to what?" said Tim Govevoria. "wading judgment in his la -n.
"What to what?" said Tim Govevoria. "wading judgment in his la -n.

parties in that machine, we paid a bit of a fee for it, and we had a good deal of it." and James said, "I was not expected to do that, but I did it."

"Hate - know - I - all" pulled Zuckerman's mouth. "I mean you know the only to all these. I have been able to make no other friends all of you.

Violet and her sister were the first to get up at about nine o'clock and they hastily awoke Penrod, and even while putting on their shoes they

It is still raining hard and I'm afraid we will not good time. We'll have to wear out long rain clothes to keep from getting wet."

"Well," said Evans jokingly to the little girls, "on a little angel who can't fly over a"

"He may have to," was the rejoinder, "if we can't get across any bridge we'll have to use some airship."

"Why not use the big one Violet captured?"

"We will send for it if we need it."

"Why not use it now?" proposed Penrod. "Then we can get there in a hurry. We can just to make a thrilling scene run it through the city without rising till we get to the county."

"But we'll have to use our noses till we get into the camp," said Joyce.

"That's a go."

"At some times there is a danger of traveling in an airship, and in a storm," said James.

"Not with us there ain't," said Jennie. "Remember what we saw. Don't get afraid. Nothing will happen. I know it."

She was mistaken, however. They would soon have to rescue some one as we will soon see which if they did not use an airship would have been a sad day for that poor child. Jupe to his unspeakable disgust was left behind, not that he cared for the trip but that he so liked the company of the little girls but he must stay behind and guard the place. There was plenty of room for the girl and boy scouts to go. He stood waving a good bye to the party as they skimmed off on their horses. They met with the scouts and then headed for the out skirts of the city and the camp. The road to the camp was a very good one, and they were able to make good time over it on horse back. At this rate of going even through the rain it was not long before they rode through the outskirts of the city, beyond which was a bridge crossing the big river of the county. Angeline Vivian was ahead of the others with little Jennie when all at once Jennie noticed a sign nailed to a tree at one side of the road:

"DAN GER BRIDGE IS DOWN.!!!!!!!"

Jennie signalled to the others bringing the column to a stop.

"What are you going to do now?" asked Evans, after they all had gone in another direction and were about to prepare for entering the huge airship.

"Why if bridges are down that does not matter to me," said Violet. "It will only be striking me that this is a mighty good time to test out the airship."

"By ginge you are right," agreed Tim. "It's get busy at once."

"I hope it still works as good as when I operated it when I captured it from those Glandelinians," said Violet.

"I hope so," rejoined Penrod. He bent over the valve with the purpose to admit a little more gas to the big airship bag, and him at the same time as the others were entering the cabins adjusted the gas pressure so that the radio lights would make the volatile vapor on which they depended to rise from the earth. A hissing sound presently ensued and the indicator on the gauge showed that all was ready to let more gas into the bags which were only half full. As the gas rushed into its container the bag started to round out more and in fifteen minutes began to again assume the huge cigar shape. Before it became too buoyant however, they secured it to the ground by the anchors of the tip lines of which were led on board. Then the work of filling went on, and soon the huge thing was tagging at her bounds.

"All right," announced Penrod, after a while, and they prepared to cast off.

But as they were about to pull up on the tip lines and release the big round anchor, there was a sudden commotion on the road behind them. They looked around and saw a farmer coming in a large wagon drawn by a horse that looked like he did not know what real hunger was. Yet the horse was caring about and evidently objected to coming close to the big thousand foot long structure-half house cabins and immense long circular shaped bag that was drawn up in the road in front of it.

He was a foreigner too but a good man nevertheless.

"Now then, you obstreperous creature," shouted the farmer, getting out and hitting him on the nose. This done he came rapidly toward the boys and girls and then to him--extreme demerol.

"What about under the sun be ye this year centurion?" he demanded, gazing gazing curiously at the big long balloon bag which was so immense in size and then at the Vivian girls whom he thought were human angels brought down from heaven in it.

"It's a sort of big flying machine," rejoined Tim, while Violet and her sisters despite their greatest efforts hardly could repress an inclination to giggle, "didn't you ever see one before?"

"Waal, ya'as, I seen one at China Fair, but it was n't nuthin' like this ya'as. This ya'as a monster."

"If you'll wait a minute you'll see us fly," said Penrod. Penrod but the farmer didn't seem to hear him for his eyes were riveted on another notice on the camp road concerning the bridge.

"Gosh all humbuck," he exclaimed in a very coked tone, "if that ain't jest ter speakin' kind of luck. I suppose the crack has swollen from the rain and the old bridge had busted at last. Comma'n it all."

"Is not there any other bridge?" asked Jack Evans himself.

"Ya'as but it's bout a mile further down and a roundabout way to get there, and I'm in a hurry. Ya'as Betsy Jane is mighty sick and I'm goin' to the doctor."

"Where does he live?" asked Tim, imagining that Betsy Jane must be the farmer's horse or mule.

"Cross the creek a piece. Comma'n it, what am I goin' to do?"

"Tall you what," said Violet herself. "We will take you over in our ship and bring you to you and the doctor back. You can leave the poor horse tied there."

"What me ride in that contraption? Not but what it's mighty good of ye little angels to offer it--but--"

"If it is safe for us little angels it ought to be safe enough for--" you," remarked Jennie Vivian.

"By heck that's so. Waal since you little angels are so j kind, I dunno if I care of I do. By gum, won't the folks stare when I tell 'em I've rid in a big bag airship?"

"But this is no aeroplane as aeroplanes," objected Angeline, who was a stickler for facts. "It's a dirigible."

"Don't see if it's digestible or not, so long as ye don't spill me out," was the rejoinder.

"On you'll find it very digestible all right," chuckled Daisy. "Come on, come on climb in!"

"Hunk Walsh is my name little angels."

"Well then Hunk Walsh. Put your foot on that step. That's it. Now then we are in the cabin. Are you all right?"

"By my bean poles. This is as comfortable as my parlor chair--hum." remarked Hunk Walsh with a tug at his gray goatee, as he sank into the softly cushioned tesselated of the airship cabin. He lay luxuriantly back and drew out a small anivary dirty corn cob pipe. Before the boys and girls could observe what he was doing he struck a match. At the sound of the "Lucifer", Jennie Vivian herself who was preparing to up anchor, turned like a flash. In a jiffy she had grasped the astonished farmer's wrist and sent both pipe and match flying out the cabin window into the road.

"Dam gas it all little angel girls. What did ye do the t f'?" expostulated the indignant farmer.

"Because that enormous bag above us holds fifty thousand million cubic feet of inflammable inflammable gas and we don't want to go up before we get ready," snapped out Jennie.

The farmer turned very pale.

"By gum and I was going to take a smoke. Big bag full of fire--big blow up."

Say young fellows and angel girls, I guess I'll--"

He was preparing to clamber out, but Jack Evans shoved him back into his seat. "Sit where you are and hold tight please Mister Farmer," he exclaimed.

"All right Jennie dear. How away. Ah up they come. We're off. Off for a grand ride with seven precious little angels and--"

"They let me out. Let me out. By gosh this is too de-n rich for my blood. I--"

Farmer Walsh, pale and trembling peeped out the window of the cabin and then sank back with a gasp. The earth lay several scores of feet beneath him and the distance was rapidly increasing. The buoyant buoyant gas which filled the container had raised the big airship so swiftly that it had seemed literally to "flash upward, and the propeller made a loud booming noise.

Below was spread the panorama of the country side, patches of woods, the vast assembly endless christian encampments, fields fenced pastures, farmhouses, and the big city of Pandemonium from that height they could plainly see the ruined blazing and the angry turbulent waters of the swollen current that had washed it away. All at once their passage had a flash shock. Tim connected the engine with the propeller and the big airship began to forward.

Soon they were flying above the swollen stream and looking back they could see the road by which they had come and the vast encampments and the farmhouses now kicking and plunging furiously at its halter ropes.

Dr James Batzermann, Physician and Surgeon."

Star - 1176.
"So they do," said James Andrews and look-- what that that--? Sure, ly a balloon they are sending up. And a big one, too."
And sure enough as he spoke, the boys and girls became aware of a huge dirty looking sphere with black smoke rolling from its narrow mouth... It was still tied to the ground apparently, but even as they watched there came the sharp report of a snorting cannon. Instantly the balloon was released from the dith, and shot up toward the sky very quickly... swelling and carrying the smoke out of its inflation was plainly judging by the smoke from its mouth by not admit the big balloon too in fact seemed to form some sort of unusually occur unusual occurrence to those on board the ship, and looked like one of those that as a common enough feature of small traveling shows...2

"I'll come as close as I dare," was the reply. Below, far below---the crowd of Gleadoliuiana, with arg-ry ups upturned faces watched the maneuvering of the jet aircraft. The fact that it looked like a

While the relationship still moves on above the two officers who had so long vil-alarms.

SECRET

"But surely if you replace a re really hidden in a safe place and you know your intentions by heart you have nothing to fear on the score of that"

So as a plan, the general opened a door in the side of the steel structure which they had not previously noticed. Violet and her sisters and Angelina looked were the first to enter when they were in the side the general closed the door, and turning a switch caused a flood of bright light to illuminate the interior of the wheel-shaped mine. Violet and her sisters and their companions found that they were standing within the conning tower through the slits they could see out into the sea, but their attention was speedily distracted by General Vivianma. The general indicated a good number of big seats, and invited them all to occupy it. Perrod himself was informed that he was seated in the operator's position, and informed of him was a sort of desk with a white top. This was divided into a number

But the fellow who ever he was kept on without turning his head. And evidently, making for a lane which ran at the rear of General Vivian's head

"I'm sure, but I'm very sorry," said Viviananna, "I'm sure it's a fence which because of some big building, since General Viviananna had no liking for visitors that we were not invited....."

Penrod aimed his pistol but yet he missed.

"He'll have to stop when he gets to the fence," pointed Timbly he can stop."

"Yes and may be he can shoot fight to him," joined James and said, "but I guess we can make him."

"Unless he is armed," said Violet.

"Yes and so we can't forget that," was Penrod's reply.

They happened suddenly that the man whom they were pursuing had no intention of scaling the fence without assistance. He was making for a spot where a number of empty packing cases that had contained apples were piled.

"Fence," he'll escape us after all," exclaimed Penrod angrily as he saw this.

"He's too fast to be killed," said Violet.

Even as she spoke the man leaped the boxes and scrambled up on them.

He could have been in a twinkling over the fence had not the unforeseen happened. The boxes were not piled up as he expected, and he was and from the height of the man one of those underneath was away and he and the boxes fell down with a great clatter, one of the boxes hitting him on the head almost knocking him senseless. When the boys climbed and the boxes they found as soldiers came running up that the man was seemingly if not fatally hurt for the boxes that fell with him were a big heavy wooden things. The man was taken off by the soldiers. General Viviananna with Jack Burns had also been inside the "cave" like subterranean, when the pursuit started, so that they were not aware of what had taken place. Put on emerging from the cave, they missed the other, and hearing then the sound of the boxes falling down came out of the shed to see that had become of them and what caused the noise. Their astonishment of learning of the chase and the injury of the man trying to get away was imagined.

"It is lucky the boxes were so heavy and prevented the man from escaping," said the general. "This plot is dangerous," thought. It must be a most dangerous one and indeed well planned. Do you think he saw very much?"

"Why from that window he must have seen everything," said Jennie, and I noticed too that one of the panes of glass is broken. He must have been able to overcome considerable of our observation. It's lucky for us somebody had been careless in piling those boxes."

"Luckily it was my fault," said the general. "It was I who piled the boxes. If he had not fallen knowing of my trouble he would have told the enemy General. I heard the crash of those boxes and wondered what had happened. Is he badly hurt?"

"One of the soldiers who examined him don't believe he'll live," said Penrod.
"That box that hit him on the head may have given him a skull fracture."

The general overmastering his depression seemed in a more cheerful frame.

"But General Viviananna will fight these spies--yes--yes--to the last ditch-- they shall not steal the invention of this thing if I can help it and make things similiar for their use. If we can catch and powerful Glandelinian enemies and indeed--but I'll give them a battle. I'll have a fierce attack upon their camp--no more--"

"That's the way to talk," said the little girl in cheerfulness and if we can help you to win out with the aid of our little scouts we'll do it. As soon as the great machine can move you can have the laugh on that scoundrel, Gorg of Glandelinian General."

The general's face glowed. He clasped the hands of the two nearest girls imploringly and impulsively.

"I don't know what I can do for you," exclaimed the general. "If only you could make the machine go, I will be under your obligations to you that I can never repay."

"I've heard about thinking, as still we have accomplished what we hope to do."

laughed Penrod in reply. "And so I think we had better make our arrangements to run back to Pando--a to our rowl and my sister will spend this afternoon making out a list of the parts I shall need. I'm afraid that they will be quite expensive."

"I don't mind a bit about the expense," declared the general eagerly.
"If only you can make the great machine go again..."

"The general's face glowed. He clasped the hands of the two nearest girls imploringly and impulsively.

Eight and early the next morning they set about making ready for the trip to Pando. It was a run of seventy-five miles from Pando on horse back and the roads because of the storm just passed were not over good, so they were anxious to get as early a start as possible while they were feeding and saddling their animals, the general came up to them...

"I have a mother mission which I wish one of you would perform for me while you are in the city," he said, and the boys and girls looked up from their work.

"What sort of a mission?" asked Penrod.

"Well you see I've been thinking over the matter carefully. But have you finally been to Pando this morning. I don't want to hinder you from that."

"I've been to the office of the Daily Messenger," said Violet. "Why?"

"Well I have come to a conclusion. I want one of you little girls to take to you--father a model of this big machine, the blue prints, and a note asking him to take immediate steps to have this invention patented for the good invention."

"But I thought he was not ready to patent the invention yet. That you were afraid that by doing so your plans would be foisted," objected Penrod.

"That is just the point on which I have changed my mind. I'm certain now with the help of your angel possessed sister that you can make the big machine go and there is no cause for holding back the patent any longer. I dare not set the model by express for fear that the Glandelinian spy plotter may steal it in some way."

"No, no more send such things by express these days," said Jennie.

"Yes, very well then while you are listening up you work I'll wrap the model up. It will have to be packed quite carefully as it is quite fragile."

So saying the general walked off to his study to get the model, by which he set so much store, ready for shipment. This did not take long as the box which was to contain it was already constructed. Very soon he had joined the child with the package in his hands. Jack Burns who was to do some scouting for the general, accompanied him. There was no need of either one giving any cautions to be very careful of the fragile model for they knew that what ever the child was always handled was always most carefully taken care of.

"It will be safe in Pando as soon as we get there," put in Penrod.

At last all was ready and the model carefully deposited in a small sack that one of the princesses carried. Indeed they only guessed, whom they were soon going to rescue they would have been surprised. Penrod took the lead at his sister's request and the next instant with a wave of his hands the guard of children accompanied by a big body of the girl and boy scouts went off on what proved to be an eventful journey and which was to show how dangerous they really are when trifled with. Little Susan accompanied them.

The little girl had heard so much to go that they had not the heart to be fussy here, and after all as Tim put it she was so gay that she hardly made any difference any way as long as she really could ride a horse, and then too it may lead her now to soon be a scout if she ever decided to be one...

Although there was no necessity for going ahead, Violet, and her sister and their companions were anxious to get their errand accomplished and deponit the model safely in their father's care, for once in his possession, for any one to try and get it was like an unarmed man trying to steal a cub away from its parent the tiger. Then too Penrod was looking forward, on his return, to making General Viviananna's machine practicable. The day was pleasant. The sun shone down hotly, but the boys and girls did not notice the heat as they rode along at not too fast a trot. They passed through Turnerville at a good rate of speed. As they were going forth they did not notice a man with a black beard and a staff carrying little girl aside at another road. But if they did not see him, Penrod did, and he took due note of both.

"There goes that man with some little black hair and girl. I believe," recognize as having seen some where before," he muttered to himself. "Wonder where he is off to now. It might be a good scheme to follow them. I've got a scheme. I'll call up some Glandelinian headquarters I know of, and find out where he is going. It may turn out to be worth while taking after them. By golly, I know now. G--at How come that little friendly black haired girl I met in Abbeville before the disaster? Oh God help me in my plan! I must rescue her..."

In accordance with this resolve, he halted the column before a small hotel and telling them to wait he went inside and closed himself in a telephone booth. Adopting a foreign voice for he could hardly hear him to that of a man he presented himself as "Adeldefob", and gave a description of a man he was pursuing. He asked where he was heading for. The Glandelinian at that head quarters immediately replied that the man had captured a little "Christian girl" and was going to Pando--and thence to 550

"That's that dange rous boy scout Prince Penrod and his tame devil slaves with their crowd," he exclaimed. "You escaped by a miracle. They are terribly bad as dispositions those child scouts."

"They will," said his companion. "Be on your guard Jack. You are in for it and me to. They'll never forgive you. They are invincible."

Both of the two foolish Glandelinians had to laugh as they saw the boy and glider sagged in apparently a confused mass. Crack. Crack. Crack. came three shots, and the bearded man companion fell dead from his horse.

Crack. crack. crack. crack. Crack. Crack. crack. came seven more shots and one of the bullets grazed him in the shoulder and he yelled but he rode on.

He was pale and trembling from his narrow escape, and he had good reason to be so for it is easy to guess that his fate would have been if he had been captured by the boy and Glileon's who usually show no quarter. The little girl with him screamed but he held his hand over his mouth. The thunder of his dead body away. The perpetrator was given up, and he was soon out of sight of them, and met with two more of his companions. Then they rode on.

Before long they came to a point where the road forked. A sign board standing there directed travelers to St Paul five miles, and St Peters three miles..

"I am afraid to go through," said Ann," decided Jak Jack to his companion fellows after he told the story. Those around may have telegraphed to the town and we'll be nabbed there."

"Let's take the road that takes to the right and avoid the town. It's a little way round, longer I suppose, but it's safer. We are beyond pursuit by now."

The highway now lay under a high arch of interlacing tree boughs that met above the track.... It was cool and pleasant, and when they reached a little brook(the gook) the three men decided to dismount and eat some of the substituted sandwiches and pie they had stolen from some Calve indian

Fa-m-e-a They made a mo-ry meal of it the-re unde-r the t-rees, washin' down hei-r lunch with water from a small spring w- which supplied the b-rook. They would not give the little girl a bite though she was hungry. They were just finished and were thinking of resuming their journey, when a sudden sound broke into the stillness of the woodland road, a series of hoof beats like a squadron of cavalry coming.

"They stole body of cava-ly!" exclaimed the man Jack, who readily recognized the sound..

"And they are coming this way too," decided on their companions.
Less than five minutes after the approaching party swept into view. The three Gladiators felt uneasy when they saw the squad march on, for they know it instantly to be the identical damageous Wolf Patrol of the scouts all allayed by the fact that at the head of the column were two girls if recognized by them. The Glundeliners however, were disguised, fortunately for the cause. Hence still, as long as they had in their possession and the little black hat and girl were exposed to full view on horse back, in the water should arise and make an investigation, and there were no case the party should stop and make an investigation. And the other side hope of assisting them as they were well equipped and carried long un-girls back with a threat to shoot if she said anything, but Jack checked him. He knew that their whole chance of escaping hinged on the child. The child was now approaching them as if they were from the child's point of view. He was for counsel both

Tom and Alph to appear composed and warned the little girl, that if she and they meant it too. "If they won't bathe us at all," Jack said, "although it do

"There's a chance they won't bother us at all," Jack said.
look as if they must have followed us from General Vivian's line."

"Easy enough to tell oil on a specialist looking for shoe tracks, and boy and girl foot prints. The Indians can find anything better than Indians can."

He spoke in a low voice though fearful at that moment, the two leaders and a doz others made up along side, and as Jack had been brought here, he brought her to a nt looking Gilascent, who was really the main leader brought her to a nt

1000

... ..

100

1990

"I believe we are on the wrong scene scout," said one of the soldiers.
 "Yes, but what is a man doing among one of the buildings supposed to be occupied only by boy and girl scouts?" demanded one of the boys.
 "They let me in because I was no sick,"
 The boy however returned to the huddled figure of the man on the bed.
 "Did you hear any disturbance here to night. We are looking for two men who entered the place next door and vanished."
 "Ugh-ugh-ugh," and Adcliff was shaken by what seemed to be a paroxysm of violent coughing. "If they are in the next house, why don't you look there."
 "I didn't even hear a sound. No body passed through here."
 "We have but the one's no trace of them" but set out one of the girl scouts. "Are you quite sure you have heard nothing unusual?"
 "Ugh-ugh, cough-cough. Oh my poor lungs. Not a thing my dear girl, not a thing--is that all you want to know?"

"I guess that's all," said one of the other girls, and to Michael Johns she continued. "Are you sure they went in the next door?"
 "Yes, oh yes I'm certain of it. I'd know the house by those large handsome yet peculiarly shaped lower and upper windows. Oh what can become of them. They'll plenty of information to the enemy if they are not caught."
 "Well they're not here, that is certain," said one of the girls, and the rest with almost despair at the disappearance of the three men, they bade the seemingly sick man a good night, and hope you get well, and left the room. But Adcliff did not leave immediately. Instead he lay very still till he was positively sure that the two officers and the child scouts had visited the other child scout dwellings. Then he sprang from the bed and hastened to the panel. In a second he flung it open, and he leaned his friend Mike.
 "Phew!" panted that worthy, as he stepped out into the room, followed by still another person, a prisoner, also of the two a boy who looked more weary begone than the other. "It's like a furnace in the hall. I don't think we could have stood it much longer."

Alph who felt weak and very dizzy from his forced confinement for six hours in the stuffy hole, reeled over to the cot and sank down on it wearily. Then from another secret place the two men brought forth another boy who was unconscious. His body was limp, and his face still white and death like. Adcliff gave a startled look at him.

"He's taking a mighty long time to come to," he growled. "I hope I didn't hit him too hard!"

"What do you mean," exclaimed the other, a rather scared look coming over his own face.

"Why he's a boy scout we supposed you know and if we killed him and it is found he's missing we'll have all the child scouts in C-nation looking for us and we'll never escape as a condition in placed around the city or account of us." "nd-and---- Hark. What's that?!"

Some where below in the house somebody was shouting something at the top of his lungs. That was it indeed that alarmed cry, coming in that high pitched voice, down the hall.

Adcliff stepped to the door and opened it. The cry was plain enough then. It was being caught up and echoed by a score of frightened child scout voices through out the big tenement.

"All right, all right."

On the bottom floor of the tenement an incendiary bomb had been thrown, and it had exploded and splattered all the inflammable stuff all around, and already the flames were spreading swiftly to the stairways.

"We'll have to get out by the roof," exclaimed Adcliff, in a nervous tone. "This place will burn like a haystack once that fire gets a good start."

"That's right. Come on we have no time to lose. He's your man and Adcliff seized the boy roughly by the wrist and began dragging him out of the room. In the meantime he also had dived underneath the bed and secured some sort of an yellow envelope that had been hidden there. Having done this he started after Mike. Already the stairway was full of childish shouts and the acid reek of smoke was filling the hallway.

"Come on we've no time to lose," admonished Adcliff, rushing through the doorway, still holding the boy in an iron grip.

But the boy hung back pleadingly. His eyes were on the other boys whom, which a lay just as it had been flung across the cot.

"At the other boy--you've left him," he cried. "Only you don't mean to leave him behind."

"He's dead, no use carrying him a dead one. Shut up and come on or I'll take steps to make you," was the rough reply, and the next moment Adcliff closed the doorway of the room, and dragging the boy after them the three Glandelinian spies effected their escape from the burning house.

"And you could find no trace of Penrod and his sister no James and a whole lot of the rest!"

"It was the next morning in Emperor Vivian's headquarters, and that great table was seated at his council table with Walter sitting beside him. Walter had just finished telling of the events of the preceding day's exciting night. The last words and his eyes were red from lack of sleep, but the redness of determination in his voice as he replied to Emperor Vivian's query.

"I've told you all the rest to tell Sirs but if Prince Penrod, his sister and two friends are on top of the earth I'm not going to give up the search until they are found."

"That's the right spirit my lad," commented Emperor Vivian but at the same time he appeared to be up against a stone wall. The last you saw of them when they vanished into that house. There is no question in my mind but that probably at the Glandelinian who have harassed you, seized them to protect themselves from the boy and girl scout persecutions. I know by daylight a have often been captured and escaped but this is the first time it happened with Penrod among them and the two others. But the question is what have they done with them?"

"That's just it," said Walter despairingly. "There isn't a single clue to go upon. As you say we are up against a stone wall. Not knowing Prince Penrod as I do, and the little girl is too I'm sure that we will get track of them again some how."

"But the Emperor did not appear so hopeful.

"This gang of Glandelinian spies or other rascals the agents of the Glandelinian Headquarters of spies, who are trying to secure the strategic invention General Vivian had in his possession, appear to have a far better organized and desperate plan of campaign than we have imagined," he said, "and if they are captured by them and Penrod too with them will make it a more desperate situation for them. However, will secure all the Gemini and in the meantime we must notify General Vivian. The news can be kept from him no longer. I'll stick to this, although he knew that the General would be driven almost frantic by the news that the prince and princesses were in the hands of their enemies."

"Now while I get General Vivian on the long distance phone if it is possible," said the Emperor, "suppose you go over to the bank, where you left your money, and bring it and mine around here. We have a lot of gold to cover if we are to get on the track of those dangerous rascals, and that will be the quickest way to get about. I must regain my daughter as at all costs."

And so it was arranged, while the Emperor's horse around from the bank General Walter fetched him and the Emperor's horse around from the bank and directed. He found Emperor Vivian waiting for him with the information that the General had taken the news of the capture of Violet and her sister more calmly than he had expected, and when asking the general why, had received the answer that it was impossible with no many girl scout boys around them.

"By the way," he went on. "The general informed me also of something that you should know. It appears that Penrod's young girl friend of Abbe's name Nell is being eagerly sought for by the highest Glandelinian authorities because she knows more about Abbe's name and the cause of its deepest action than even any of my daughters or you do. I'm sure you should get the information I do not know. They seem to have some strong reason for wishing to get her back for something else too, and even went to the length of offering a large reward to all Glandelinian generals for the capture. The reward she is to be awarded as if she was one of my own jewels and the only way in she must live among the large regiments of child scouts."

"I doubt if they could find her through any channels now," said Walter with a grin, that ended in a sigh as he thought of how Prince Penrod and his sisters with the two boys were now mysteriously missing.

Emperor Vivian, who knew quite a good deal about horses, tried to divert Walter's mind from the trouble which he felt himself during his ride to the Headquarters of the Gemini in that city by discussing the points of the battle line of both sides at Redgate. But Walter only replied listlessly. His thoughts were centered on the missing friends. There was no news of the Glandelinian spies or the princesses and the others at Gemini headquarters. This hardly surprised Walter who had concluded that such close rascals as these Glandelinian spies had shown themselves to be, would surely have had sense enough to cover up their tracks. As they were leaving the building sense enough to have helped some of the scouts in their search one of the two Gemini who had helped some of the scouts in their search the night before was just then coming in. He stopped Walter and the Emperor and spoke to him.

"Here's a funny and strange thing," he said. "Do you know those three houses and the one next door to the one where your daughter and son, and you two friends vanished? Well they burned down last night through a mysterious fire bomb fire explosion, pig fire too. The ruins still smouldered and thirty six fire companies still out, fire spread through the buildings like as if they were made of paper. The flames swept right through the first fire gutting building from cellar to garret and spread to the other two. Four thousand boy and girl scouts lost nearly everything they had in those three buildings the fire left nothing but the brick cell. The building your daughter and son captured one spy also burned."

This news did not particularly interest Walter, in fact he knew of the fire as he had been one of the principal witnesses to the first outbreak and had been the first to pull the fire alarm. He had no idea that Prince Penrod and his sister had been in any one of the buildings and, if captured, they surely could not have been left behind, and therefore had no reason to be concerned in the matter.

"It's an odd coincidence," he said in reply as he passed on, "I'm glad we made sure that the royal children were not in the place which was burned."

"Well I hope by God's help you'll find them soon," he joined the other, "you can depend on it, that if they're still in this city of Pandora we'll get online on them some how."

Although Walter was by no means sure of this, he thanked the Gemini member, and presently was seated on his own horse once more with the Emperor beside him on his own.

"Too bad," said the Emperor, "although I really hadn't much expectation that we would learn anything new. These men we are pitted against are much slicker and smarter than we thought. But I do not worry much about the safety of my daughter because they are really angel possessed and no harm really can befall them. But I don't like it just the same. They may too have to protect Penrod instead of being protected now."

"Do you think, sir, that the black bearded man and his companions are the principals in this thing?" asked Walter as they rode off.

"No, they are simply the tools of a powerful secret syndicate of Gaijandian spies in Pandora, some of whom are composed of slick and dangerous but unscrupulous spies and revenue and other military agents, who are far too cunning to undertake the actual thing when they have men to do it for them. The thing that is bothering me is—are they still in Pandora or have they left with the children?"

"And what bothers me," said Walter rather sharply, "is because what has become of Prince Penrod and Mithril and his sister and the two boys?"

The Emperor looked sharply at the boy beside him. Then first years ago he had met Walter Starling, he had liked him well for what he had done for his daughter, then, but now a day he felt at times a little suspicious of him, concealing him and Penrod, and some of the others including his daughter. He had also liked the boy because he had seen that the lad was keen witted and successful as their forces were unscrupulous dare devil and mostly reckless.

"There, there Walter," he said kindly, "don't mind the situation of worry so much. They're angel possessed, I tell you and if they are captured it might mean good night for the spies. They often usually make prisoners late of the ones who capture them, but we cannot be too sure they are captured. Maybe they are missing because instead of being captured they are pressing the pursuit. Perhaps I'll tell you what we'll do. The way is nothing like a good horse back ride along a country road to clear one's head and enable one to do some stiff thinking. Suppose we take a little horse back ride out of town."

"I think that is a good idea, sir," agreed Walter Starling, and within another hour they were spinning through the suburbs, and then through the enormous Christian encampments out upon a country road, which ran through a charming landscape, dotted here and there by farmhouses within the very Christian lines surrounded by small woods and fields.

The Emperor appeared to be thinking deeply and Walter did not interrupt him. Instead he attended strictly to watching where he was heading for, keeping his eyes on the road ahead. They took a horse back ride of several miles, and then on the Emperor's suggestion they turned back having no intention of leaving the Christian lines. They rode back toward the city at a fair speed but they had not gone more than a few miles before Walter's eyes fixed on the road, became aware of an astonishing thing. The road through the encampments was at a right angle, and out of a cloud of dust ahead there suddenly emerged to their astonishment a thing hardly ever seen or even allowed in Abbiennia, and that was a large touring car, an automobile. It was coming toward them at a slow gait. There was however nothing so very astonishing in this in a way, for Walter and the Emperor knew what an auto was, even knew how to run one to tell the truth, and in itself it formed no reason for Walter's startled exclamation. The real surprise was that nobody was driving it occupied it as a seat, and the next amazing feature was that some distance behind the car came a deadly horse as if running after the car and neighing pitifully. It the car itself was a bright purple in color, the horse was black.

"Look, sir," he cried to the Emperor, "if that isn't the same kind of a touring automobile they used in the count, it is the twin of them, and more astonishing still it has no driver!"

"And the horse following it has no rider," blurted my soul. The horse's some mystery he said, added the Emperor.

Walter halted his horse and dismounted standing at one side of the road. "What are you going to do?" demanded the King as Walter prepared to leap. "Find out what all this means, sir," was Walter's rejoinder. "Hardly were the words out of his mouth when the big deadly horse passed them. The Emperor, however, rode a little forward and seized the reins of the deadly horse. As the car passed, Walter made a flying leap for its running board. He landed safely, clinging to the side of the machine. Then while the great horse watched with astonished eyes, the boy clambered into the vacant driver's seat, and shutting off the power applied the foot brake bringing the car to an abrupt stop.

"Well of all astonishing things," exclaimed Walter, as having brought the car to a stop he examined it carefully. It was undoubtedly the best car he had ever seen. But what had become of the driver? How did the car come to be running by itself? How had it kept on a straight course?"

The last of these questions was answered when Walter discovered that attached to the steering knuckles was a device, which by an irony of fate he himself had invented and marketed. This device was in pretty general use on Christian gun boats and was known as the automatic steering knuckle. It consisted of stout springs attached to each steering knuckle, and connected with the helm of the auto in such a manner that provided the wheel was not turned, the car would automatically be kept on a straight course. The device had been thought out by Walter as an aid to beginners in gun boat driving, but it had been found so useful that many skilled gun boat drivers had adopted it. This then explained how the car had kept the road with no one at the wheel. But the deeper mystery of how it came to be where it was and minus of its driver and occupants, was far from a solution.

"There's something surely out of the ordinary in all this," decided Walter Starling in a puzzled tone as he stood beside the machine on the dusty road.

"Indeed I'll say it, it is the most puzzling thing yet. An Automobile he said and nobody riding in it, and it running on a straight ahead."

Walter Starling uttered these words as Emperor Mithril who had alighted from his horse, joined him at the side of the purple car. "There can be no doubt," he said, "it is a piling my pesty mystery. Here can the car have come from? I usually don't allow such things in this country and who owns it has broken the rule and shall pay. A confounded designer I'll say."

"It didn't come very far, that is by itself," he joined Walter instantly. "You see this automatic steering would only keep it on the road in a straight course. It couldn't help it to negotiate any turns or turns."

"That's so, when did you first sight it?" "As it came over the top of that high hill yonder I propose that we hitch the three horses on the rear and drive slowly along the road and see if we can pick up some clue to the mystery. And for punishment, sir, I'd advise you to keep the machine for the use of your daughter."

"An excellent idea, I say as you say the car can't have come far, we ought soon to encounter something, that will put us in possession of some knowledge of what has happened. Suppose you drive the car slowly. I'll follow on one of the horses, especially mine as to keep a look out ahead."

"Very well," agreed Walter Starling, who knew that the Emperor knew about driving a car as he did have one of his own and had a car of his own which he left at Angelina Agathia however. Walter got into the big purple touring car and boy though he was turned it around with a dexterity that showed he was no greenhorn at driving an auto. Walter took the lead and drove slowly for the sake of the horses, and keeping his eyes wide open.

"It's better," Walter said, "you wait at the right hand side of the road. I'll watch the left," he shouted back to the Emperor. "Very well," was the King's reply, and in this way the auto and the three horses went forward slowly along the road and over the back of the hill. The hill, over which the purple ca- of mystery had appeared. Beyond the rise the road took a dip, but was quite at night.. At the bottom of the dip (dip) was a bridge spanning a small creek. (you got creek) The road at each side of the bridge was sandy and soft, and the auto puffed rather heavily through it, and the horses ploughed as if through deep snow. All at once Walter checked the big horse, he then raised his hand above his head to signal the emperor to halt his horse also.

"Is there anything you have found?" asked the monarch eagerly, as Walter applied the breaks and shut off power.

"Yes sire, look here in the sand at the side of the road. There are foot marks and yes by Ginge--there 's been a desperate fight of some kind here sire."

"I'll dismount and you get out, and we'll examine the foot prints more carefully" suggested the Monarch.

"Accordingly, suggested the "Acco-ndint Acco-ndly both the King and the boy came to the ground and the next minute were bending intently above the maze of foot marks that Walter had noticed. It seemed plain enough that as the that as the boy had suggested there had been a desperate struggle there, no other explanation would fit the case. The grass was trampled down, and twice it had been broken from the bushes in the vicinity of the tangle of the foot marks.

"Well I see you are in the right about the re having been a struggle here." said the Monarch, "but we are not any nearer to knowing who engaged in it, what it was about, or anything else that might do us good. I'm inclined to think--- bless y my soul boy what 's the matter?"

Waite had flung himself forward with a joyous shout. His leap landed him on the edge of the thicket right alongside some object he had described. He stooped swiftly and lifted it with a celerity of 100 mph. It was one of those large hen-t shaped glaucous hats that the boy held up and the keen witted reporter instantly guessed what it was.

"It's not my daughter-daughters," he exclaimed. "It belongs to a girl-scout who is a private."

"Yes, ho-ra hoo-ray. We must be close on that track now. It can't be that any girl scout was captured. I'll bet some feds were in the auto and they captured and captured them and set it going by accident. Oddly enough as Walter with a flushed face set down the hat and prepared to open a pocket book he also found, the Mona-ch by no means seemed to share his satisfaction. It was incomprehensible to him that who had ever cured the pocket book would have thrown it away like that with anything in it. He was not surprised, therefore when Walter having opened the bag gave vent to a cry of chagrin.

"Just as I thought," said the Emperor, rather grimly. "However the finding of that pocket book establishes one thing clearly enough and the finding of the hat too."

"And that is?"

"That Glandelinian spies have been here to Glandelinians rather in this auto, and we're surprised by a party of scouts on horse back. The pocket book belongs to one of them and it certainly didn't contain money, spies don't carry that around. They may be close to us now if they escaped from the scouts. See there is lots of marks from horse's too."

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"I don't know either. I've collected that not very Walter glanced about some what apprehensively. He collected that not very long before, when they had tricked the enemy on the wood road, Glandelinian spies had been closer to them than they thought for this might be the case now if they had outwitted the scouts." and on of several. scouts at hand

"I wish we had a good strong squadron of cavalry, or scout at hand to make a thoroughout search of the woods," he said. "So do I," was the rejoinder, "but you can depend upon it that those fellows if they had not been captured are still lingering here since the scout arrived on the scene." "I am glad that Salto made another discovery -- one of those

A It was at this moment that Faltz made another discovery -- one of those large square topped hats belonging to a Glandellian soldier that lay in some bushes almost at his feet. He picked it up with a cry having recognized it as one belonging to a Glandellian sergeant.

"Then Walter picked up a small boys cap.
"They've had a little boy of some kind with them sir," he exclaimed excitedly,
"just look here, this is his small sailor like cap." "Wonder if it is possible that he was... Hello, what's that!!!!" #**
...from the bushes

"Sounds like a whine and a groan," decided the FBI men as from the bushes that clustered against the bridge supports, the moaning sound came once more ... exclaimed Kaitan showing his way through the

"That's a me child in pain," exclaimed Walter, shoving his way through the underbrush that clothed the steep bank so thickly.

"Be care ful my boy, don't take chances. you don't know that this isn 't a trap" cautioned the Mon arch. "those men may be;--"

He did not finish the sentence. A cry of alarm and pity from Walter cut it short. The boy had reached the edge of the bank (not spunk) on the edge of the creek, and in a clump of ~~elder~~ ^{elder} ~~side~~ ^{side} there he found something that filled him with sadness and made him utter a cry of pity.

"What is it that have you found?" demanded the Monarch, peering down. "Why I've found a little girl - probably sixteen or seventeen - she's in a sailor suit of white like that cap I found. O - probably - On the poor little girl, I'm afraid she's a waif - but she has fallen and accidentally off the bridge. Can you help me to get her up the bank? I could carry her but the bank is so steep I might stumble with her."

steep I might stumble with her." "Can I?" "Of course I can," and the Monarch plunged down to where Walter was standing. He found the boy stationed above the monument form of a small frail girl, dressed in a sailor-girl's suit, who was bleeding badly from a cut on the head, and a part of her mouth too was covered with blood. Her physician who despite a Monarch, could have been as good a doctor as any experienced physician made a swift examination of the wounds and then told Walter to dip his clean handkerchief in the water of the creek and when this had been done he bathed the wounds care fully. A bad cut was also on her left leg where the stocking was torn off. As the cold water touched her the child who had been moaning feebly, opened her eyes; and started to cry.

"Don't cry little girl, you'll be all right," said the Popeye man, and then to Walter she is not badly hurt throughout some as if by a substance as it looks. I have examined her and no bones are broken."

"But the cut is on her head, left and right."
"You mean leg and lip don't you."

"Yes."

"Yes."

"They are nothing serious. Now give me a hand, and we'll get her up the bank and into one of the machines. I'll leave the horses here in haste, hiding and make as fast a run as possible into the Christian lines and into the city for a doctor will engage my own family doctor."

into the city for a doctor will emerge my own family doctor. Waiter lost time in carrying out the Monarch's instructions and by dint of scrambling and clambering the two managed to get the wounded child up the bank. This done she was placed in the tonneau of the big fast touring car the no see were tied and hid in thick bushes, and the machine sped on once more no more. Not more than half a mile further on they reached the outskirts of the Christian lines and the guard who after ranking for passes and recognition the two was wholly astonished out of his wits to see them come in a machine, when just recently they had left the same position of the Christian lines on horse back. The Argentine decided after well not to waste his time to go into Pando with the child but decided on having the child taken care of at hand now, and on inquiring they were soon directed to the headquarters of one of the army doctors, and the little girl, who after a brief period of consciousness, had again lapsed into insensibility was placed in the physicians' hands for treatment. Waiter was almost dying with anxiety to ask the little girl some questions which might put him on the track of Violet, and he insists, but the physician forbade his patient being bothered even by an Argentine for the present.

But I will allow you both to talk together this evening," he said, and with this Walter and the Monarch had to be satisfied. The Physician whose name was "powered" a large military hospital nearby for wounded officers and in one of the rooms of this little girl was put to bed and made as comfortable as possible, and a Dr. Gross had to take care of her. As beautifully as she was dressed, the little girl appeared to be as much half starved," said the doctor, and that was weakened her system so much that she cannot resist pain like a healthy person." Walter related how he had found the little girl, and that she was Walter's sister.

W e W h e r e u p o n W a l t e r r e l a t e d h o w h e h a d f o u n d t h e b o d y a n d t h a t i n t h e e v e n i n g h e w i s h e d t o f i n d o u t w h a t h a d h a p p e n e d t o h e r f i r s t .

"What's his name?" asked the doctor.
"She told me in the car that his name was Helen," we joined Ed and was not slow to notice an odd look pass over the physicians face. It seemed almost as if the name called up a familiar collection to him.
"He'll be here," said Emma - Vivian, who like Walter,

"Do you know any one by that name?" asked Emperor Mirvian, who like most had seen the interested expression of the medical man.

"I did a few years ago," was the reply, "but I have no further information. I am sure that if a child can be any relative of hers. After all all over the world Helen is a common enough name." [redacted] had been diagnosed of and sent away. Penrod, James

After the prisoners had been disposed of and sent away, the state was to try a search elsewhere for a "rod and him advised violent and he insists on to try a new way of doing followed by them and the two boys entered another part of the house for the purpose to make sure there was no body around. He suddenly stumbled over something and banged his head against a room wall in the dark. From the shock of the fall his ears rang with the hoarse sound of a hundred waterfalls, and his brain throbbled cruel.

"Oh Pen-rod, Pen-rod" screamed his sisters. "Where are you? What has happened to you?"

"I stumbled over some confounded obstruction on the floor slat but you don't get tripped" he answered. "Better miss the flash, but oh how my head hurts. I must have hit against something hard."

He sat up feeling sick and giddy as one of his sisters managed to turn on her pocket flash light. An almost overwhelming nausea was upon him too, but as two of his sisters bent anxiously over him he overmastered the feeling and with their help rose unsteadily to his feet. The light revealed he had stumbled over a foot stool that had stood across his path. It was the only furniture in the room. "What a handsome looking room," he mused, looking about him by the light of the flash while he grinned at his sisters at which their looks of worry vanished. Also that on the faces of his two friends.

He rubbed his head and grinned some more as he said:

"By the feeling of my head I must have struck against some protection on the floor. The wall I ought to have been dealt a blow for something the way it feels. Ah sisters! and where's Walter Stavitts? Starving?"

"He went with me to the police and didn't return," said Tim. "Well we'll find him later," said Pen-rod, and now my dearest sisters, we must go back to our work of eating the other before they get away. But why in there a strange blue glow coming from your little girls. And how beautiful you look to night eh---what---hullo what's that?"

"Emmie like something burning," said Tim sniffing the air. "The odor of small of the flaming lower floors of the tenement had, in fact penetrated their nostrils, although of course, they didn't dream then for an instant that they were in a fire trap of the worse kind. But suddenly as they stood there trying to collect their wits, they became aware of shouts and cries, and the clanging of bells, and the shrieking of whistles. "There must be a big fire somewhere," said Pen-rod to the others, recognizing the clanging of the bells and the screaming sirens of the fire engines. "Maybe that's what delayed Walter Stavitts. If there is a fire close by, there must soon be a great crowd of boys and girls, scouts and soldiers and people. The other girls and we've all got to get out of this. He crossed hastily to the door followed by his sisters and the two boys. As he flung it open a great cloud of black suffocating smoke struck them a full in the face, almost depriving them of breath. Pen-rod reeled back, Tim slumping the door shut. A thrill of horror ran through his veins and the girls also. "Is can heat beat thickly, but his blood was icy cold."

"The fire is here in his house," he gasped. "And if we don't get out pretty quick, we'll all be roasted alive. Violet and her sisters held their hands to their faces and couldn't repress a scream."

Pen-rod hastily surveyed the room. On one side was a window, it suggested a means of escape other than the door, which was impassable on account of the dense smoke outside. The real fact is, the house that Pen-rod and the others were in had caught fire from the house where the blaze started and the flames had now eaten their way up two flights, and the noises they had heard from the streets were shouts of the fire men fighting the blaze and the rattle of the apparatus as it clattered up. It was indeed a big fire. The first building burning was a four-story affair and half a block long, and a hundred feet wide, and was a perfect furnace inside and the glare in the dark night could be seen for miles. The house Pen-rod and his sisters were in had caught at the lower and upper upper side section and the flames were spreading at a alarming rate, despite the desperate efforts of the fire men to check it, pouring at the fire of that huge house too about ten streams and thirty on the other and more were coming up. Hastily opening the window, Pen-rod and those who could looked out into what at first seemed a black void. The feeble stream of lamp light from the room as Violet had lit a lamp however presently revealed a wall opposite him, flanked with windows. It was a much higher building than the one they were in. One of the windows was immediately across from the casement out of which he was gazing.

The distance across the shaft did not appear to be more than a few feet possibly four or five.

"If we can find only some way of spanning the shaft we will yet save our selves and get out of the building," he said. He cast a rapid glance about the room and so did the rest. It's furniture was scanty enough not to require a very long investigation to itemize it.

There was a small wicket table on which stood the smoky lamp two disreputable chairs and a flowery cot. But none of these seemed to them to be what he wanted. While he still hesitated his sisters again screamed in panic and he knew the reason why for he suddenly felt and heard a crash beneath him. The house shook and Pen-rod knew that this betokened the fall of one of the lower floors. At almost the same instant the panels of the door began to blister and smoke rolled into the room through a crack into the under the portal. And they could all hear distinctly the crackle of the flames and it was suffocatingly hot.

"I must do something and for heavens sake do it quick too" he exclaimed. "But what?" cried Jennie desperately.

He thrust his head out of the window and shouted at the top of his voice, put above the noise and confusion in the street his feeble cries did not travel far. He looked about him despairingly. He really was only concerned for the safety of his sisters and himself his friends, but there was nothing he could do. He alone knew how desperately and feverishly he prayed for help. Was there nothing to save his sisters and himself and the two others from a fiery tomb?

All at once a miracle gave a gleam of hope. From under the dusty blanket on the bed he had just glimpsed the protruding end of a black, narrow but strong looking and of quite a length. It gave him an inspiration and to the surprise of the others, he threw away the coverings of the cot he found that it was formed by placing long strong planks across the stables and any one of these boards was just about the right length, for the purpose to which he designed to put it. His weakness forgotten in his excitement, the boy with the help of Pen-rod quickly lifted the board across the room and thrust it out of the window. It just reached the opposite casement, resting its end on the sill beyond a perilously narrow margin, but it was that own means of escape, the other boards who was forced to go first didn't hesitate an instant to clamber up on the board, and then they began the passage across the shaft. All crossed safely until it was Pen-rod's turn and considerable time had been lost. Before he set out to crawl across his frail bridge he cast a backward glance into the room he was leaving. As he did so the flames burst through the panels of the door and he was conscious of a strong puff of heat like that from the open door of a blast furnace. As he moved along and neared its center while those at the window anxiously watching him the board cracked and bent ominously, it had finally weakened somewhat by the weight of the others who had crawled over it and so too Pen-rod was heavier than all of them. It was thick but not particularly thick, and as said before Pen-rod was no light weight. The cold perspiration stood out on his face as he thought of what would happen if his slender support would snap from under him. He did not know how great a fall he would have, but he as well as his sisters were well convinced that a tumble from the plank would mean death expeditiously and terribly. They prayed desperately and held their breath in terrible suspense. They didn't cry out for fear of disconcerting him and it seemed more of an interminable time than to him before he grasped the other window sill. The boy had just gripped the projecting ledge of stone with his hands when he felt his support drop from under him. The swaying motion imparted to it as he crept across had caused the end that rested on the opposite window to bounce off. The next instant Pen-rod was hanging by his fingertips with space under his feet. He with the help of those of the girls and one boy tried to draw himself up but weakened as he was by his fall, he was unable to do so and worse still he felt his strength fast leaving him. A cold sweat of horror broke out on him, his sisters could hardly suppress a scream and some of them began to whimper and pray. Was he doomed to a terrible death after all?

All at once his foot encountered something. It was a thick water pipe running up the side of the house, and passing close by the window to the sill of which he was clinging with such desperation. If only he could reach that pipe he might be able to save himself yet. The thought put new strength into him. He rapidly weakening grip, and he began slowly and carefully to creep along the sill toward the pipe by moving his hands alternately. It was a fearful strain and any one in less physical condition than he could never have done it. If this had happened to any of his sisters she'd be a goner. As she could never have saved herself. But do it Pen-rod somehow did and at last by reaching came fully out with one hand, he was able to grip the pipe while his sisters giving him plenty of light with his flashes continued to pray hard. Then came the most perilous part of his whole enterprise. He must desperately hold on to the pipe (the pipe) with one hand while he let go of the wall with the other. And then too there was a chance that the pipe might not be securely fastened and might give way under his weight. But it was no time to hesitate. In fact every second his strength was going from him. With a pained cry on his lips, and his sisters most pleadingly begging him to be careful, Penrod clutched the pipe and made the swing. To this day he cannot tell how it happened, maybe the possession angels of his sisters were with him but he succeeded somehow in landing on the pipe, gripping it firmly with both hands, and finding it was more securely fastened than he had thought it would be. It was the comparatively easy manœuvre for the brave boy prince to draw himself up to the window sill, and with the help of two of his sisters who alone could reach him to scramble over it. He found himself with them now in a cool pitch dark place only faintly lighted by the flames from the hearth across the hearth, though the flames were beginning to be checked by the effect of the firemen, with the help of the flashlight flashlights of two of his sisters he found that he was in a large bare room with an enormous pile of sacks in one corner and along the walls elsewhere a big barrel in three tiers. The place was evidently a storehouse of some kind, but none of the children stopped to investigate much. Instead he followed by his sisters and the two boys crept to a big door and gave the door knob a tug. It refused to yield.

"It's locked," he said, tears almost rising to his eyes in his disappointment. He and the others beat on the portal and shouted, yelled and screamed with all their might, but they feared the flames would spread to this house also. But no answer came. In fact they had known it, they were in a big factory, and which room here was never frequented much by the night watchmen, and no body worked here at night. It was not however in danger of catching as this building was fireproof as they soon saw. At last seeing they were in no danger from the flames across the factory, and tired out by all they had gone through, they desisted from their efforts to attract attention, completely exhausted, he took one of the flashlight which Violet offered him, and followed by them made his way to the pile of sacks. He and they sank down on them noticing they exhaled a pleasant aroma. He wondered what it was. Presently he realized coffee was in the barrels and potatoes in the sacks.

The very hungry if not half starved children and wholly worn out yet did not help themselves to anything for fear it was stolen. Mainly from the heat they were dreadfully thirsty and their mouths and tongues felt dry as lime kilns. Well, wonder that in their next remission they thought they should go mad. Luckily however, nature asserted herself, and the deep sleep of sleep of total fatigue prevented them dwelling on their misfortune.

"It is now time to return to the bedside of little Nell Michaelena Daisybell in the home of James A. and Mrs. to whom she had been brought by Penrod after Walter Starling had rescued her from the Glandelinians. Is it not a boy and girl scouts had not played any trick about the fence, or sign as the road had been out of order and it had been suicide to disregard the signs. While the two others had gone down the road a ways to see whether it was true or not, from a cross road, Walter Starling, and his followers had suddenly come upon the lone Glandelinian spy with the little girl. He had called for help at the sight of them, but it had been useless to resist and it was surprising that he had not been killed as boy and girl scouts don't usually give quarter to those though they can if they want to.

He and the little girl had been seized at first as a Glandelinian spy and she as his tool of decoy. Walter then with his gang joined Penrod's column and Penrod recognized the little girl as the one he was after, and told Starling all about her, and then she had been brought to his headquarters, the place where taken away some while ago. It was now evening and Walter Starling, as he had promised had returned to hear little Nell's story and see what light she could throw on whom the Glandelinians were who had stolen her or captured her and what she knew of Abbeinn and the disaster.

Walter returned alone, Empereur Vivian having closed a very urgent telephone message on the way returning to camp, which commanded his presence at his council hall that evening. It had something about the news that Irene Mylette was pressing his advance, and that Pando was in disguise. Irene Mylette was riding out alone to see the little girl who so strangely knew Penrod and have a chat with her. He found the little girl sitting up in bed much better thanks to Empereur Vivian's family doctor and his kind ministrations, and eager to see his friend. After first greetings had been exchanged, on her part a rather shyly as he was dressed so dignifiedly, the little girl lost no time in plunging into her story.

From her very country home where she had been visiting her Uncle she had been surprised by these spies in a field where she had been cleaning her Uncle's potato patch and had been carried off. They had kidnapped her because one of them thought pictures of her had been known and known what she knew concerning the secrets of the Abbeinn disaster. At any rate she had been thrown on the ground and hurried off down a wood road, which joined the main thoroughfare further on. Terrified half to death by the men's threats to kill her if she made an outcry, the poor little girl told how they had first taken her to a room in an old rookery in the city first which it appeared was used as a rendezvous for hard Glandelinian spies and other agents. Walter who had been warned by the doctor not to excite the little patient, thought it best to let the little girl tell her story in her own way, and therefore did not put any questions or tell her anything regarding the fact that Penrod and his sisters were missing. In fact yet she did not know Penrod was a prince. It can be imagined then with what a cruel shock he heard of the little girl's tale and Penrod caught and trapped in the burning building, and wondered how Nell had heard or learned of that. He sank his head in his hands, quite unable to speak for some moments. So that accounted why they were missing.

As he knew from what the Glandelinian members had told him that morning, that several buildings had been gutted by the fire, he found it almost impossible to cherish a hope that somehow Penrod and his sisters might have been saved. When he grew calmer little Nell went on with her narrative.

It appeared that after the men who had captured her left the city they made their way directly to the roads, and during their passage down the road she had been given no opportunity to appeal to passers-by. The travelers' threats of what would happen to her if she did alarm him too far had scared her enough but she had nevertheless disobeyed the men's command to keep quiet. That morning first had been spent by the spies being in active work of some sort. At any rate Nell said the man called Jake had gone out early, after writing several letters in a sort of shed in the country. As he left to post one some where he had dropped one unnoticed and as his attention happened to be clever she had by some trick distracted the man's attention, and had picked it up unseen by him. All that morning and early part of the afternoon were spent in the stable and then after the man's return, they took their horses out and she was forcibly mounted on one of them, she dared not offer any opposition and soon the tripping the city back streets were soon riding out of the city and riding along a country road. They came to a place where there was a bridge.

"It was here," she said, "that that good fortune boy scout I met in Abbeinn suddenly came upon us with a party of those boy and girl scouts I read about. Of course they escaped him, and his party, though none of him was shot and killed. As they met the other one then called Ralph I heard them say they were going to some place up the creek that the bridge crossed. But they were soon stopped by the sign of the road crossed for a while and two of them leaving one man to guard me so I wouldn't escape, went off to see if the sign was telling the truth as they suspected a trick.

Well they were gone for some time, and I guess it was that sharp bend in the other road that prevented him from seeing you and your party coming. Of course you came suddenly upon us and were riding fast. He tried to escape by urging the horses forward, but they were right around us at once and you know the rest. I never saw a man so scared before and he didn't fight either."

"It cleared up many points which had been enigmas. And to think he exclaimed most bitterly that it was not so very long before that that those Glandelinian soldiers made off up the creek with a little boy. Oh if we could have only caught them. But whom is the little prince you met in the city of Abbeinn?"

"It was your friend Penrod."

"Penrod? What makes you think he is a prince?"

"Because he can speak English."

"Do you know who Violet and her sisters are?" he asked.

"Yes," she answered. "They are Empereur Vivian's daughters."

"And Penrod is their brother Nell."

Nell's eyes opened wide in awe and surprise at hearing this.

"Nell's eyes opened wide in awe and surprise at hearing this."

"Penrod a Prince, Empereur Vivian's son? Why I thought---- thought----"

"Yes indeed, the boy you was so good to in Abbeinn is Prince Penrod Vivian."

"The youngest son of the Empereur."

So a moment she couldn't think of saying anything.

"And he would go to the bottom and peril to try and rescue me. I knew the princesses were with him for," recognized them through pictures I saw.

My poor but they were so pretty, but I couldn't see how they looked with their names drawn. They meant to play the game all night. 566

 I was scared even of them at first."
 For a moment she was quiet.
 "Why don't you look at that letter I picked up?" she suggested presently.
 This was a surprise to Walter. In his grief of the supposed fate of Violet and her sisters and the brother he had forgotten all about the letter which little Nell had mentioned.
 "That is right. I had forgotten you had it," he said. "It may give us a clue. Where is it?"
 "In the pocket of my jacket. It's hanging up over the door on that hook."
 Walter lost no time in getting the message from the garment. Nell indicated. It was addressed in what was clearly meant to be a disguised hand to General John Jackson Manley, P. O. Box, Creek. Walter took the envelope open eagerly. Inside was a single sheet of paper covered with the same print writing that was on the envelope showing he either did not know much about handling a typewriter or wrote that way to disguise it. The note was brief and very much to the point.

"Unsuccessful Christian dog, gliscent spies captured the omnibus. Have also got goil who knows something about the Abbeign disaste."

J. D.K

"Phew. I should say that does give us a clue," gasped Walter, having read the note, "but it does not give us any line on poor Penrod and his good little brave sisters, and I'd rather have that than anything else. Hold on though. If we can find those other men and cause their arrest that will help us to trace the royal children. I'll get on the job now and notify all the gliscent leaders at once. I wish—"
 But just then the recollection of the probable fate of Violet and her sisters and Penrod, swept over the lad again and poor Walter fairly broke down. In the midst of his collapse Mr. Andrews James father came into the room. He had not heard anything of the fire disaster, his face however was radiant and it was possible that he was excited.
 "Some one wants to talk to you on the phone Walter," he said kindly.
 "To me?" exclaimed Walter, looking amazed.
 "Yes, somebody at Central is Street. The call is from Gemini Headquarters." Graciously wondering who could be calling him, except the Gemini, Walter hastened to the phone, which was in the same room where little Nell lay.
 "Hello," explained Walter, picking up the receiver. "Who is it. Princess Violet?"
 "What? Oh Violet? Oh Violet, and she and her sisters are all right."

And Violet indeed it was speaking on the phone. The sound of her voice brought into Walter's heart the most joyous feeling he had ever known. Little Nell's delight he fairly skilled about with excitement as Violet Violet grabbed the receiver and spoke rapidly. Graciously to the point told him of the escape of herself and brother and sisters and the two boys from the burning building, and how the next day, they had been discovered more dead than alive by the men in the factory.

"The work women," she said over the phone. "Must have found us all in a swoon or something, for when we awoke we found ourselves in an emergency hospital where the necessities and stimulants had been administered to us. The Head Doctor of the Hospital Walter then tried to communicate with father when he learned who we were, but father must not be home, and also then the doctor called up at Jack Evans own headquarters, but through the error of one of his aides, the message had not been transmitted properly to his headquarters. We therefore got there and found he was not home, the doctor having found we were all right and dismissed us. We had Evans sent for and when he reached his headquarters two hours after our arrival in response to our summons, he was amazed when we greeted him, and in fact he had not known we were missing as nobody had yet told him so, you can imagine Walter. But his blank amazement when we told him of our narrow escape from the fire. Come to Evans headquarters as soon as possible Walter. Penrod wants to see you. We are somewhat shaken up but we are better now."

"I'll be over right away," said Walter.
 Little Nell's pretty face lighted up wonderfully at the glorious news. In spite of Mr. Andrews urgent request to him to stay and have some refreshment, Walter insisted that Violet had told him to come as soon as possible and that he must get to Evans headquarters without delay. Too he was crazy with impatience to get the little Nell had so cleverly picked up into the hands of the proper authorities and so he placed it in the safe, and how anxious he was to clasp the hand of the three famous boys again, and hug Violet and her sisters. Ten minutes Walter was off on one of the most pleasant trips of his life; shortly before he had hardly dared to hope that the royal children had escaped from the flames alive. He promised to return to the town in the morning. As Mr. Andrews said good bye he added:

"By the way I think I shall have something remarkable to tell you ere long about this little Nell Daisy Bell. She is not by any means what you think she is. I know her parents well."

"With which puzzling words Walter had to be content, for even if the man would have told more than Walter was more anxious to see Violet and her sisters than wait to hear anything."

"What a wonderful day this has been," mused Walter, as he sped along the road along the street on his fastest horse. So intent was he on his pleasant thoughts that he was quite startled when suddenly from under a street light there stepped a tall human figure. Walter turned out of the path quickly or avoid having his horse trample him down. But as he did so he heard himself hailed in a sharp voice:

"Hi kid."

"Well what in the world is it?" demanded Walter.

"Will you please give me and my little daughter a ride two days home. I am too far and my child is sick."

"Now at any other time Walter would have refused such a request, for because of the war hold up of horses men were frequent by Glandelinian spies. But at the moment he felt so joyous and at peace with all the world that he stopped the horse and told the man to put the child on.

The man did so, and then got on behind Walter. They had just started, when two men on horseback galloped upon from the rear, and another in front.

"The whole three of you are going with us," came the startling words. "Our own confounded animal around and go where we tell you. So the brat is sick. Well when we get through with the brat she'll never need to be sick."

The command was enforced by the pressure of something cold to the back of Walter's neck. If it was not for the man and his sick child Walter would have made resistance in spite of this, for even if one pointed a gun at him, Walter was such, and so strong even though a lad, that what was two men to him, but to do so would endanger the other two. The man who had uttered the command to turn about he recognized by his voice. It sounded like the "Mutt" fellow.

Indeed Walter did more than a pig thinking (if you could call it a pig like thinking) then he had ever done in his life before. Little by little he blamed himself too, for halting the horse at the request of the man with the child, for they being on the horse hindered any purpose of his fighting the two men with drawn sabres. If only he had not done that, how different things might have been, but Walter was not the sort of man to waste time in vain regrets. He really

He realized plainly enough that he was in the power of two Glandelinian secret spies a more other who had made them so much trouble, and that in the event of offering any resistance with the two on the horse even if he might win, they would be in the path of the blows from the enemy's weapons too. But he was not of the surrendering kind either, he'd prefer death to even giving himself up, and so he was decided not to do so under any condition. He therefore also decided to bide his time and to await the coming of some more favorable turn in his fortune.

"Come on, turn your horse around and look slippery now," growled the man who had spoken before emphasizing his order by an unpleasant click of the trigger of his weapon.

"I don't care what you do. I won't surrender to you," said Walter. "Kill me if you want to. I won't obey you!"
 "Oh you won't eh?" and suddenly it seemed as if a rope of some kind had ended Walter and his arms were held tight so he couldn't fight back, and then two started ahead, pulling his horse along after him.

"Where are you taking me? Hell taking me?" demanded Walter.
 "None of your business you Christian dog. Here you with the kid. Get off that horse quick and beat it. We don't want you. Get off quick."
 They obeyed with speed indeed glad to escape so easily. As the three then went on ward, Walter inwardly hoped and prayed that they would meet with a squad of soldiers or boy and gliscent some where along the way, that they were going, and in such a case he determined to appeal for aid, cost what it might. He knew that the city road a long side this wide street was a well traveled one and decided that if he had only had a decent portion of luck, they might meet with a party of cavalry or something something.

"Now let's go ahead quick. Fast too," came the order of the man to his companion, as they were turned about. The party then started up at a fast pace as fast as they thought was prudent. All this time the boy was kept covered by the two men. They rode straight on for a mile or so without encountering a single person. At last they reached a point where no more road was out but a new cross at the beginning.

"Turn off here James," the other man ordered, and their course was changed, and he could see that there was a dark row of tall wide trees on each side of this street the branches being so extensive that they met in a thick leafy roof overhead. It was like driving through a leafy tunnel. But Walter just then was not paying much attention to any scene of right when he was in this position. All he realized was that in the very moment when a way out of all their difficulties seemed to have been found, things had lapsed back into as bad a state as ever. He wondered how these Glandelinians had happened along the city road, and how they knew he would be coming along it. As a matter of fact neither of them had any idea that the horse man hailed by the two men with the sick child was Walter until they heard his voice. Then the leader's plans were made in a flash. The two men had been on their way to the place when Walter came along. His advent had made a change in their plans.

The trees were getting better and higher gradually and at last they reached a spot where they did not want to go any further with the horses.

"All right," said the leader. "That is as far as we dare go with the horses. We will have to hoof it the rest of the way. Get off your horses and come on."

He was taken off the horse and the leader's companion produced an electric flash light. Guided by this the party set out once more, Walter in advance one man holding one end of the rope that encircled him. As they proceeded it suddenly flashed across Walter's mind that the men were taking him to one of their hiding places. Little did he dream it wasn't, but just now a place chosen this night for their shelter, and my God, little did they know how fearfully it was possessed by evil spirits, a place where violet and he sisters brave as they are would have fled from in panic.

"Well at any rate I may find a chance to get on the track of these piee Confederates," he thought as they still pushed forward. All at once though the trees the white outline of a huge house loomed up in ghostly fashion. Walter guessed that it must be the headquarters of the spies. Then suddenly dawned on him that little Nell had picked up. He wished now that he did not have it on his person. If the man should see him for a weapon they might have a clue as to the whereabouts of little Nell.

The house, as well as Walter could see in the moonlight was somewhat like the old colonial type, but of Abbeennian build, with twenty great gaunt pillars supporting the ground (not round) story. However he had not much time to pay attention to details before the men hustled him around to the main entrance door, which one of them showed open. It led into a big entrance hall, and through what had evidently been the kitchen. The building was not at all old and everything was in good condition, and everything within was clean no dust or cobwebs anywhere as the boy had expected and Walter saw that who ever occupied it was only away for a short time. It could not seem to be any ideal place for Glandelinian spies to haunt it. They passed through the lower glass and up a flight of stairs into a huge and gloomy main entrance hall with big doorways leading from it, and a grand staircase at one end of it. The rays of the electric light which shone on gilding and white painted wood work. It was evident that who ever had owned the house had been careful to keep it clean and polished for everything was sparkling and span. Then then it was for some reason a very melancholy place, rendered doubly so by the conditions of which the building was in, and that was being "possessed." Now it got to be so no one knew but the Glandelinian was blamed for it and that it was believed the devils were doing things to disconcert the Christian cause.

Turning turning to the left, the man who was the head and whose name was Ricken Picken entered one of the rooms which opened upon the great hall. A huge glass chandelier at least three of them hung from the ceiling and the evidences of Abbeennian golems remained in all the house did not appear as if there was anything wrong inside, but the wall paper was most luxuriously designed with beautifully colored flowers and other designs, but such a noise did they hear as if from running and squeaking wheels that Ricken's partner started and almost dropped his light.

"What in the hell is the matter with you?" growled Ricken in no unbecoming tones.

"Why the one confounded rat gave me a start."

"You're some brave man like a noblewoman eh?" sneered Ricken.

"Afraid of rats."

"It's not that. I thought they were ghosts at first."

"Yeah. The only spirits round here come out of a whiskey bottle." said Ricken.

Ricken in a reckless tone. "There is nothing the matter with this house. Ghosts are not existing."

"But they do say that there is something peculiar about the place, that is why the people who lived here moved away," said his companion with a slight shudder. "And with this kid here -- ha -- what was that?"

He stared nervously about him and something in a distant part of the house creaked and rattled and one of the chandeliers moved mysteriously.

"It's nothing but a loose shutter as it is mighty windy and hot outside, or some of those confounded rats," was the growling reply of Ricken. "Come on."

Bringing the boy into the back room where we can be more comfortable. The other man smiling by name, still showing signs of nervousness advanced with Walter and they passed out of the big drawing room of the mansion into a small, small chamber. Walter himself thought surely he had seen a big dresser suddenly move into a new place by itself. In the smaller room were a table and two chairs, a large handsome cot, and the remains of a man on the table. A big lighted lamp also stood on that piece of furniture, and Ricken lit it.

"How then you get on?" he demanded, flinging himself into a chair where were those Vivian girl centepedes who stole from us that Hell beat -- and and the wild cat brother Penrod."

"This was the question which Walter had been dreading, but he assumed a bold front and also foolish ignorance.

"I don't know anything about centepedes and wild cats," he retorted. "I have nothing to do with insects and cats."

"I mean where are the Vivian girl Princesses. I mean where are they I mean I mean?"

"Ask that wall over there to tell you!" said Walter. "Remember no confessions!"

A black look passed over Ricken's face. "His lips clean shaven compressed in a thin line.

"Oh you won't tell me, and expect the wall to tell me. Well maybe we can find a way to make you."

"What do you want to know for, for you cannot capture them any way!" demanded Walter with a boldness more than he was wont of having.

"Because they are in the way of Glandelinia, and if we kill or capture them we are going to achieve great honor and get a good pile of money besides."

"That would settle the matter," declared Walter with seeming reverence. "If my life depends on causing the destruction I don't intend to say, but in fact I don't intend to reveal any of their hiding places."

Now Walter was wondering over the mystery that seemed to have injected itself into the case of little Nell paley bell. At Mr. Anderson had hinted at some secret, then there was the letter with its vague allusion, and now this spy Ricken seemed to have some knowledge of the girl. Ricken thought a moment, drumming the table with his fingers as if meditating.

"Do you mean to say that you and some other meddling jackanapes did not pick the little brat out of the creek where we left her?" he asked presently.

Walter was a shrewd lad, and saw by the manner that he was to use a slang to Ricken fishing. He therefore shook his head for he didn't pick little Nell from the creek. It was some other little girl who really he found out had died from those injuries after all.

"I don't know what you are talking about," he said. "But I can tell you this, the whole army of boy and girl lacote are on the track of all of you on the charge of abducting violet and he sister's whether you did or not."

A swift look of alarm passed Ricken's face. The dangerous boy and girl scouts on their track, good heavens, is companions hand which he had seized to light a cigarette shook violently. Walter saw he had scared the man but he had told the truth for all were scouting every place for only staring he had about the floor. He was the more determined to follow up his advantage. But Ricken interrupted him.

"Why what do you know?" he began when the other came a startling interruption. "Some where a door slammed and the window in the room which was closed and even tightly locked, suddenly unlocked as if by invisible hands, and came up wide open. Then there was the sound of stealthy but swift foot steps creeping rapidly toward the still stairway. Ricken's partner started up in wild-eyed terror.

"What is it?" he gasped. "What is it. My heavens look at the wall. It's assuming a form of a terrible face and leaving."

Walter himself was comically startled for the manifestation was absolutely there and no optical illusion. He knew at once. They were in a possessed house. Ricken turned pale and another window slammed upon the top and the door of the room opened and shut by itself.

"I-----I-----I-----I----- don't know---" he stammered. "Huh---huh---huh---k?" They listened hardly daring to breathe, though when Walter crossed himself the he would slight to him on the wall suddenly disappeared. The time the place, and the strange stories that clustered about the place, all combined to make the phenomena and the interruption an alarming one. "It's-----It's a ghost---" he stammered, "ghost---" stammered Wringly his teeth chattering.

"Don't be a confounded fool," hissed Rickson. "There ain't no such thing. It's a rat or a snake."

A fearful tumult of uneasy yells suddenly broke the breathless silence, and some of the yells were even in the very room. It rang through the deserted house in a way to make the blood run cold.

Walter could stand no more. With one bound he cleared the table, knocking over the lamp as he did so. Instantly the light was extinguished plunging the place into total darkness. The scream was still continuing more loudly and frightfully full of agony and distress like the damned suffering in hell in dreadful torment. Van Rickson's own voice gave way. With the yells came screams and screams continuing he plunged forward with a frightened shriek of his own added to the din and collided with a large old fashioned window that opened into the room, and plunged clean through the frame, with a crash of glass and splintering of wood. Walter couldn't help it he felt his scalp tighten with terror, and his tongue seemed to cleave to the roof of his mouth. He had desperately worked himself loose from the rope and pulled out in a large crouch crouching which he always carried with him for the Glandelinians had forgotten to take anything away from him. He could not however stir from the spot as he heard those fearful steps drawing close and close. All at once as he stood stock still his heart pounding till it shook his frame some thing happened that changed him from inaction into wild panic. From the front the direction in which he judged that the door leading from the large room into the small one must lie there suddenly appeared a black something of unusual height and broad shape moving and crouching forward. With a cry of fear Walter dashed off into the darkness. In his panic he did not know where he ran when finally he got outside of the building and into the road. Then as he sped along he could hear the swift pit-pat-pat of pursuing foot steps. All at once as he continued to run, the ground seemed to subside under his feet, and he felt himself falling-----falling forward into space.

In his headquarters not far from Podgla within the fox lines, overlooking the wild river with its bustle of enemy water traffic full of soldiers, sat general John Manley, the man to whom Jake's message had been addressed--a message that as we know he had not received. General Manley does not need any description. On the door of general Manley's headquarters room was painted the word "private." Without this screened off sanctum was a busy room full of officers and their stenographers for military correspondence. On the door of this outer office appeared the words "General offices of the military department." General Manley chief of the Chief commander. At the precise moment that we are looking into the offices of his headquarters, a man whom we have never seen before--to wit Josh Sawden shoved his way and essayed to continue to shove his way, past an office boy, who however held up the man at the rail behind which were the desks of the stenographers and others afore said. Mr. Sawden appeared to be out of temper. He never had a good temper in the first place. Seeing that it was invalid for him to try to get past the boy without sending in his name, he hastily wrote on a piece of paper

"Through your chief little enemies the Vivian Girls and their brothers and a squad of boy and girl scouts the little brat Nell had been rescued. Must see you at once, Sawden."

He folded this, and handed it to the boy, telling him to take it into general Manley's and look slippy. Then Mr. Sawden adjusted his diamond at which the stenographers had been gazing in awe, and awaited the great man's summons. It came quickly.

"The general says you are to come right in," said the office boy on his return with a great deal more respect in his tone than he had used before to the man. Sawden lost no time in obeying this injucious injunction. As soon as he was inside the private office, general Manley motioned him to a chair.

"What the dickens is the meaning of all this?" he demanded with a lowering brow indicating the man's scowl.

"It's plain enough ain't it?" he joined in Sawden. "The brats have been rescued by girl and boy scouts under the Vivian Girls."

"And I paid you to see that she was brought here to me, and that every one through agents within the Christian lines were to be kept in ignorance of anything but the fact that she was a child slave," thundered the general. "How did this thing happen? Let the Vivian Girls bring at a get the best of you too?"

"Well what are you going to do when a big bunch of little brats in uniform come along on horse back, and capture her and the fellow with her right before your very eyes?" protested Sawden, mopping his brow for it was hot in the place.

"Stop yawning and tell me what happened," demanded general Manley angrily.

"Just this," he joined Sawden. "he was kidnapped and the man with her by a column of boy and girl scouts under Walter Starling." and he went on to explain to Manley, how it happened. And he concluded, "not one of us have had a chance to get hold of the little brat again, for they took her to the home of a guy called Jack Ambrose Evans, or something like that, and then--"

"Hold on," demanded Manley angrily, but with a note of eagerness in his voice. "This man Jack Evans as you call him, we generals all know him--he lives some where in Pando--"

"That's the trick."

"He's the guardian of those little girl demons the Vivian Princesses. He has his headquarters in Pando--" he he-ot not. He is a sort of an inventor--against us isn't he?"

"Well He and those boy and girl scout kids invented a way of getting that kid away from us all right, all right, just because their brother Penrod knows the little brat and is her friend."

"Well where is the little brat now?"

"In Pando, I guess," learned later that that is where those kid soldiers were headed for--when we passed on the road. They are dangerous to tackle and strong bodies of Glandelinian cavalry runs from them, but they have that little Nell hidden else any of our spies would have got her back all right. It is said that any one once rescued by those boy and girl scouts cannot never be taken again. It was said of that child slave brat Jannie, and not only has not been retaken but no one even knows where she is."

"A nice mess you have made of it," growled Manley angrily. "You should not have let those dangerous boy and girl scouts see her. You are right, you'll never get her again. Well!" he demanded, looking up as the office boy tapped timidly and then opened the door.

"Here's a general Huebaum you brother to see you your excellency," he announced.

"Good," exclaimed Manley. "Show him in. Sawden you'll have to step outside for awhile."

The spy obeyed. He evidently stood in considerable awe of general Manley, and showed no hesitation in carrying out the order. As he stepped out a man of the same dignified appearance as Manley stepped in. The new comer was general Huebaum Manley, the brother of John Manley. He was as we all know a bearded man as tall as John but more handsome looking but with the facial expression of a fox, a sharp shrewd inquisitive manner and a general air of dignification. As the door closed he gave his brother a crisp nod and then asked sharply:

"Any news from Pando--"

"None from the Christian lines. I don't know whether the spies I sent succeeded in getting a line on General Vivian's intentions or not, but I've just heard some bad news from that fellow you passed."

"Who is he?"

"His name is Sawden. He's the spy who had his confederates capture that little Nell Brat. He has just come in to tell me that the brats gone and curiously enough the people who have taken her are in some way connected with the Vivian girls, who are aiding general Vivian and their father as well."

"Phew. That's odd indeed. But that brat Nell is your personal affair, what I come to see you about in this, we've got to get general Vivian out of this territory of Podgla or we are in a hole we won't get out of. Where's Vivian advancing a portion of his army in that direction?"

"I know that just as well as you," said general Manley gloomily. "I sent to Father to advance his armies but he's too confounded slow. From what I've heard general Vivian is in a position that no one can be ousted from and he's got some sort of a gun device that ours as well as the Abbeianian governments are looking for. We know it's not patented yet and if only Jake and Adcliff succeed--"

"You haven't you have not heard from them yet?"

"Not a word, but they are reliable men and if it is possible to get hold of General Vivian's models or papers they will accomplish it."

"Look he's John" struck in the fox faced Huebaum Manley. "Do you know where he is to find you men in Pando--"

"Yes I can lay my finger on them at any time!" (oh Yeah)

"All right then you go to Pando. A you yourself at once. Take Sawden with you."

If mine and you and other vast Gardelinian armies are going to keep their heads above water, we've got to get the best of general Viviananna before Empereor Vivian throws in his own forces, and in this emergency forget that strange invention and give him battle at porinda. Get Mylertze to help you if Father is so slow paky in coming. We could never depend on him to help us. I'll tell him a thing or two when he comes. Viviananna won't retreat, so it is fast to drive him from his works by trickery if we can. Are you able to start for Pandorat once?"

"Yes. Yes right away practically. I agree with you that something must be done and done quick too."

And so it came about that half an hour later Manley and Lawden were sitting in disguise in a New Bedford and Pando - a rail road - rail road coach bound for Pando ra. As the train flew along Manley idly asked Lawden how his own pretended circus he had set up to fool Christian spies was getting along. "It ain't getting along at all," was the guff - re joice - re joice. Those confounded Christian boy and girls - coute - added the circus, and burned our tents and killed our wild animals and captured all the actors, because we sent that confounded girl they rescued in mid air - in a balloon. It seems we have had no luck after that girl Nell got rescued from us. It had been bad enough before that. Then we lost that big Lion Leo. He was a big drawing card, but the scouts captured the cage wagon, and sent it to a Park in Pando ra."

"So you was the only one who escaped the raid of those fierce boy and girls - coute?"

GI: "Accounts?"
 "Yes just duk ducked right out when the attacking parties came led by that confounded Penrod Prince. Guess my performance was a score bunch when they found that I'd left them in the lurch, when the attack came, but it couldn't be helped. They were only performers, I'm a spy and got to do my work for the glandelinian government, not what about this girl Nell Daisy Bell as she's called. You could know in a general way that she knows a lot about the cause of the great Abbelemnian or Abbeieenn disaster, and something that you don't want to see get into possession of the christian generals!"
 "Knows something about the Abbeieenn flood?" said Hanley with a sneering and sneering laugh. "She's got the orders I got concerning the disaster in her possession for she spied and swiped it on me, and confounded it she happened to be the only one who happened to get it, through many others tried hard."

As luck would have it White's wall was not a long one, but nevertheless he was bruised and shaken by it. Had it not been for the fact that he had tumbled into what underground near the house had been an old wine cellar that was floored with soft mould he might either have been killed or injured with a rather serious injury. As it was however his tumble through the open trap door which in the darkness he had not noticed in his haste to escape from the possessed house resulted in no injury to the lad though it was quite a fifteen foot fall. Suddenly he heard himself hailed from above.

"Say you kid, what's the trouble."

"Say you kid, what's the trouble?"

"I've fallen into a hole of some kind." He joined the boy much astonished astonished at hearing the voice, which was not an unfriendly one.

"Yes and I came mighty near following you. Wait untill I get a light from own house yonder and I'll see what I can mead to get you out of your trouble."

trouble." "How I wonder who on earth that can be," thought Walter, as he heard the one who had addressed him retreating across the street. "Could he have heard the screeches in the possessed house and seen me come out of it?" Before long the man was back with a lantern which he had lighted in his house. As he held it over the edge of the trap door, though which Walter had tumbled the boy gave a start. The man's face was painted white, and he had on a suit of loose white material with funny looking black miles stenciled all over it. The men peering over the edge of the hole saw the look of astonishment on Walter's face, and broke into a laugh.

astonishment on Wilfers' face, and broke into a laugh.
"I'll bet you are wondering what under the heavens sort of a chap
I am," he said. "Well I'm a Christian episcopite disguised as a clown and I was with that make believe show of awakens, but the boys and girls - I don't know - raided us and to escape them we dressed up as clowns and dug out with everything He's even took our clothes and I had to make a shift in this rig. They captured me too but when I proved who I am they - released me. And this I have on is all I have."

"On is all I have."
"Oh said Walter greatly relieved...."How come you knew I fell in the hole?"
"I heard all the noise in that possessed house, and saw you run out of there. That in the world was you doing in there lad! I thought you had more common sense than to go into that building. It's ~~even~~ against the law on account of its condition."

"Help me out M-r and I'll enlighten you on the matter."

"Help me out Mr. and I'll enlighten you on the matter."
"Sure. I look there is a so to ladder over there. Climb out and I'll tell you how, came to be here before you tell me you're, and then you can tell me something about you're self."

waiter lost no time in clambering up the rough contrivance for getting in and out of the wine cellar. Then he followed his newly found friend to his house on the ground floor into a magnificently furnished room.

house on the ground floor into a magnificent furnished room. "You were a fugitive from some one," said the man, "no doubt unintentionally those evil spirits of that house yonder got you out of quite a scrap or scrape didn't they?" and the man regarded the boy in uniform with a quizzical sort of look."

"I should say you're joined the boy." "If it had not unintentionally been for the demons I don't know what would have happened to me. I'm surprised surprised those wascally spies will not be possessed themselves now since they were in that place, but they almost scared the life out of me too." He added truthfully.

"Then he told the man what had happened to him.
"The noise from the house woke me," said the man. "I opened my window and listened with my ears wide open, and what I heard showed me mighty quick the two fellows who may be spies and who had been carrying off some bit of military material - sexuality was - were running from the house like sheep panic, and then a moment you later came out and fell in the pit, that ever the ~~the~~ evil spirits were it certainly worked."

"It certainly did" laughed Walter, "but it scared me as badly as it did the bad spy men, almost."

"Well it's hard to please every body as the feller said when they kicked at his carry ing limbu-ga-cheese on the street caput now tell us what you a-re doing he-a-o sonny."

Then Walter told him as much of his adventures as he thought advisable, when he had finished the clown exclaimed:

"So you a-re one of the child scouts that rescued that little girl from the ballett ballroom."

"And you are too the leader of the boy s who captu captu red Nell?"
 "Well at first not knowing it it was considere d a captu red prize untill Prince Penrod identified and claimed her You mean Nell Daisy Bell do you?"
 inquired Walt Waite

"Yea,

"What were the Glandelinians going to do to that pretty black haired child slave?"

"child slave?"

"child slave" nothing. Her name is Nell Anna Daisybell, and if she was questioned she would tell you and others things about AbbieAnn and the disaste. and show you papers too that would even make the eyes of the Princesses pop out of their heads in surprise."

"What do you mean?" asked Walter with a curious sense that the name of Hallie Daisy Hall was familiar to him somehow.

"Just this, and for the sake of our Country's cause, and for the princess's sake I don't mind telling about it, that little Nail be before she done this was stolen from her country home, by the Glandelinian cavalry under Colonel Melville about twenty to the count, under General Hanley."

Stenson and brought to the camps under general Manley.
"Why he's the general who's trying to steal the plans and invention of general Vivikhanha," exclaimed Walter.
"I don't know anything about any general invention," said the make-believe clown, "at this I know. I'm that kids father and I'm going to tell you what I can about that good kid of mine. He's got plenty of information to give to Emperor Vivikhan--and I don't care if Manley knows it. He can't get her no how since you captured her."

"How did you find this out?" asked Walter eagerly.
"Why I was in disguise in Manley's head quarters on the night that the kid was brought in to Manley. Manley gave the colonel a big sum of money for his services and then he hoped to keep her where no one would know."

was brought in to Manley. Manley gave the Colonel the information that he had captured my little girl, and Manley hoped to keep her where no one would know where she was. Then some how she must have overheard some strange conversation among the Glandelinian Generals, and as there was an easy chance to grab the girl, he decided to resist the temptation and did so. He had them all among the Glandelinian Generals, and as the the papers she couldn't resist the temptation and did so. He had them all the time on her son even when the spies were taking her to General Fede - ails army and they did not know it. Manley suspected some Christian Fede - ails army and they did not know it. Manley suspected some Christian

[illegible]

"But had not the little girl any friends?" asked Walter.
"A girl like she has many friends so I heard but particularly I heard them talking about a general foreign name--" "Wasn't the name general Kinds--" asked Walter-- "re collecting the mysterious hint about Nell which Mr. Andrews had thrown out...."

"Yes that was the name sure enough. It seems that this great general Kinds-nine has great plans of his own or something, but Henry said he'd been satisfied if the little girl was put to death by burning at the stake." Walter wondered greatly how it was that Mr. Andrews could have had the suspicion--which he evidently had--that little Nell had accomplished something that no Christian spy had even dared to undertake, but he was not to find this out until later. After some more discussion of little Nell's strange history, and Walter wondering how Penrod came to be acquainted with her in Abbeism, the lad suggested that they should go out and try to find his horse and ride at once for Emperor-Vivian's headquarters, but his new found friend, whose name was Richard Daisy Bell pointed out that in such a darkness on this night had, they would have a hard job to find the horse, and might get lost into the bargain.

"My idea would be to wait until daylight," he said. "In the meantime I'll get my wife to get us something to eat. Then we can take a nap until it gets light..."

Walter agreed to this and soon there was a good hot supper on the table. But Walter almost lost all interest in the supper when the man showed him something which little Nell had sent him. As the boy saw it he gave a cry of joy and he eagerly investigated the discovery. It was some plan of Abbeism. As Walter clasped it, and then fell to gathering up the plans he was fully burning over with joy.

"I say I've got what Violet and her sisters no at all prayed for," he kept gleefully repeating. "How they can go ahead and indict Glandelinia and prove she is the guilty one."

Richard Daisy Bell seemed as joyous as the boy over the discovery. "That possessed house certainly brought good luck all around," he said. As he spoke a noise behind them made them look around. Walter almost uttered a cry as he found himself looking straight in the muzzle of a revolver held by a Glandelinian spy. Another had Richard similarly covered.

"You began crowing too soon my young master," sneered the man with a contemptuous smile. "Now just hand over those plans, and hurry up about it quick too. Walter instead of obeying sprang like a wild cat his two hands as quick as lightning grasping the hand of each man that held the two of course Walter was only a lad but it was surprising to know the strength he had. He held each wrist in such a vise like grip that the two fellows yelled in pain and dropped the guns. Then Richard sprang in and the fellows were securely bound by a rope, rope soldiers called and the revengeful soldiers were taken away. It was the same two men too who had surprised him on the horse. They had been two to one this time to say against Walter but what was they to do when he leaped and grasped their gun hand wrists. It was a bitter thing to have to acknowledge, but the boy had triumphed. Silently and with flashing angry eyes they glanced at the boy as they were carried away. They had to admit they were beaten, badly beaten too, and by a boy.

Emperor-Vivian was standing on the porch of James Andrews home the next morning, and Jack Evans was with him. By his right side was little Nell pale and a bit shaky from her trying experience with the Glandelinians but with a more happy and glad look on her pretty face. The news of the safety of the Vivian girls and Penrod had heartened her up immensely. All at once a street car stopped near the very house, and two boys and seven little girls whom they recognized as Violet and her sisters and Penrod and James got off.

"I wonder where Walter is?" questioned Evans, and Nell looked up at him. Violet and her sisters were the first to enter the yard followed by the two boys. The next minute after greetings had been exchanged and loving ones at that Penrod and the little girls and James too were asking the same question. "Why he left here last night?" "Didn't he arrive?" "Yes," exclaimed Emperor-Vivian. "Didn't he arrive?" "No," we have not seen a sign of him," said Penrod looking worried. "I thought at first it may be he changed his mind thinking it wise for us to come. So this morning we hurriedly took a street car and came down." "What could have happened?" exclaimed James anxiously while Violet and her sisters looked frightened.

"I'll bet those rascals are mixed up in it some way," cried Penrod.

"Oh what can we do to find him?" said Violet.

She and her sisters were evidently distressed, indeed Penrod never seen them so distressed before. He too was greatly worried for he had liked Walter--Staring very much.

"I wonder," said James Andrews "if he didn't get mixed up in the address and go to the wrong place, and then finding his mistake get mixed up so he got lost."

"That isn't possible," said Violet for at the phone when I gave him the address he told me to wait till he got a paper and pen pencil and wrote it down. "He must have been waylaid by some of those spies and--"

"Wait a moment things may not be as bad as you imagine," said Emperor-Vivian. "It can be possible as sometimes happen that he may have forgotten to take the piece of paper with him and--"

"The-- comes somebody on horse back and fast too," said James who had been looking down the road. The word had hardly left his lips before down the road from the opposite direction to that from which Violet and her sisters and the two boys had come--arrived, there came a cloud of dust and at times a horse's head was visible. Penrod recognized the horse's head in a flash.

"It's Jane Walter," Walter's horse," he exclaimed and then the next instant-- "Walter is in it. Thank God. Where can he have been?"

"I'll bet he did make a mistake after all in looking for us," giggled Jennie. "Poor Walter!"

"And who is that with him?" wondered Jack Evans.

"Why, why it's a clown," gasped little Nell but in a childish laugh.

"Why why?" she exclaimed joyfully a moment later. "It's it's my dear papa from spy line on Adams Circus, the only man who was kind to me in that whole company that can be doing with your friend Walter!" A few minutes passed and the horse then stopped at the gate, and Walter dismounted and rushed in, and he was soon clasping the hands of the others. Nellie too was doing for joy, while in the back ground ground Emperor-Vivian and Evans looked on. To the surprise of all, when they asked why he didn't come to them his story was soon told.

"We found the horse near the possessed house as soon as it was daylight," he said, "at the men who took me prisoner and then fled at the phenomenon had tinkered with the horse shoes of the horse, so that carefully I had to bring him to a blacksmith and it took him some time to fix them up. And that's all that he's done, the two men are captured, and we have some important papers in our possession."

"You are just like us," said Jennie a little teasingly. "Always getting captured and escaping. Those demons if they really were those unintentionally helped you out."

"But they sure scared us some," said Walter.

"How could they?" said Emperor-Vivian consolingly. "Maybe we'll get the little girls to clear the place of those evil spirits. They succeeded in two places already."

But Violet shook her head.

"I guess not I'm afraid this time," she said. "We don't want to occupy the place and we have too much other things. If the old spirits want the place let them keep it. We won't go in and dispute them."

"But I'll bet you could drive them out," said Jack Evans. "You did in the other two places."

James Andrews looked at Violet and her sisters in great surprise and couldn't find word to say anything. Violet looked at Evans and giggled.

"You think we are scared?" she asked.

"No, no," he hesitated to say. But you have done it all ready twice."

"But why should we interfere with them in that building. We don't want the old place," said Jennie. "If they came to James house we'd show them something. But it is not for us to interfere. The result's not our headquarters. But if you want us to try it we're game."

"I guess it's wise to keep out for they'll make you lots of trouble," said Walter. "It's worse than the other place where you had been troubled. But little Nell's father here has something he wants to tell you all."

"No tell us," said the Emperor-Vivian in wondering tones looking at the very eccentric figure of the make believe clown, who was talking apart with little Nell. "Yes it concerns Nell's horse!" "If I'm not mistaken you'll ready suspect her to be more than an ordinary little girl."

"Frankly I do," was the rejoinder. "He gave me some plans on which on one page was a peculiar mark in the shape of a large wingless with a code letter letters on it. I never recall have ever seen such a peculiarity and yet the code reader said it had something to do with Abbeism."

"Where could it be?" said Emperor-Vivian. "Exclaimed Walter much to the surprise of the Emperor and Evans, the latter of whom had started at the name of

"Well Daisy Bell. Well you are making yourself famous & are going to be. It's all the same, I say."

Of course until Walter's story had been told the rest of the party could not make out Walter's delight, but it appeared accordingly to Penrod that it would be a difficult matter to prove whether the little Nell would be safe from the enemy or not since what she had done and in the meantime much had to be done. The fact that it was General Manley who was to the main one concerned in trying to spoil the plans of General Vivian was another complication, and truly Manley was not a man to be outwitted either. There was never a day that he really didn't even hoodwink Violet and her sisters and often they admitted it.

A Conference was held at which it was decided that for the present Nell would remain under the care of General Vivian himself. In the meantime the others would go through many parts of Pandora and try to get on the track of the desperate Glandelinian spies. Before they departed however Nell's father was fitted with an old suit of General Vivian's himself, and proved to be a very good Abissinian with a very grave and serious countenance.

A clown would have been the last thing you would have taken him for, and in fact he was no clown either. He posed on one to spy on the spies who ran the pretended circus.

From Pandora General Vivian was fully apprised of the recent happenings, and knowing that such things really would have happened he begged the Vivian girls not to run into any unnecessary dangers.

General Luckwick Baldwin another staunch friend of the Vivian girls had returned from his military business in Agathia, to resume command of his fighting army he said, and had expressed his desire that as the girls had secured the model of the machine and as it was in the safe keeping of their father they should not bother about the spies, as the spies were too dangerous and those kind were impossible to be captured alive any way. As general Luckwick himself had a good deal of military work to attend to and as a big battle was soon coming he did not come to Pandora as expected. Little Nell rather side with them to the barn where they put up their horses and then left them, promising to call at their headquarters later in the day.

Having seen their horses put up Violet and her sisters and Penrod too started out for the Gemini headquarters in Pandora. There they were informed that not a trace had been found of the men who had given them so much trouble. Walter himself then related what had occurred in the Possessed house. "So they dared to hang out in that old place," exclaimed the chief official of the Gemini to whom he communicated this information. "Well I don't think the same ones will come back there again, but I'll send a couple of strong-armed men out there immediately to search the place completely and bring two priests along to keep the evil spirits at bay. We may light on a clew."

He went on to inform them that every station in Pandora would be guarded, and that had no chance to capture the men supposing them to be in the city would be neglected.

"Well I suppose we will have to be content with that," said Walter as they left. It's tough to think that those men may right be in the city now and yet we can do nothing."

"I should think it more likely that they would be in Podgie by now," said Penrod. "And after what a scare they received in that abandoned mansion as you said Walter it would be my idea that they would try to get as far away from this vicinity as possible, knowing that maybe even the evil spirits besides us would be on their trail. It is said evil spirits trail the wicked."

The boys and girls walked on through the streets, looking into shop windows and especially into those in which mechanical apparatus was displayed. But this began to pall after a while, and Penrod suggested that they talk a short while along the river wharves. The rest readily agreed, for Violet and her sisters were always tremendously interested in shipping, and each a man in a man they set out to visit one of the most interesting quarters of the Pandora "Hub".

The A & B wharf, where the river war river cruisers lie, particularly attracted their attention, and they were gazing with interest at a smart looking river war craft attached to a smart schooner unloading her finny freight when a familiar voice struck on their ears. "Why hello you beautiful little girls, and three boys, what in the world you doing here?"

They turned a little startled and found themselves gazing into the frank bronzed face of Captain Andrews big brought brother of James Andrews, and skippers of one of the big river war frigates, who had shared their adventures during the time James helped Violet and her sisters to escape the many unseen spies who were after them. 2.2.2

The captain indeed was unaffectedly glad to see his young ship mates again and asked them many questions about themselves since the time they left the big war frigate. He had that Admiral Johnson's fleet had progressed exceedingly, and now were aided by a number of big steel battleships, besides fast submarines all engaged in keeping the river open for the Christian shipping. He was so eager to unfold the story of his progress and the progress of the admiral that he did not at first notice that neither of the boys nor the little girls looked particularly cheerful.

"What's in the wind, ship mates?" he demanded. "You look as down in the mouth as a hooked cod fish..."

"As bad as all that (get on you what)" grinned Penrod. "Well Captain there is a reason, and a good one too?"

"What's up? Have a head and spin you yarn. If it's anything I can help you out of since you did so much for the fleet and you dear sisters, trust me to do all I can."

His manner invited confidence, and seating themselves beside the veteran of one of the Christian war dogs on an upturned box, Penrod poured out the story of their troubles.

"Well if that don't beat a big novel," exclaimed the captain when he had finished. "And those Glandelinian spies are still in Pandora do you think?"

"We don't know," he joined Penrod. "We have really no way of finding out, and the soldier, and Gemini, and sad to say even the child scouts are as helpless as we are."

"Oh the Gemini are pretty good, and if they can't do anything to help you then you've ran across a pretty close band of foe spies."

"We have even tried to get the military police to help us," said James Andrews.

"Oh the military police are always no more use than a lot of babies," declared Captain Andrews. "For what you have done I'd back you girls and boys against any military spy or detective I ever saw or heard of."

"That's very good of you," laughed Walter. "But..."

"We are afraid we have proved the kind of military detectives that don't detect" interrupted Violet.

"Don't be down cast my brave children," counselled the captain heartily. "I'll trust to your friend James Andrews here my youngest brother. He pulled you little girls out of a desperate scrape before, and he'll help you get those close spies. When things seem at the worst, it is generally the time they begin to mend. I'll spin you a yarn about that if you like."

"I wish you would," said Jennie. "I'll pass the time away pleasantly and make us forget our troubles."

"Back sixteen years ago I was mate of the war craft I am not Captain of," began the captain. "We sailed out of Pandora on the fifth of December bound for Agathia. Two days out we ran into as nasty a sample of blizzard and cold wave weather as I ever saw. We lost our main mast in the gale up the river and two of the men were killed in its fall. Then when the big blizzard had blown itself out, the captain took sick, and worse than that we got stuck in ice and our provisions began to get low. Then one night the ship took fire, and we..."

"Dash my lee scupper what's up now?" exclaimed the amazed captain, as Penrod and James Andrews suddenly leaped to their feet and dashed off followed by his sisters and then Walter, leaving him in the most exciting part of the story.

"It's two of those men, the one they go look," shouted Penrod, flinging back the words as he ran. It was indeed two of those Glandelinian spies. They turned as they heard the boy's shout, and then recognizing the whole party took to their heels. The child ran in and out amid the maze of traffic, and for a time it kept the two spies in sight. But finally in the crush and crowd they lost them and had to admit that there was little likelihood of their ever finding them again. Regretfully they retraced their steps, but on their return they found that captain Andrews had been called away on business, leaving word with the men on board the cruiser that he would visit them at their headquarters later in the day.

"We do seem to have the very worst sort of luck," declared Walter as the three lads followed the little girls back toward their own headquarters. "If only we could have caught up with those two spies."

"You prince made a big mistake when you shouted out as you did," said James. "If we had followed them in silence we might have managed to track them to where ever they have their hang out."

Penrod reluctantly agreed that this was so.

"But just the same," he added. "We do have hard luck, and for the sake of the good little girls more than our fair share of it, but those confounded spies are close and daring."

After lunch they set out for General Evans headquarters, having already telephoned to the military police office that the spies were actually in Pandora, and that two of them out of the five they had encountered were still at large. Just as they were leaving the place where they telephoned however, they met with unexpected interruption of their plans. Richard Daley Bell hurried up to them, his ordinary grave face flushed and excited.

"I've news," he exclaimed "great news."
"You've found those men?" asked Penrod and the two boys in the same breath, while Violet and her sisters looked on curiously.
"I've done far better than I do you suppose I've seen?"
"I have not the least idea," said James Andrews. "Maybe"----- "Nobody less than John Manley, and with him was one of those spies himself."
"General John Manley here in Pandora in disguise," gasped every one of the children in one breath.
"Yes."

"He must be going to meet the other two spies," said Violet.
"I don't know but I did better than just seeing them. I followed them. I traced them to an old tumble down livey barn on St. Clements Avenue. They are there now I guess. I ran all the way here to tell you, and I'm most out of breath."
"Good work," Exp exclaimed Penrod. "If only we could capture that general. It looks as if the net was closing in about those glandelinians after all. Come on angels, and you two boys, we'll hurry to head quarters, get our boy and girls scouts and go down there. We'll bag the whole gang in a bunch."
"That's the idea," cried Walter, but hurry up we have no time to lose. Play Glory Be to God. I feel better than I have for many a day. Things are coming out our way at last."

In the livey stable of a St. Clements street, sat four men. They were grouped about a large table in a small room in the rear of the place for the stable now was what was sometimes known here as a "blind" and the place unknown to the city, was the resort of all sorts of unprincipled characters of dangerous glandelinian spies who had reason to fear the christian forces of law and order. On the table was a little of very important papers, typewritten military specifications and strange code like yellow red and blue points but the most conspicuous object was a wide and long white envelope. One of the men was General John Manley, and the identity of the others may be easily guessed. They were the spies, hidden among them.

"Well you Excellency have we earned our rank?" asked Lawden as Manley paused in his interested scrutiny of the papers and the big envelope.
"You bet you have," he exclaimed enthusiastically "and as soon as we have a contract with the christian government I'll give you a bonus as well, why with these plans and the important papers in the envelope you have secured it will be easy to force General Vivianann to retreat from Podgie and give Myletze a chance to advance on Pandora and hold us. That a fool he was not to have his spies watch us closely. Now we have all the benefits for nothing, despite the interference of those brats the Vivian girls."

"But you Excellency" interrupted Lawden "how are you going to get the stuff to Pandora. There is a hunt for us on in the city, and I guess by this time you are being looked for too, and outside the christian camps there are so many scout patrols, men and child scouts that it'll seem impossible to get through."

For Lawden had discovered that his letter had not been delivered, and readily guessed that it might have fallen into little Nellie's hands, and from her passed to the possession of Violet and her sisters and their Father.

"I've arranged for all that," said Manley. "The military of the Nationals may guard all the railway and other stations; but we won't go by train. I know a man here who has a fast motorboat of good size and well armed, and as long as he won't know us, he'll take us any where for a small sum of money. He'll take us down the coast of the river ways and then put us ashore near Podgie. We could go toward Depressionville where the action is still going on. We will then separate and each Podgie command by different routes."

"That's one of the best plans ever," said Lawden approvingly. "I'll bet by this time we have those Vivian girls fooled and outwitted for good and all and their confounded prince of a brother too. Does this fellow with the boat know that you are going to hire it?"
"Yes I thought it best to be prepared for emergency, and so I have arranged for the boat to meet us that Allgrove Wharf. That's some distance from the main or regular shipping place, and to avoid attracting attention to us I've hired a spy to try and make a big Allgrove Wharf fire."

"And that old Forligner Frank Harvey more wicked than us has the disguise for us," so he said," added Lawden. "Oh Frank!" he cried raising his voice. In response a pug-nosed red faced man of a strange unusually low rough type for such a good city shuffled in.

"Well sir what do you want?" he demanded in glandelinian....2.2.2.22
"Did you secure those disguises as you said?"
"Sure indeed sir. They are upstairs in the upper room where, sleep. Do you need to put them on now?"
"I believe it has to be," said Manley. "There is no knowing how soon some of that christian out fit may cross our trail" (not tall) and we don't want to get caught napping."

"All right go right up to my room," Lawden knows the way," said Frank, the crank, who although as he posed as the owner of the stable and though not really a notorious rascal was nevertheless in favor of the wicked glandelinian cause, and secretly helped glandelinian spies, and for nothing nothing too.

Half an hour after the four glandelinians had taken their way upstairs they reappeared again. But indeed how altered! If alterations can be confirmed. Lawden who was a great adept at such a sort of work as disguise, disguising himself had excelled himself at this work. Manley's small mustache had been shaven off, and he had discarded his uniform and was rigged out like a big bloated, broken down drunken old street car driver, and the other man had the semblance as a man who had seen hard days, and the fourth appeared to be a seedy downy heels forligner with an untidy black beard.

"Great" exclaimed Harvey as he viewed them. "your own friends and even mothers wouldn't know you, and that's the truth too."

At this moment there came a loud vigorous knocking at the door of the great stable, which was closed and locked. Harvey darted to a peephole in the front of the place, constructed for the purpose of spying.

"Great scott men!" he exclaimed the next instant in a low tense whisper. "It's the princesses and prince kids you were talking about, with nearly a score of boy and girls scouts fully armed just dismounting from horses. The prince is at the door. They're not in uniform but I'd know a child scout any where."

Instant conversation revealed a org the among the glandelinian conspirators. put Lawden who alone remained cool, spoke up quickly.

"Say Harvey is the old get away still working?" he asked quickly...
"Yes indeed it is. You know where it is. It leads out on the main alley. There's no way for you enemies to get round there."

"Good, follow me comrades and we'll fool that bunch of little christian dogs yet," exclaimed Lawden darting to the rear of the big barn, while Frank Harvey called out in a surprised voice;

"Who are you out there you kids? That in thunder do you want?"

"It's the military boy and girls scout police patrol. Open this door instantly do you hear?" came a sharp boyish voice in the outside.

"All right. All right anything to oblige you," and Frank shuffled toward the door, "that's up you kids. That in the world do you want here?" he demanded as he opened it slowly.

"To search this stable of yours. Some suspected glandelinian spies have been traced here, and if we find you have sheltered them you'll be deported. spoke up one of the Vivian girls he self who happened to be Angeline.

"Here!" exclaimed Harvey, in well simulated amazement "glandelinian spies in my stable? you must be mistaken."

"Oh no we are not and we found out that you are too well known by us to be fooled by you. Stand aside."

And she and her sisters the first to enter gave Harvey a rough unlady like shove that sent him spinning to one side and entered the place, followed by Penrod and a few of the scouts. But as we know the spies had flown for not a trace of them could be found. The "get away" as Lawden called it a secret door in the back of the place leading out on an alley was too cunningly constructed even to catch their attention.

"The what did I tell you kids?" grinned old Harvey when they had finished and discovered that they had drawn a "blank" as hunters usually say. "It's too bad to do anything like this now in this city. Why if every body heard of it that by stable was searched for glandelinian spies who ain't here it would give me a bad reputation."

"We are sure we all know you and that even though you may not be an old rascal your heart is for glandelinian," exclaimed Penrod "but you are too foxy to get into the toils of the Abbelemian military laws. If you are found guilty of he-becoming Glandelinian soldier-spies you'll be deported.

We don't want foreigners here any more."

"On my, oh my, now you kids do talk," exclaimed old Harvey looking as if he really was grievously un-enthralled insulted by the saying that he even though he was a foreigner was not an honest and upright citizen. "Well, there's no doubt in my mind that the men were here," said Walter Starling, regretfully turning to his companions, "but they have gone and covered up their tracks mighty well too."

"We've had luck than war," growled out Penrod gritting his teeth, and just when we thought we had them too and had captured that John Manley in the bargain I don't suppose we'll ever see them again now."
"It is not likely a," admitted Walter, "from what we have seen, they must be a band of slick fellows all right, and desperate too. If they were a cornered I don't believe they would be captured alive. They resist us, and use the last bullet on themselves."

"But suppose General Manley starts to work out his plans and makes a general move of disastrous consequences upon General Viviananna, can't he be stopped?" asked James Andrews, while Violet and her sisters could find no word to speak they were so crushed with their disappointment.
General Jack Evans (on the ambrose) says that such a slick and well experienced Glandelinian general as he is would make just enough alterations in his plans since little Nell outwitted him, so that it wouldn't be possible for General Viviananna to hold his position, so if Manley has plans in his possession, there's an end of it."

I noted this speech was the contribution of James Andrews, who had talked with Emperor Vivian on this subject. There being nothing more to be done at the stable stable they stayed away or went away followed by a sarcastic grin from old Harvey.

"You little brats won't never catch an old bird like me by putting salt on his tail," he chuckled. "I wonder if them fellows took the important papers and the big envelope they set so much store by? Looked like so much junk to me but I guess it must be valuable to them cause all right."

He peeped into the room where the consultation of the spies had been held and found that the envelopes, and the papers had been taken. Jawden in fact in his dash for the alley had taken the envelope and placed it in his inside coat pocket, while Manley had grabbed up the papers.

"We ought to have arrested that old codger," said James as they were waiting for a street car, while the scouts went off some where else to perform a new duty. "He is suspicious any way. He must have let those spies escape through some secret place in the barn."

"If that is so," said Penrod, "let's go back and see."
"No, no it don't pay to waste time on that now," protested James. "We couldn't get anything on that old skunk any how. The enemy had flown and that's all there is to it."

"And we couldn't do nothing to him unless we have evidence," put in Violet. "Yes," said Jennie, "we have suspicions of him but no evidence. That won't help much and we can't condemn any one with out evidence."
"Surely you could take the matter in your own hands being princesses," protested James.

"I don't mean that," said Jennie. "We can't do a thing without evidence. If we had evidence we'd see to his deportation right away or hold him as a prisoner of enemy spies. It's not just to do those things when we have no evidence. He's come the street car now."

At home they told their father, Emperor Vivian of the escape of the spies and how they believed the old man had aided them. Secretly having learned the address from them, Emperor Vivian had the old man watched and watched closely. The little girls with the three boys were sitting in their room that afternoon pondering fresh plans, when Mr. Andrews came in and said:
"One of you is wanted instantly on the phone. Important message from a man who seems to be a sea captain."

By his sister Penrod was asked to answer they all following in the room to find out the details.

"This is Captain Henry Andrews," came a voice at the other end when Penrod answered it. "By the great horn spoon bill but I've most valuable information for you princely children. It concerns those Glandelinian spy lubbers who have the plans in their possession."

"Mysterious," cried Penrod, "is that so? Where can we see you?"

"You wait at your headquarters and I'll be up," was the reply. "If my information is right those spies are about to slip through your fingers again."

"By ginge not this time if it's humanely possible to catch them" his sister and two boy friends heard him say to himself as he hung up the receiver.

He then explained to them and finished with:

"Well, follow them no matter where the chance may take us. They won't get the best of me. In the meantime I'll order General King Kinde-nine to strike a blow at Podge while the Glandelinian commander Manley is absent. He's a spy for Section No. eleven and got General Kinde-nine on the phone."

"This General Kinde-nine, well this is Prince Penrod talking. Manley's army is without a head. Manley is a fugitive and a spy in Podge's hands somewhere. Strike his army a blow if possible before he gets a back."

"Right, I will wait the answer right away or tomorrow."

"As soon as you can make the attack. Delay not a minute if possible. Hu-ry."

"All right," and General Kinde-nine hung up.

Now where the chase was to take them neither of the royal group of kids dreamed at that moment but they were on the eve of a very adventurous incident of their lives if not one of the most.

Captain Andrews burst into their headquarters a short time later like a bombshell, scattering boys and girls and guests in his mad dash rush to reach the Princesses and the three boys who were waiting him in the reception room.

"If you want to catch those rascally spy fellows you must come with me immediately," he exclaimed panting. "They've gone down the river in Captain Spiffledink's motor boat. They've fooled him in thin king they were Christian officials. They started about half an hour ago; but if we hurry I'll go after them, follow them in mine, and there is a chance we can overhaulk them or at least keep track of them."

Of course the reference to Spiffledink's boat was so much Greek to Penrod but the captain would not explain any more just then.

"Don't waste time talking now," he exclaimed. "I'll tell you about it as we go a long, give my top an ile, but they'll get away if we don't hurry."
There was evidence enough from all this, that there was not a minute to be lost, and the little girls, and their brother and two boy friends who all had their hats on followed the energetic energetic seaman out of their own headquarters without an instant's hesitation. Outside was a row of horse-drawn swift horse taxicabs. Penrod engaged one of these big enough to hold all his followers and they started off for the main River Wharf at a rattling speed. As they spurned a long the captain explained how he had got upon the track of the gang of Glandelinian spies.

"This captain Spiffledink is a foreigner and a regular shark," he declared and though he seems to have a good reputation along the whole water front he'll do anything for money. Well as I was standing on the end of the wharf, slipping wharf where he keeps his boat in the Crab, and a good fast clipper she is too. I saw him meet seventeen precious steady looking chaps. The one known as Manley however was not among them. One looked like an old bum and the rest were as bad. Too I don't know why I saw a dreadfully dreadfully big cloud of smoke fur the off and learned that a big wharf fire was raging and that some spies were suspected. "That's in the wind now!" I thought and as they came toward me I slipped in behind a high pile of wooden ware house boxes, for I didn't want Spiffledink to see me and was curious to know what he was doing with that outfit of Glandelinian spies. Well as luck would have it, they stopped just the other side of the box pile, and I could hear some of what they said. I heard enough to convince me that they were the Glandelinian chaps you were so hard after, in disguise, and then I jumped for a telephone."

Violet, and her sisters and the three boys, gasped in their eagerness to hear more.

"Oh, we're there all the way!" demanded Penrod.

"Well there were seventeen of them. And they've got some very important plans with them too. I heard one of em chap called Jawden laughing about the way they tricked you by sneaking out of a stable by a secret back door in an old man's stable."

"So the rascals were there after all," explained Penrod with a frown that was menacing. "Well if that does not beat all, and after all Harvey was sheltering them and aided them to escape. Well after we capture those spies if we do Harvey will find himself under arrest."

"Well when I came back from phoning you what should I see but the Crab put me out into the stream. Right then and there I started for the headquarters of your fathers, and there's a chance--if God wills it--just a chance--that we may catch them yet. You see from what I heard they were fugitive fighting on not sailing until tomorrow, but I guessed they charged their minds."

"Leaping lizard," exclaimed Violet. "This is war work with a vengeance indeed. You did not overhear any one of them say where they were bound for captain."

did you!!!!!! "Huh? AA '(((())

"Yes East Podge, one of them said it. But here's the wharf. See far over there to the north, that big cloud of smoke and the stream of water from fire hoses. One of the fellows made the fire to throw off per suit. Come on pile out. Penrod you pay the cabman, and I'll pay you back on the motorboat, as I got to get the old Sea meow ready."

When the girls and boys joined the captain once more they found him busied over the engine of a long good looking milita-motorboat more like a cabin re venue cutter about sixty feet in length and armed with machine guns.

"Will you be ready right away?" inquired Penrod "Because if not I guess we ought to phone Father. He'll be anxious if we are missing without any explanation and we don't want him to be worrying."

"All right my dear Royal friends, you'll have time for that but hurry."

Penrod however went by himself the boat staying with the sea or river captain. In five minutes Penrod was back, and Captain Andrews announced that all was ready, urging the wait for Penrod, Violet and her sisters had watched the big clouds of smoke from the wharf fire and wondered how one spy could have set a blaze so big. There was so much smoke it resembled to them one of those big volcanic eruptions they had seen. After Penrod's arrival no time was lost in casting off, and in five minutes more the River Meow was headed down: down not a m. A long chase had begun and one that was to prove remarkable in more ways than one. They were headed in such a direction that it was evident they would have to pass the fire, and so in case fire tugs were in the river the captain told Violet that they would have to show their royal flag, or because of the fire lines across the river they would not be permitted to pass.

"Seems queer doesn't it?" remarked James "no think that only short time ago we were sitting in the room of my home, thinking we had lost the trail for good and all, and here we are hot on it again, only by sea instead of land or by river rather."

"It does agree with Walter's Starling, and see we are nearing the fire. My what a big one too. Van a big row of freight boxcars, and two ships are burning too."

It was indeed a big fire but though Violet and her sisters watched it and were so captivated by it as they approached nearer, the boys were too busy to watch it, and Penrod was looking after the engine, while Captain Andrews steered. The motor of the River Meow was a powerful ten cylinder ten cycle one, developing the speed of a fast express limited train. This made the River Meow unusually fast for a craft of her size and class but the children had recalled that Captain Andrews had told them that the Crab was a swift craft also but not armed.

They were soon near the place where the fire actually was, and as they drew near enough, they saw that the whole wharf in that locality, and a long low row of buildings, and all sorts of boxes and other material on the wharf and even cars and three big ships were all burning sending up toward the sky an enormous rolling wall of smoke at times pierced by flame. A line of fire tugs were pouring streams of water on the blaze but to no effect. But there was to be no stopping on their part to watch even such a spectacular fire for they were bent on capturing, if possible, those spies. They had to toot the whistle of the boat three times before the fire line was lifted for them, and then they went on at a much faster speed. Twilight, with a great red glow in the sky behind them, found the River Meow well off down the great stream. Penrod was riding as you would call it a "swelling seat". James Andrews who was on the lookout, was the first to sight some five miles ahead of them, a motorboat.

"Can that be the Crab?" he exclaimed pointing.

"Here take the wheel a moment while I overhaul her," said Captain Andrews eagerly.

He dived into the cabin and re appeared with a pair of strong binoculars. He focused these on the distant craft and after a brief scrutiny announced that it was beyond doubt the Crab that they had sighted, and that to his astonishment it was armed with a big long range gun, which he had not seen on it before.

"He must have had some sort of engine trouble," he declared "Or she would have made better time than this."

"Can we overhaul her do you think?" questioned Penrod anxiously.

Captain Andrews shook his head doubtfully.

"When if she had to slow down for a time, she is creeping ahead now, but maybe if all goes well we can keep on her track through the night. For some thing we know she is bound for East Podge, and, could find my way there blindfolded...."

"Perhaps I could fix your engine so that it will give us a little more" speed. "volunteered Penrod.

"But could you do it?"

"My brother ought to be able to," said Jennie Vivian a little saucily. "Seeing as how he saved our lives in a submarine sunk below the water when nobody else could do it, and it was getting all right."

"So Well I wish you could Prince," responded the River captain, taking the wheel from James.

"I'll do what I can," promised Penrod.

He fell to work on the motor and found that by readjusting the carburetor he could coax more speed out of it. By this time it was dark, though in the distance to their rear it seemed as if half the horizon was lighted up by the glare of the big wharf fire. Penrod having finished his work on the motor, went forward with the running lights. Soon they were shining out like twin jewels--red to port--and green to starboard. Then he set the stern light and coming back eagerly looked into the night ahead of them. All at once through the darkness a white light flashed up and instantly vanished only to reappear again as the Crab rose on a river wave crest.

"So long as we keep that bright white light in sight" we are all right," declared Captain Andrews, and resigning the wheel to Penrod now who wished to take his turn he went below to prepare supper which meal Violet and her sisters first ate, and the others in a ways. Coming on deck after his meal Penrod saw to his astonishment that the big dancing white light ahead of them was much closer than it had been before he went below. This no doubt meant they were overhauling the Crab.

"We are creeping right up on her," declared Captain Andrews, which Penrod mentioned this fact to him. "We ought to be alongside in half an hour if we keep at this gait."

The words sent a thrill through them all as Penrod said; "That means a fight" and their hearts beat pretty fast.

"That's what it does Prince," returned the doughty captain "but we are all well armed, and we've got the military law on our side--don't forget that."

"No, and we don't forget that there are seventeen of them, against our eleven," added Violet, with a grim smile. As they crept closer, Walter was apprised of the turn events were now taking. They looked over their weapons.

"Without necessity I don't approve of fire a-m-s; fists is my way of fighting," Penrod said. "But we are going up against a gang of spy sharks that are desperate, and we may have to fight with guns."

Silence fell on the party as they slowly but surely crept on the bobbing dancing light ahead. As they came within hailing distance Captain Andrews boomed out a hail;

"Crab a hoy."

"But there came no answer to him."

"Looks as if they are going to cut up very rough," declared the captain. "All there is nothing for us to do but heave up alongside and board them."

You little girls are not a little scared are you. If not all right, if you are a better not get into the scrap."

"Not a bit," said Violet. "We are always too hot to get at all Glandelinians who in the past and future have and will cause us so much trouble."

Now we are scared of them."

Captain Andrews spun his wheel over and prepared to be a-down on the light but as he drew up close to it, a bewildered puzzled look passed over his face. At the same instant little Daisy spoke;

"Isn't there something rather strange and off odd about that light captain and r-ews?"

"Just what I was thinking little Princess don't it's too low down in the water to be at the end of a boat, and by --- by the great ho-mapp on horn spoon bill. Those spies have fooled, trick us.."

"Why what's the matter?" put in Jennie while all looked curiously at the light and then saw what it was even though the captain said;

"That lit light's nothing more than a lantern set adrift in a bait tub."

And so it was as they had seen as he spoke. The wily party on board the Crab had certainly played a successful trick on the desperado. Extinguish the light, they had set the lantern on a big bait tub, dropped it carefully overboard and cast it loose to drift at its own sweet will.

"So for the last four hours we have been following a will o' the wisp."

"What you call it," groaned Penrod dimly.

"Looks that way," agreed the captain. "Confound it all we might have surely known that they'd be up to some trick as that--such a ship load of desperate spies."

He shoved back his cap and scratched his head...
 "Well child - a n" he said "It's a game of blind man's bluff from now on, do you want to take a chance or go back."
 "While there's one left we'll take it at any cost," declared Violet stoutly.
 "We never give up unless it is hopeless."
 "I wonder how far east ray that old tub led us," mused Walter a few minutes later, when they were once more on their course.
 "Impossible to say for sure," said the captain, "but a light tub like that would drift fast and their trick trick will have given those spy lubbers a big lead on us."

"Not much doubt of that I'm afraid," agreed Penrod.
 "But we may as well keep right on now," said Argline.
 "Possibly we'll track or get track of them at East Podgie," added Hettie.
 With only this hope to buoy them through the long night hours, they all clung to the machine trail. All of them were too excited to sleep and so they took turns on turn about at steering, with Penrod attending to the engine and keeping a lookout. As the first gray warning of dawn came on the eastern horizon Captain Andrews consulted his log, compass, and charts for the river where he was about so large that it resembled a sea, and rivers are wide in these Abbeinnian countries. He declared that they were not far from East O Podgie and that unless something had happened to the Crab during the night she must have landed her passengers there. This indeed was a bitter pill to swallow, but the boys and beautiful little girls kept hoping against hope while the light grew stronger, as the surrounding waters of the sea like expanses of the river became visible in the late spring dawn, a cry of delight broke from all of them simultaneously, popping down and up and down the water up, on the swells not half a mile off lay the crab. She appeared to be motionless except for the action imparted by the waves, and it was evident that something was the matter with her engines.
 "I'll bet they tried to run so fast during the night that they overhauled them," declared Captain Andrews as he gazed at the other craft. He turned his wheel, and the River-Meow began to head toward the Crab. At first it appeared, that they were not observed, but the next instant they found out differently. Penrod who at the moment only was looking at the craft the most looking in another direction saw a bright flash, and a big puff of smoke from one of the big port holes of the Crab raised deck cabin, and a few seconds later came the report of thunder something like a cannon that made the girls and the two others turn their heads instantly in the direction of the sound with a start. Close to the boat then there came a big geyser of water which sprayed all over them in a shower, and then following the ensueing silence there came clearly across the water in a threat through a megaphoned threat, "-----" ~~the Crab~~
 "That shot is a warning. We could have hit you easy. Keep off or it will be the worst for you."

Captain Andrews snatched up the River-Meows megaphone. His bronzed face was flushed with rage and fright from what might have happened to the children and his voice shook with suppressed fury as he bellowed back!
 "You infernal scoundrel is what do you mean by firing at my boat when there are children in it? Are you going to let us board you, and give up those plans or do we have to make you."
 "Oh go to the hot place and stay there, what do we care what you have on board you skunk," came back from the Crab in a voice which they recognized as a warden.

"Yes, and you keep away from us unless you want to be swimming in this water and remember it's impossible to swim as the current would pull you under," came back in another voice.

"By Neptune princely children," growled Captain Andrews "it kind of looks as if they had the upper hand of us after all. If they hit us with a shot we'll all drown as it is impossible to swim this part of the river. See the speed of that log of wood floating down. That proves of us or of it. Now I don't see how we can board them as things are now. If that captain of the other boat was not a up right and honest man and knew what he was doing, our guns could bring that boat to disaster in a hurry. It's no use sticking our heads in a hornets nest, and that's what we'd be doing if--- Hello. They are moving again, guess they've got their engine fixed. Well we can stick to their wheels, and if they run into a town I didn't say you were a clown," we can arrive close enough to them to cause them to be arrested."

"But will they make for a town now that we are so close to them and on their tracks, as all towns are in Christian possession in this locality seeing that the size of the Christian mission?" wondered Penrod. "Is it not more likely they'd land along the coast some place where there was no risk of encountering the military authorities or scout patrols and so on....!"

"Jove Prince I don't know but what you are right." "Well all we can do is to tag along and watch our chance"

"Look one of them is coming out of the cabin with a very big megaphone," cried Jennie suddenly.
 They watched a figure clamber up on the stern of the boat ahead and raise the speaking trumpet.
 "River-Meow, ahoy," came the hail.
 "Aye, aye what do you want with us," bellowed back captain Andrews in no amiable tone.

"What do you have you on board your boat. A party of soldiers?"

"No."
 "How are they then? Boy and girls scouts?"

"No."
 "Who are they then?"
 "None of your business."
 "Well if that is so, I'll tell you something. No matter they on board are are it is no use you following us. If it's the plans you are after, we landed ashore and sent them off last night while you fools were chasing chasing that bait tub."

Indeed if a bombshell had exploded in the midst of the party on the River-Meow could not have felt a deeper sense of consternation. The long chase had been for nothing then, and as Penrod had put it, they had indeed been pursuing pursuing a "Will o the wisp."
 Penrod was the first to recover from the shock.

"I don't believe it at all I tell you," he declared stoutly.
 "It would have been like the elkhavary however to be able to pull off such a trick though, believe," struck in Jennie Vivian herself.
 "What do you think Captain?" asked Argeline.
 "Just this, princess, that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." declared the stout old River-Meow man. "It can be possible they did land the plans or plans during the night, but in that case if they really did, what are they doing away down the river-shore in this direction? And even again if they did land the plans I propose to keep on their heels till we can cause their capture or frustrate them from getting through Christian territory into their own camps...."

The captians who'd put new heart into the royal children and instead of slackening in their pursuit, they kept up the sea or river-Meows speed which, do what they could was slightly slower than the speedy Crab. About an hour after the hail from the Crab's after decks had come, the craft ahead suddenly changed their course.

"They're heading in two directions," cried Penrod excitedly.
 "Yes I see they realize they cannot shake us and are going to land and make a good run for it," decided Captain Andrews. "Great sea serpents but they are putting on speed..."

The Crab certainly was flying (not in the air though) Great jets of spray shot up on each side of her bow, and the roar of her motor could be heard like the incessant discharge of a whole battery of gathling guns.

Penrod sprang down to Walter's side at the River-Meows engine. He tinkered with the carburetor and speeded up both spark and gasoline supply and there fore like an arrow shot from a bow the gasoline boat sprang forward gallantly, very timber in her shock under the vibration, but like a gray in thehound after a rabbit she hung tenaciously in the wake of the Crab. It was a desperate tenacious river race filled with the keenest excitement though violet and her sisters were considerably nervous and apprehensive as the guns of the Crab had fired four times striving to make the boat a mark but the solid shot missed every time. Penrod's heart pounded and the blood rushed hotly through his veins, and with burning eyes he straitened up from the engine, and gazed ahead. The distance between the two crafts was the same the Crab maintaining her lead. Again a gun boomed forth but the shot only splashed the water like a geyser rather than the possession and a wail of the little girls had something to do with their failure failure to hit the boat on their aim was poor. The crew even fired with rifles and a machine gun started popping but to no effect.

"Can't you get any more speed out of her?" "Almost groaned Captain Andrews. "If once they reach that coast and land, we'll have a tough job getting them again."

"I'm afraid that I can't do any more with the motor," responded Penrod. "The engine's heating up now and if I force it any more it may stick altogether and then we will be out."

The river-shore two of which boat's or both boats were heading at racing speed was a wild and desolate looking stretch of beach with cliffs toering up to some height from a rocky base,,, and pine woods and hills on top.

"Like as not old captain Spilledinks knows just where he is heading for," said captain Andrews, with some uneasiness, "but I don't like the looks of this at all. See those rocks and that shoal water all about us. We may run aground any minute and at this speed that would mean good bye River-Meow."

Penrod nodded and Violet, and her sisters looked more anxious than ever.... They saw fully the dangers of navigation so close to the rocky river-shore. But he kept on with out the speed dodging in and out of shoals incessantly even though the gun on the other craft continued to fire and one shot hit a rock somewhere and showered the boat with pieces of it. Captain Andrews with his heart fairly in his mouth for the safety of his craft, followed his every move carefully, for he knew that all would be drowned if the boat would hit one of those rocks. He also knew that the Crab drew more water than his craft and that where Captain Spilledink could go with safety he could follow. The chase through the watery maze kept up for an hour or more, still being fired at but to no effect, and then so far as the River-Meow was concerned, it came to a disastrous conclusion. With out the slightest warning Captain Andrews' craft (as bait) rammed her nose at full speed into a sand bank, and which proved too to be a bank of quick sand, and at the same moment the children and the captain were thrown every which way by the sudden shock. Penrod was up in a jiffy and shut off the engine so the boat would not go too far into the bog. The others were as quick as they could covering themselves and set to work to use paddles which were in the boat to get her free before she started to sink into the quagmire the engine too being reversed and run at full power but could not move her until by shoving they finally got her free, from the bog but she was still stuck in some other ground which though solid held her stoutly.

"Well if the bad luck isn't holding out to the end," exclaimed James despairingly. "What on earth can we do now?"

"That indeed," echoed Walter. "I guess they win this time."

"What giving up already?" exclaimed Penrod. "Why comrades there's lot of luck left. The boat can be gradually pried off the ground bank. In the meantime I've got a plan."

They all hung eagerly on his next words.

"We'll take the dinghy and row ashore. It can't be so very far to some village or town where we can summon the militia by authority. That will give us a chance to land those miscreant spies yet."

"It seems about all there is left to do," said Violet who as well as her sisters did not seem to be very much impressed with the plan...

"Hello the 'old crab' has dropped her anchor," exclaimed Penrod, pointing to the other craft, which had come to a stand still about five hundred yards off.

"Then surely there is no time to lose in getting ashore," declared Captain Andrews, "We have got to beat them to it, come on prince and princesses and you ladies, two of you help me get the dinghy over."

The dinghy referred to was a small light flat bottomed boat carried athwart the stern of the River-Meow. It took but a short time to get her overboard. In the meantime James himself had dived into the cabin leaving the task of lowering the small boat to two of the others.

"Come in here," he shouted, as soon as the boat was over and floating astern. The others and the captain obeyed... 2.2.2

To their astonishment they found James in his underclothes busily engaged in stuffing not only his discarded suit with old bits of canvass and anything he could find to give the clothes the semblance of being on a living frame, but the old clothes of Violet and Jennie as well.

"What in heaven's name have you got in mind now?" demanded Walter staring wonderingly.

Jim James explained.

"I was just thinking," he said, "That there was no use in our all going ashore. Three of us must be on board the River-Meow (how about the cats Meow) to guard her against attack. But at the same time it's important that those fellows on the Crab should think there is no one here. My plan is that Violet and her sister Jennie remain on this boat while their sisters, you Penrod, and the others row ashore with these three dummies of myself, and Violet and Jennie sitting in the stern of the dinghy--- that's right giggle you girls but I know it does look funny, but you can easily dispose of them in some bushes when you get there, some where we can claim them afterwards. Then you make off at top speed some some telegram office and summon help and I'll stay here on guard with Jennie and Violet....." "QQQQ"

"ut they may attack you" objected Penrod.

"That's not likely. In the first place our boat is a gun boat, there's aint and we have sufficient weapons to could enable us to send off three or four or boat a full of well armed soldiers should they venture on an assault. But I guess those spies won't."

At first Captain Andrews would not listen to Andrews plans, but when the ladies, and even Violet and her sisters represented to him that it would be necessary to have some one on board in case the River-Meow floated on a rise of the river so it would not float away beyond their reach, he changed his mind. The dinghy was brought around to the side of the launch way from the view of the Crab's crew, and the three dummies carefully lowered into it while even if you would kill them for it Violet and her sisters could not help giggling at the sight of them.

Then with Captain Andrews at the oars, oars, and Walter Penrod, and voice supporting the dummies, the row to shore was begun. Violet in the meantime had found an old suit of clothes which she gave to James who put them on in place of the garments he had sacrificed. He and the two little girls however did not show themselves outside but from the port holes they watched the dinghy's progress. He himself could hardly keep from laughing at he looked at "himself" and the two other dummies propped up in the stern.

"They are certainly good dummies if I do say it myself," he chuckled. "Maybe mine has more brains than I have at this time," he added with a grin. But his attention was speedily attracted and distracted from watching the River-Meows dinghy by the fact that from the Crab's side another small boat now shot out. In it were seven men---the total ship's company of the Crab.

"Well that disposes of the theory that the plans were landed in the night," he said to Jennie who was standing beside him with Violet on the other side as they watched them row off. "Unless an eighth confederate ashore took charge of it."

"I believe they lied when they said they sent it ashore," said Violet. "So do I," put in Jennie. "I don't see how they could land ashore with the plans and be out in the river when day dawned."

Their conversation now was changed suddenly to one of anxiety as they saw that the Crab's mission now was charged suddenly to one of anxiety as they saw that the Crab's dinghy was clearly in pursuit of the River-Meows small boat.

"If they catch up there will be a fight more than likely," Violet exclaimed. "but we in that boat are eight to their seven but with better weapons. Oh I'm so afraid for my sisters."

"James Andrews laughed. "Afraid for your dear sisters and Penrod," he grinned. "You are afraid for nothing. If they gain on our boat I'll blow the second reels out of the water" and showing he meant it he leveled one of the ship's guns toward the pursuing boat.

"Hello," Walter saw them. "said Jennie a little more relieved.

"Yes," said Violet. "Goodie, goodie."

"Captain Andrews is pulling faster now, go is the Crab's though," said James looking at the scene. "It's a race for the shore."

They fairly glared their faces to the port hole as they watched the two boats. A few moments later they gave a sigh of relief as the River-Meows dinghy grazed the river shore, and Captain Andrews and the rest leaped out, and the three noted with a sort of grim amusement that joke, Walter and Penrod supported the three dummies up the riverbank and managed them so skillfully that from a distance it really looked as if they were James, Jennie and Violet walking with them. A moment later these figures vanished in the brush which grew down to the foot of the cliffs, and the Crab's boat touched the bank. The three on the River-Meow heard her occupants give a derision yell as they leaped out and ran up the bank almost in the foot steps of the others. The next instant the brush swallowed them likewise, and James, Violet, and Jennie were left to conjecture what was taking place behind that lofty curtain. That it was a drama of pretty tremendous sort they were certain.

The cabin was insufferably hot, and though Violet and Jennie did not sense the heat, James was too restless to remain still. As he knew that no one was left on board the Crab he saw no objection to his emerging on deck for a breath of fresh air and the two girls arm in arm followed him. They saw in the cockpit looking dreamily at the big Crab swinging at anchor and wondering how things were faring with Captain Andrews and the rest. Suddenly his reverie was broken off. The boy to the surprise of the two girls appeared at his feet and slapped his hand down on his knee... A sudden idea had come to him---an idea that was an inspiration.

"So us it's worth trying," said James to the girls. "It's worth trying."

"What is worth trying?" asked the two girls together.

"Why we'll swim over to the other boat. We may find out nothing and then again---"

"Well what then?" they asked.

"Well it may mean a whole lot. We may get the plans. I'll bet they are in the boat....." "QQQQ"

"Let's go" then said Violet.
"Put how about our boat" put in Jennie.
"It's can't drift away. I'll watch out for that."
James secured the door of the cabin. Then the three divested themselves of their shoes, and this done one by one they let themselves over the side of the River Moos and struck out with long steady strokes for the Crab. James was not surprised by how good the little girls could swim because he had heard lots about them, and about how it was attempted once by Mandelins to drown "Seven little fishes in water." It was quite a swim and the divergent ran swiftly but not swiftly enough here to be dangerous. The water was cold too, but the three were strong and vigorous and did not mind this in the least. However they found for a moment a quicksand bog in their way and they had to swim out of that place to avoid it. Then too after their long spell in the stuffy cabin the water felt delightfully refreshing to them. It was not long before they reached the side of the Crab, and swimming around her they finally found a dangling rope by which they hauled themselves on board the little girls going first. Once in the cockpit James first started for the cabin door if anything searching was in the case he would bear the brunt of the first assault. As he expected it was locked, put a big wrench lay by the engine box, and James without hesitating an instant, picked it up and with one blow smashed the lock in. Then he bidding Jennie and Violet to be cautious opened the cabin door, and they found themselves in a compartment much bigger than the River Moos but in a wild state of untidiness.
"What a stuffy hole," thought the lad.

before a sudden advance of the others straggled up the trail. He and his followers did not see a thing, but when he reached the top he was amazed to hear a sarcastic voice proceeding apparently from behind an awfully big boulder which was poised on the summit.

a fusillade.

"They are giving the cavalry a desperate fight," said Walter Starling. "I expected just as much," declared Joyce. "Hark. The firing is getting livelier." But Penrod interrupted her.

"The River-Meow is afloat," he cried; "Thank God." Sure enough, the river was cleaving an unusual amount of water from a big thunderstorm up north had been raging during the last hour, and now they could feel a quiver of life in the River-Meow. The engine was started and after a short time the craft was backed off into deep water, and anchored. "I guess we are in for it," said James pointing to the north-western sky. "We are going to have a storm soon." "Let her come," said Penrod. "We are not afraid of storms unless they are like American madones."

They decided to row ashore and make their way into the outskirts of the little village from which the cavalry had come and arrested the Glandelinian spies or attacked them. As the firing was still going on, they did, and got there just as the rainstorm broke accompanied with lively lightning and thunder. They found that the village was in a state of turmoil. The seven spies, and their followers had wasted the cavalry it was reported and five of them had been captured after a bloody skirmish. But on the Christian side Captain Spiffledink was captured but he pleaded hard that he did not know what kind of men he had taken on board his big boat, and who his pursuers really were.

But as the Vivian girls were on board the boat that pursued and their brother too he was not believed. The authorities said his words were palpably false. The sea captain had however a wife and two children and finding out that the princesses were in the city, and knowing her husband would be tried for aiding the Glandelinian spies who fought their way to freedom, and therefore was charged with military conspiracy which is worse than spying, and that he would face the hangman's noose, she came to Violet and her sisters and pleaded to them to intercede for the men. At the time she came Violet had telephoned them the news of the capture of the plans and papers to their father, but notified him since the spies had won in their flight their adventurous quest was not yet ended. Hoping for success in the apprehension of the spies they had decided the next day to start back for Pandora but on the River-Meow and tow the captured boat behind. The bulldog too now completely subdued was to have gone as passenger on the big River-Meow. The woman there for a found the little girls and Penrod in a hotel but could not yet bother them anxious as she was for Penrod had phoned to General Viviananna and was still phoning, declaring he had sent to him recently all the appliances he needed and that the big land and water submarine would soon be ready. General Viviananna was telling him across the phone that had it not been for him and his sisters the great invention would have remained and used in the shed and the invento would have been sure down and out. One other thing of interest was being told him too by General Viviananna. The Christian army was found to be in a very bad way but new troops coming would assist in putting it on its feet again. General Tallam had charge of the military work of reconstruction and that the enemy now was not making any headway head way at Depressionville any more. The little girl who had been rescued in mid air had declared her self to be their warm friend and would help them out, and little Nell stated that she would pray every day for the success of Penrod and his sisters and hope that she would come home soon. The phoning took some time and then Penrod was through and then he received word that a woman half weeping wished to see him and his sisters.

CHAPTER TWENTY.

THE ATTEMPT AT A BIG BRIBE.
AFTER A SPY. ..THE CRY FOR HELP.

Of course Penrod and his sisters as any one knows may or do have as much charity as any one of the heavenly ones would, and so the woman was sent for. The soldiers there for admitted her, and she immediately as pleadingly as possible put her petition before them, stating that how it would feel as if it was their own father who would be facing a firing squad. Now in fact Penrod and his sisters forgot in their excitement the fact that Captain Spiffledink had been also arrested with some of the few who did not escape and too the reason was he had not even shown the slightest resistance for the Heaven knows had really been bamboozled bamboozled by the spies, and had thought they were Christians being persecuted by another boat loaded with disguised Glandelinians. In fact they had kept him totally ignorant that Violet and her sisters had been in the pursuing boat, but because he was with the foe spies, and having unconsciously aided them the military authorities would not believe his statement, and had therefore been given two days in which to prove his innocence. His wife first had come before them but her pleas had been in vain. There for as a last resort she had come to the royal children, and brought her little little girl too to force the plea.

Of course if it had not been for the testimony of Captain Andrews some time before concerning the character of Captain Spiffledink Penrod and her sisters might have been compelled to refuse her plea, because it is more than a National Offense to knowingly aid Glandelinian spies but they really were convinced conscience that he did not do it knowingly, and therefore it was Violet herself who after a short consultation personally wrote his release and sent it to the military authorities where he was confined. There for because of the intercession Captain Spiffledink escaped the penalty, as Violet proved the plea that he did not know what kind of men he had taken on his boat as passengers or who the pursuers were. But he was nevertheless was released with a stern warning.

The woman wished to thank them for their intercession, but they refused to be thanked, as they did not do anything just to be thanked or praised. Since the other spies and the main ones they were after had escaped after all their efforts they were determined at least Penrod was to get them if he had to go into the foelines across the forest territory for them. At the suggestion of it however for a time Violet and her sisters were a little afraid, for the enemy was more dangerous now than before, and could not be trifled with, even by boy and girl scouts as it had been ~~tttttttttttttttttttt~~ proven in some places for a report came that a good patrol of scouts had almost a fatal encounter with a troop of Glandelinian cavalry which had been victorious too killing the leader of the scouts. So it showed the enemy was having things his own way, for even knows the battle of Depressionville and Podgie being the most greatest Christian disaster in the whole war, and a fatal one too, would never even by a miracle ever be a Christian victory. At the advice of Emperor Vivian, Viviananna was falling back, back from Depressionville abandoning it to enemy hands and making preparations to make a stand at Podgie until general Glandelin could cover his retreat from there.

Since most of those spies (not spies) had escaped despite their desperate efforts to capture them and of General Viviananna's large Violet, and her sisters were greatly worried. Then too with Penrod's decision to go after the spies they were still more greatly worried, and apprehensive for now it would be a most perilous undertaking, and to be separated from him again seemed out of the question, and so Violet said: "I thought you said you would not be separating yourself again from us."

"Penrod grinned. "You and your sisters are going with me," he said.

"Oh Penrod. Those Glandelinians in the camps, is it really safe?"

Jennie, his exceedingly pretty sister stood with one small gloved hand on the neck of Penrod's horse and looked up at her brother, attired in a uniform now not so gorgeous, and stood beside his horse.

"So far dear Jennie!" he panted the boy prince, as he stretched and the reins of his horse. "Why you ought to know by this time when you are really angel possessed you can be in danger and yet escape it, and besides too you ought to know by this time again that even you wouldn't go where it isn't safe. It wasn't safe to pursue those spies and we did."

"Oh yes I know Penrod dear it may be all right for us maybe, but we've never attempted anything like this when the enemy now is in no mood to be trifled with, and we want to know if it is safe for especially you if not for us. If you are ever injured or killed-----"

The young boy prince clasped in his hand the neatly gloved one of his little sister. And though the little glove was new, and fitted the hand perfectly, she clung with her hand as tightly as he did to hers and was very glad that her hand was in such safe keeping.

"Hi Jennie!" exclaimed the boy prince. "Of it wasn't safe, for the plan I'll do to make it safe---as safe as a church---I wouldn't dream of going myself outside of taking you along with me." And for some reason or other---at the mention of "church" Jennie V. blushed just the least bit but there was a happy gleam in her blue eyes. Or perhaps it was the prospective excitement of the moment that caused the blood to surge into her cheeks. Have it as you will, but it must be understood that Violet and her sisters were all loved their brother and best boy friends better than the most true two lovers ever did.

"Come Jennie dear you are not going to back out the last minute are you?" asked Penrod. "Every thing is all right. I've made many things already and often I've been acting as Adelfob and you see I've come through safely as a bird even when you were with me and interferred with by Starling. There is no need to fear them boys as they're still prisoners. You promised lately after a tussle again to go with me where ever I went. I won't go of course if you don't like it for I won't ask you to go where I'm afraid to go, but my experience as Adelfob has been that once you go through these adventures with me often enough it doesn't make any difference then how often you go. You'll find it very fascinating. So let's skip along to our home, and our housekeeper Mrs. Jerry will help you and your dear sisters get into your disguises."

"Shall I and my dear sisters have to wear all those things, such as you are going to put on?" asked Jennie blushing again.

"Well you and your dear sisters will be more comfortable in the way you are addressed now, but we cannot enter the foe lines that way." answered Penrod. "And even if it does make you look like Glandelinian boy scouts, why I'm sure it will be very becoming. Not that you and your sisters don't look heavenly now, but to go into the foe lines unusual disguises will be very handy; should say."

"If I could be sure it would fetch us back safe Penrod dear-----"

"That will do. That will do." laughed the young boy prince. "One joke like that is enough in a morning. It was pretty good though. But I know the enemy will greatly regret that we were within within his lines. We got to capture our put and send to those spies. Now as we are home let's go on in and tog up."

"You're sure it's safe Penrod dear?"

"Positive. Not along row. I want to have my hooves left shoe fixed and-----"

"Oh is his horse shoe broken?" and the angelic little girl, who had started away from the horse turned back again.

"No dear little angel the shoe is not broken but it has cast loose. To go to the enemy's lines I've got a plan to make it safe nothing to do with spying at all, except to tell what one can do to catch spies."

"That's just what I don't care to know Penrod dear!" said Violet herself with a smile. "If I or my dear sisters could imagine I was ailing along only about ten feet in the air I wouldn't mind so much. That's safer than chasing spies into the enemy's lines."

Any one flying at that height in an airship or aeroplane would be the worst sort of danger. You leave it to me dear little sisters. The enemy won't be able to send us up above the clouds, though I suppose they'll try that next. This is only a little prelude to those escaped spies. We got to trick them into a trap. You did that once before and got the spies, and it can be done again through my own plans. You've been practicing long enough to go on such an expedition with me, and now I believe you and your dear sisters are fit to go to back out."

"No, really we are not Penrod dear. Only at the last minute the enemy has gone absolutely so mad, and the war is progressing in their favor, that our cause looks so small and feeble, and the war is so big at Depressionsville and the losses so awful that we may get caught caught in the fearful war-torn and she clanked down that direction and seemed to shiver just a little and her sisters gave an anxious glance also in that direction,

11-317

"Don't be thinking of those awful things," Violet said Penrod with a perplexed frown. "That 'war-torn' will soon be over as father has ordered vivamus to fall back on Dodge and try and stand his ground the while until Kilde and Kilde's nine advances to his aid. 'Don't mistake that for along and get ready unless you want those spies to escape and I know you don't. Our plans have always worked better, and in this adventure if you will break across in our new adventure and make the world marvel at us. We Glandelinian patriots to stop us either as there might be if we were not disguised. Where are you go Jennie?" exclaimed Penrod as if struck with a new thought. "You've gone on a dangerous spying mission many a time, and you were never a bit afraid, though you are in more danger than we'll be on this expedition after the spies." "Danger Penrod in a spying expedition? Oh! We always did that." "The danger of being detected by Glandelinian generals as you little girls go trying to learn many things from them, or as you meet Manley and be discovered in your disguises, danger of running into an ambush, danger of some one you and your dear sisters know double crossing you, or of us detecting some one else, and they telling on you to save themselves. There isn't one of these dangers in pursuing Glandelinian spies when we try to shadow them in disguise."

"No," said Hettie herself but there danger of a spy recognizing us and bet saying us too."

"One again twenty. That's the safest margin. And if we do fail it will be landing only like in a feather-bed. See how Starling tried to interfere with me when I acted last time as Adelfob and you were with me. He failed in the end though he caused me to get wounded and in a hospital where at first you could not find me. There don't wait any longer and get ready. We want to show the spies we are invincible..."

Hettie sighed, and then seeming to sum up her nerves to her said she smiled brightly, waved her hand to Penrod, and then followed by her sisters hastened toward and across home where Mrs. Jerry the mat-only house keeper was waiting to help the little girls attire themselves as Glandelinian boy scouts.... Violet and her sisters who now more than half a year had a warm place in the heart of Penrod, had as he stated some time since his great adventure with Starling promised again to make a trip with Penrod into the foe lines, but had never expected that it would be to go on chasing after enemy spies, and the suggestion had at first met with such opposition that Penrod began to despair of ever getting them to accompany them. And he didn't want to never again leave them behind, nor they leave him behind, and unless they go with him he wouldn't do it either if they still refused then he would have to leave the spies make an escape. To day however after the escape of the spies from the cavalry after a bloody skirmish Penrod had insisted on the promise being kept. Not knowing how on that home as good little girls they surely would not break it under any conditions... He had his friend Jim get to him and they one sort of the safest and most clever disguise set a well known before, and with him his sisters to watch he had again put on his splendid outfit worn before as Adelfob and little Jennie coming out of a tent had spied him and looked at him in wonder as we know now this was the second time he had donned the garb, though this was not the first time Jennie had seen him in this disguise, though before then she had never realized that the "Adelfob boy" she had known in the Glandelinian armies, and who had been so good to her and finally caused her escape was Prince Penrod in disguise. But now she, and even Violet and her sisters watched with different different empty emotions for they were vitally interested. Penrod looked indeed like a very high rank Glandelinian boy scout, and then he had insisted that his sisters should keep their promise and try the adventure with him. At first she had asked that is justice herself!

"No you think it would be a sin for us to not keep the promise. We sir dear brothers. We did not bind it you know." But he answered "If you don't go then I could pursue the spy force and not leave you and my other sisters behind any more. Very time I do some double crossing makes it double for you, like it happened just recently when, yes and now had all his own trouble to bring you through safely. To leave you behind would be like leaving a leaving a precious jewel behind even when, know the is a thief in the house."

Finally they decided to try it.

"Don't be too long now," called Penrod to his sisters as they hurried toward the house. "Have a mind about bubbling you what this time with your paste and hair pins. Or whether you hats on at night for Glandelinian boy scouts usually wear hats and hair like we do in this disguise. Only get the curls out of it so that it'll betray you. Better wear Glandelinian scout caps and let the hair hang down loose any old way under it. We'll get those spies and show the crazy Glandelinian generals something!"

"All right" and finally some of them waved their hand to him. The little girls had made their decision, and were ready to go with him on their expedition after the spies, they were not half so frightened as they had been in the contemplation of it. As Penrod climbed onto his horse James and his father who knew James and Tim also were going with them came toward him.

"You'll and James too will be mighty careful of your dear good little sister now won't you Prince?" asked the man.

"Of course, will Mr. Anderson," was the young prince's answer. "Because the whole world ain't got any like these dear girls and that's the truth Prince" went on the doctor who was mighty careful. "Penrod laughed. He could feel it some how that there was to be no worry. "I don't think I'll need to be careful" he said. "I'll bet those spies will have to be careful. I can feel that we are going to have a stirring good time in the fox lines. This ain't half as perilous for them as spying and I know it."

James father then went off, and Penrod remained on his horse waiting for Violet, and he sisters to appear. Presently he saw seven or nine Glandelinian boy scouts approaching him and Penrod waved his hand to them. "Very one of you are a splendid picture," he cried, "as he saw how fetching they looked in the Glandelinian boy scout uniform which was like his own."

"I wish I had my camera," cried Penrod. "The nine of you look very stunning."

"I hope that isn't any comment on how we are going to feel if we have to make a break to save ourselves from a dangerous Glandelinian scout patrol as I believe they are called" Violet said.

"Oh I'll take care of that," exclaimed Penrod. "We'll make those dastard Glandelinian spies wish they had not come across us, and we members have no Gerald Starving to deal with as he is still within the prison camps and will not be exchanged for another month. Now up on your horses you go, and we'll start," and he having dismounted helped her and his sisters on the saddle of their horses.

"Oh Penrod dear, don't be in such a hurry," expostulated Jennie who was on next. "Let us get our breath."

"No" laughed the young prince. "If I did you might back out. But I know you won't forget this and will make fame for yourself this time. You did it once and can get the same spies within the fox lines again. Get on your saddles fasten the straps around you as you and your sisters always do and sit still. That's all you have to do. Don't be afraid for I'll be very careful and if we were going into grave danger I wouldn't attempt this, but my instinct tells me none of us are going to regret this and for once we'll be making fools of the enemy. And when we are once out in open country sisters dear don't yell at me to go slower or faster once we are on the way."

"Why not?" Daisy wanted to know, as she settled herself on her saddle. "Because scouting parties of the enemy may hear you and come to investigate in case any of them may be who recognize your voice. We can do a little talking by sign language which we know too but if it is better we ought to remain still. Go if you have anything to say."

"In the language of the poets" interrupted Violet. "If I or my sisters have words to spill prepare to spill them now. Well we haven't. Now we are here let's go ahead. We shall probably be too frightened to talk any how."

"I'll bet you are Fredrick Lowden in disguise" piped in Daisy jokingly. "Don't mention his name to me" Penrod said severely with a frown. "I don't want to hear it. He's no Glandelinian boy scout. He's lower than the lowest snake to me. I detest him after what he did to Jennie, and none of you won't need to be frightened after the first little sensation you'll like it. You'll be crazy about the adventure and will laugh at it afterwards. I'll bet it was not safe I wouldn't go myself. Something tell me we'd be fools to back out. Come on Jackson" he called to a man. "Star the bull rolling." "He's a Time and James horse."

Penrod was back in his place on the saddle his goggles which he always wore as a detective and cap well down over his face. Suddenly a man came running from James house waving his arms not unlike the blades of an aircraft propeller. He also shouted but Penrod or his sisters even could not hear as they were almost deafened as to say by the roar of a passing street car.

However Jackson saw him coming and turned about to see what was wanted. "Why it's my stable man," exclaimed Penrod as he caught sight of the excited man. "Hello what's the matter?" the prince asked. "Prince Prince wait a minute. Bless you all," he exclaimed the man whose name was John. "I want to speak to you." He was panting from his run across the field. "I just got to your house," saw your father," he said you were going into the enemy lines after spies, but -- bless your souls -- " "Can't stop now" John answered Penrod, with a laugh. "I have only succeeded by hard work in getting my dear boys and sisters to a point where they have consented to go with me on the expedition. If I stop now I'm afraid they'll back out and I'll never get them to go with me and then I'll have to give it up and let the brats of spies escape. See you when I come back." and Penrod placed the goggles over his eyes once more.

"At Prince, bless your good souls. This is important." "Go this, and more so," answered Penrod with a grin. He saw by the motion of Mr. John's lips what the latter had said.

"Forward" called Penrod sharply as he urged on his horse and Jackson had stepped back out of the way, in case there should be a starting of the horses unexpectedly in which event he would be accidentally trodden down.

"Wait Prince wait. This is very important. Bless your souls. Penrod but this is --"

However the horses had started forward and further that further talk was out of the question. Penrod and the rest urged their horses on at more speed. Jackson had sprung out of the way pulling Mr. John with him.

"Come back, come back. Wait a minute Prince Penrod. Bless your good souls I want to tell you something" cried the small man.

But the girls and the three boys were away and out of hearing. He had started his pursuit of the spies for the very fox lines. Jennie as she rode along slowly with the rest suddenly she couldn't tell why had a strange feeling of sensation, a strange distinct impression of feeling. She couldn't understand it but the feeling was like this -- any one who had taken a flight in an aeroplane or gone up in a balloon will undoubtedly will know exactly how Jennie felt. He had an impression not that she was going up but that some one had pulled the earth down from beneath her, and at the same time given her a sudden violent shove off into space, such is the first sensation of any one going aloft, and yet it seemed that to her as she rode along on her horse. Then the rush of air all about her, for it was a windy hot day, the slightly swaying motion of the horses back as he went at a trot took her attention. But the strange sensation seemingly of the earth dropping away from beneath her remained with her for some time.

This sensation is much greater however in a balloon than in an aeroplane for a ball on unless there is a strong wind blowing, goes straight up, while an aeroplane goes on a long slant and always into the teeth of the wind to take advantage of its lifting power on the under side of its planes. The reason for this sensation -- that of the earth dropping downward, instead of one feeling what really happens that one is ascending -- is because there are no objects by which comparison can be made. If one stands off on the earth's surface at slow or at great speed, one passes stationary objects, houses, posts, trees, fences, and the like and judges the speed by the rapidity with which these are left behind.

Going up is unlike this. There is nothing to pass. One simply cleaves the air and only as it rushes past can one be sure of movement. And as the air is void of color and form there is no sensation of passing anything. So Jennie Vivian had a sensation as if she had been shot into the air, and also had a sensation as though the earth were dropping beneath her -- a moment she felt as though she were in some vast void -- floating in space -- but she had no fear, in fact it was followed by a strange feeling of happiness which she could not account for, the same feeling that she had once when it stole over her when she was in bed and Penrod came at her happy cry. Then she calmed herself, she looked at Penrod sitting on the horse in front of her of course all she could see was his back, but it looked to be a very sturdy back indeed as he sat there in the cowboy fashion in the saddle as calmly as though in an easy chair at home. He sisters too had taken courage for they were beginning to find themselves and knew by instinct too that if they would be in any danger in this untaken Penrod wouldn't let them do it, nor would he go himself.

On and on they went. Down below the little man who had hurried over from his home to see Penrod gazed down the street at the fast disappearing riders with a smile.

"Bless their little souls," cried the eccentric man. "But Prince Penrod is in an awful hurry this morning. Good he could not have stopped and spoken to me. It might be greatly to his advantage and because he didn't stop for me I'm sorry for him going on that expedition. He's taking a great chance."

"You want to see the prince?" asked a voice behind Mr. John and turning he beheld Gertrude Argeline.

"Yes Miss Argeline I did," Mr. John answered and he did not appear at all surprised at the sight of the girl scout leader beside him. "I wanted to see the boy prince. But it is too bad he didn't. I'll go in and warn the princess to have them topped if he can."

Indeed he was aware that they were all in danger, not so much perhaps that they couldn't later prove their identity, but as to what the little girl is might do in their terror, for to encounter a landellian patrol in comparison to these was nothing. Then too they couldn't for the world show fight against any members of their own side, and even if they needed to do so in case of emergency would have been fatal, for though a equal in number the scouts could out match them at anything and besides though boys the youngest of them were sixteen years old. The They were powerful boys and well equipped while Penrod, his sisters and the two boys with him had only small pistols and hidden knife knives and that was that against that small party even. They were eleven to eleven but that made no difference.

party even. They were eleven to eleven but that made no difference.
"Oh, oh" cried Jennie. "The tagorians" and Penrod so good in his ears heard her above the terrific noise of a street car roaring past. "O, if we are seen we won't be able to explain ourselves and they may take us to an army where we can never prove who we are. I'm going to shoot if they see us for I won't be captured."

"Sit still. Sit still" and be quiet for your life." x signalled Penrod. "It won't do to fight them if we must. I'll save you from being detected and caught still, and don't let yourself be seen. Confound the luck any way."

Penrod, "it won't do to fight back."
ed. Only sit still and don't let yourself be seen. Confound the luck any way."
Violet, and even her sisters, their red cheeks now white, drew their noses into other side alley so they were well hidden, while Penrod redoubled his efforts to get through without being delayed. And that And that Penrod was perfectly qualified to make a safe get away from even his unknown friends, who would tend to be enemies if they saw him and his party in the gray uniforms, were even in such difficulties, Violet, and he resisted well knew. Those of you who have read the previous events know it also, but for the benefit of my readers I shall state that this was by no means Penrod's first sort of untimely encounter with even those of the Christians in a stand within the foe lines as Adeldefob five fit at so many of untimely encounters with even those of the same disguise as Adelfob. He had operated within the foe lines as Adelfob five months after the war started. As related in the initial volumes he had done it when little Annie was a slave within the foe lines. After that experience Annie had often wondered who Adelfob was, so she began to realize a real Marlottian boy scout would never had been good to her and other child slaves. That was the beginning of an everlasting friendship between him and her, and also started Penrod on his career as a famous spy, and a possessor of many great talents no one else could boast of. He even made improvements on his style of Adelfob, so that never in the whole world the Marlottians think Adelfob was anything one could think of else. When starting that is what Adelfob and his two companions never knew the difference between Penrod and Adelfob, and eventually feared but loved him. Penrod some times too had suspicions of Angelina Aroburg as being Radcliffe in disguise, so some times he almost recognized the voice, and that no long between times he never saw Radcliffe set him to wondering. Once he broached the subject but Angelina Aroburg had told him, though I know who Radcliffe is, I cannot now tell, but Heaven itself can prove Radcliffe is not me. Now since the last time he had never seen or heard of Radcliffe, but he had received often strange messages of information which looked like his handwriting.

Adcliffe had gone on one unusual adventure with him during the early war operations against Vivian Pickney, and since that time Adcliffe had not often been seen, and where ever he was he was as busy as a bee against the enemy and doing lots of damage to Argentinian armies and like Penrod was never being detected. Penrod hoped in this adventure was coming to meet him within the foe lines, and would you believe it he was the head of that party of Argentinians, coming down the street, and had to hide from his best friend. For Adcliffe could not recognize him in that disguise and heavens what a one he is to lose his way. He don't give any quarter and that is why Penrod had to hide off like this. Adcliffe was to the enemy more dangerous than Penrod because of the buy and give-out leaders could be. He had single handed once seized Penrod from the enemy by a trick, a big speedy motor speed boat, had secured twenty observation balloons and sixteen big air ships, had blown up two, and had captured from the enemy an electric runabout that was the speediest car in the world in this story and so with the enemy country 10,000,000 dollars. Ten thousand times he had sent secret wireless messages to the Christian lines from the foe foe although being detected, having thrilling experiences too from an encounter with Christian patrol men in disguise, once was chased through a cave of ice by Christians who thought him a foe boy scout and had made perilous trips through forest blazes at all risks and came through without a burn. But he was totally yes a total dumb dolt, of detecting any one in disguise, so that it was fatal for seven his best friends to come into his path and he takes them for Argentinian foes. He even all the time within the foe lines which Christian lines carried an electric machine gun rifle and there was no one in the world who could do more wonderful shooting than he could, and twenty times within the foe lines made some strange discoveries carried with him too a wizard camera and a great searchlight. He also worked on a photograph telephone captured and destroyed the enemy a big aerial warship, frustrated the enemy intentions and plans of digging a big long tunnel from Argentinia against, to Mombi with a purpose to put enough explosives under ground to blow up both cities at the same time which would have occurred if he had not prevented it, all this keeping Adcliffe very busy so that he was feared on both sides especially if he mistook you for an enemy. In all this he was helped by a disguised girl scout Mary Hasty who was his closest friend and one of those boys with him in this party. Early was he disguised as a Christian boy scout just for the fun of it. Penrod and Adcliffe had become the best of all friends and secretly he married many things to Penrod, and therefore was the best operator against the enemy that Abbieanna ever had. Some one think that Penrod and his sisters and many others could have been jealous and envious of this scout spy, but in Abbieanna every body are good good to be that way, and in fact the whole royal family really regretted within themselves they couldn't find room for him. They wanted to place him in as a second member of the Royal crew, and though that sounds small by that that number it is really the highest office in the palace which some day too Argentinia's crown will obtain, little did Penrod know Adcliffe was Arrabelle Arronburg of Argentinia's sister in disguise.

Arnabell Armstrong the Arnabellina's sister in disguise.
Mary knew who she was so did Arnabellina but to reveal anything would spoil Jardcliffe's plans as it might leak in to the enemy. Jennie too of all her plans had got a glimpse of addicks and could not help thinking of his activities in some of which she had shared but to be seen by him in disguise and not known would have been fatal and she had been scared. They really had been seen however but too quick for they soon learned they were being hunted, for some once some where she said within easy hearing
"yes Jardcliffe" and that was Mary Nestor's voice "I did see eleven Jardellina boy scouts walking toward us but they disappeared down some alley like spirits.
what they were doing here I don't know, at they are gone, vanished."
"Oh if they discover us, and we are killed!" Jennie thought fearfully. "Oh what will happen to us."

"what will happen to us."
 "It's all right Jennie, don't worry. It's all right." Penrod signalled.
 "What's that? I can't hear you very well," she called back.
 "I'm wondering with the racket that passing street car is making," he answered
 "I answered," "Why can't something be done so we can be heard despite a street car?" That's an idea. If I could tell you what was the matter now you little dears wouldn't be a bit frightened, for it isn't anything and the sea where we are not coming this way, but as it is, it is!"
 "What are you saying Penrod dear? I can't hear you" cried Jennie until much frightened as another year or two past. Penrod this time waited till it was still and then said quickly before another street car came, "I'll say it's all right--they won't come here--don't get scared, don't show yourselves until I see that every thing is clear--all of us not to leave our hiding place until we left the city. We'll get them off sight now here and a new town when we are outside in the country. One every body take them off uniforms too and make them sit in the place. Otherwise we'll have to be able to proceed." He added some what literally.

A strange idea had come to the young prince but there was no time to think of it now. Mentally he determined to take up his idea and work on it as soon as possible, but just now his followers needed all his attention and soon they were their own selves again their uniforms having been rolled up and tied around their saddles. As Penrod now told them they could proceed with leisure as there was nothing approaching any danger now, and besides the scouts were gone, but it was rather had been an anxious moment. If Penrod had been alone he would have thought little of it, and could have compelled Radcliffe to recognize him in time, but with his sisters and the two other boys along he felt a double responsibility. Indeed what had happened was that they had suddenly almost met with a party of High Grade Hugoian boy scouts led by Radcliffe. Radcliffe was uniformed as a Christian boy scout of very high rank. In trying to get out of sight too quickly they had suddenly been seen, and therefore they had to make quick move to avoid pursuit and trouble and Penrod had to try and reassure Jennie at the same time for she was more excited than her sisters as she had recognized Radcliffe too. Penrod had worked quickly and to good purpose. In a few moments though to Violet and her sisters they seemed like hours, they were now again hiding down a street, but without disguises on, and Penrod breathed more easily.

"No one was in sight now on horse back. "and now for my great idea," he told himself. But it was some time before he could give his attention to that. I decided working with all the skill he possessed Penrod and his followers through his directions had gotten aside of their disguises within a short time. As he had been said the incident however was only a trivial one and had he been alone he would have thought little of it, for he could have convinced Radcliffe who he was, but a whole party in any way would have tempted attack. Then very likely too he could have much more easily have avoided the party. But he did not want to frighten his sisters, so he fixed up a plan while retreating into the alley and made light of it. Thus his sisters and the two other boys were reassured.

"Are we all right now?" asked Violet as they rode along. "Right as a fiddle," answered Penrod shouting as another noisy street car thundered past.

"What's that about a riddle?" asked Daisy in surprise at his seeming flippancy at such a time. "I didn't say anything about a riddle---I said we are as fit as a fiddle," cried Penrod. "Never mind. No use trying to talk with the racket those confounded street cars make and they ain't the noisiest of their kind either. I'll tell you when we get out of the city. Do you like it now?" he added as all quieted down again.

"Yes we like it better than we did at first," answered Nettie for she had managed to understand the least of Penrod's questions. Then they rode on a little faster and soon headed for the city square where there was not so much noise. "I'll lead the way through the Christian camps," he cried to them. "If we need rest we can go up to some general's head quarters this way---in style, and not in disguise either."

"That's good enough for us," said Argeline. "Though this trip is sure wonderful. We'll go now to the foe lines any time you ask us." "Well I have asked you," said Penrod. The quiet of this neighborhood some distance from the street car lines was almost startling and the party could converse easily now. Then followed the long trip out of the city until they soon emerged into the Christian camps outside of it while a party of soldiers came to the edge and lead them to where ever they wanted to go.

"I'll just go and change these tops I have on," said James as he alighted. "No don't," advised Penrod. "You look swell in them. Keep them on. They are sure yours you know and you'll need them when we assume the trip to night the safest hour. Here comes a wagon for us. I'll take you all right to General Hindermine's headquarters in it. Keep the suit on." "I wonder what Mr. Johns could have wanted," he remarked. Penrod as he drove along the company street.

"He seemed very much excited," Catherine replied. "Oh he almost always is that way---blessing us every time he sees us. You know know that. But this time it was very different. I'll admit I hope nothing is the matter might have stopped and spoken to him but was afraid if I did my dear sister might have backed out and wouldn't come on this expedition." "Well we might have," said Jennie. "But now that we are on the way, even with one danger thrown in we'll go any time you ask us Penrod," and she smiled at the boy prince. In fact all his sisters did.....44444

"Shucks that wasn't nothing and if we had not been disguised that would have been a pleasant meeting," he now laughed. "But I do wonder what Mr. Johns wanted. "Pettie go back then and find out Penrod" advised Violet jokingly as they stopped in front of the house in the camp.

"Oh but I would rather come in and talk to you and my other dear sisters. Have not had a chance for a good talk to day for those street cars made such a racket."

"Yes the 's an officer riding toward you," said Jennie. "O along brother dear and see what he wants. Then when you come back we can have plans for our trip after those spies."

"I will all right little heavenly angels, and I suppose that officer will be passing until he sees me. Well glad you liked the first part of our journey dear Violet---that is the first part of it on my account."

Having fare well to his pretty sisters, the young prince went to meet the officers the two other boys going in with his sisters. The general himself had not been well off late and Penrod was a bit anxious about him.

"Some one may bother him though they won't I don't mean to," thought Penrod. "Every one lately seems to have their minds filled with some new idea. Probably the excitement caused by the growing violence of this murderous war I wonder if they had any ideas like mine? No it couldn't be. Well I'll soon find out," and putting his head up he ran up to the office.

"Id is general Hindermine all right." He asked of Mrs. Sanders the general's house keeper who was on the front porch as though waiting for him. "Oh yes Prince, he's all right," the house keeper answered.

"Is any of his staff officers with him.....?????"

"No," "They have not gone elsewhere have they?" "No they are around somewhere, but some one else is with the general general. Some visitors?"

"Any generals?" "No," "They came personally to see you, and they were at your father's head quarters and learning that you went this way they came here. Mr. Johns over there wanted to tell you but you went off without listening. They are rather impatient. I came out to see if you were in sight hearing you were coming here. General Hindermine sent me."

"Are they bothering him---talking military business that I ought to attend to when he's ill? That mustn't be. I won't permit it."

"Well I suppose it's military business that the strangers are talking over with you general, Prince," said Mrs. Sanders but it was strange for her head big sums of money spoken of put the general seems to be all right, only a little anxious that you should come."

"Well for the rest of the day I'm here now and my sisters want me to attend to things while, got ready for the trip. There are the strangers, and who are they?"

"I don't know," answered the house keeper. "I never saw them before, but they are in the library with the general. Do you think they'll stay to supper? If they do I'll have one of your aide de camps catch and kill a chicken."

"If you do don't tell my sisters about it or let them know of it," said Penrod seriously. "They can't be seeing a chicken getting killed. Better get the fowl yourself and say nothing to either of them. I added. And as I may be delayed talking military business to these strangers, you'd better get up a big meal than usual for my sisters will have no such good meal again for some time to come if we go after spies within the foe lines."

"I will, Prince," promised Mrs. Sanders and then the young prince having seen that one of the men took the horse and went on to its proper place, went into the house.

"Oh Prince dear here you are," was the general's greeting as he came out into the hall from the library. "I've been waiting anxiously for you my boy. You were so long getting here on your way I couldn't think what was keeping you."

"Oh I and my sisters had to hide from a bunch of boy scouts---nothing serious made a mistake and disguised ourselves for getting we were within the Christian lines that's all."

A moment later Penrod was standing before two well dressed (not uniformed) prosperous looking men as if they were business men more than anything else and not military who smiled pleasantly at him....

"Prince John Schofield Penrod!" interogated one, the elder as he held out his hand.

"That's my name" answered Penrod pleasantly.

"Have you any sisters?"

"Just a question, are I have?"

"I'm Henry Peton Gale (not whale) and this gentleman is George Roland Ware." went on the man who had taken Penrod's hand. "I'm the head of one of the Gemini Bureau Branches and he's treasurer."

"Oh yes," said Penrod as he shook hands with Mr. Ware (and tea?) "I have heard of you--conce--m you are doing a lot of government work, are you not?"

"Yes, we are doing a lot of work, and we are up to our neck in it. This war is going to be almost as severe as if a whole world was engaged in it. Prince."

"I can believe that," agreed Penrod. "Don't you have a chair?"

"Well, we didn't come to stay long," said Mr. Gale with a laugh, which some how rather grated on Penrod and seemed to him insincere. "Our business is such a rushing one that we don't spend much time any where. To get down to brass tacks we have come to see you to put a certain proposition before you, Prince. You are open to any proposition, are you not?"

"Oh yes," answered Penrod. "That's what I'm always in the military service for." "....."

"I thought so. Well now I'll tell you in brief what we want and then Mr. Ware our treasurer can elaborate on it and give you facts and figures about which I never bother myself. I attend to the executive end and leave the details to the others." and again came that laugh which Penrod did not like.

"You came here to make me an offer?" asked the young Prince.

"Yes, went on Mr. Gale. "He came here to make you a big offer. I'm short Prince we want you to work up a scheme some how that will enable your sisters to go back home where they ought to be, where it's safe and not be trifling with such a dangerous enemy and we are willing to pay you ten thousand dollars a year. Ten thousand dollars a year. That is only for the safety of your sisters. Mr. Ware sent me to do this, do you accept?"

Characteristic it was indeed of Penrod that he did not seem at all surprised or pleased at what many persons would call a liberal offer. Certainly not many young boys or youths of Penrod's age would be sought out by a big Military Detective Concern, and offered ten thousand dollars a year for the duration of the war. "Right off the reel" as Tim Groveton expressed it later, but Penrod only smiled and shook his head in negation.

"What do you mean Mr. Gale?" you mean you won't accept our offer?"

"I am who am a Prince can't," answered Penrod.

"You can't exclaim the treasurer Mr. Ware. "Oh I see, Mr. Gale a word with you. Excuse us for a moment," he added to Penrod and the general. Then the two men consulted in a corner of the library for a moment and then with smiles on their faces once more turned toward the young Prince.

"Well perhaps you are right Prince," said Mr. Gale. "Of course we recognize the talents and ability of our good sisters, but you cannot blame us and all the rest of the Gemini for trying to get them to listen to reason, as well as having them go back home and stay there. But we are not high bound nor sticklers for any sum. We'll make that offer twenty thousand dollars a year if you will sign a ward ration contract and agree that your sisters will go home and we main out of dangers way. Now how does that strike you? Twenty thousand dollars a year---paid weekly if you wish, and our Mr. Ware here has a form of contract which can be fixed up and signed within ten minutes if you agree, and believe the Gemini of the war if they feel over the safety of so good and beautiful little girls as your sisters."

"Well I don't like to be disagreeable," said Penrod with a smile, "but really as I said before I can't accept your kindly offer, and I appreciate your consideration for them. I may say even liberal offer appreciate both."

"You can't accept," cried Mr. Gale.

"Are you sure you don't mean won't?" asked Mr. Ware in a half growl.

"You may call it that if you like," replied Penrod a bit coolly so that that moment he did not like the other's tone. "Only as I say I cannot accept. I have other plans. I cannot make them do it, and I won't. If they believe it is their duty to be at their father's side, then it is mine to be at their side. They are the ones to have the say not, on that matter."

"Oh you---" began the treasurer but Mr. Gale the President of the Universal Gemini Bureau stopped his associate with a warning look.

"Just a moment Prince Penrod begged the president. "Don't be hasty. Remember your sisters are in your safe keeping and it may be what happens to them you are responsible for. We are prepared to make you a last and final offer, and I do not believe you can refuse it."

"Well I certainly will not refuse it without hearing it," said Penrod with a smile he meant to make good natured. Yet truth to tell he did not understand the reason of the two visitors request that they come bring him a Prince to see to it his sisters keep out of the reach of the war and go home. There was something about this request that roused his fears now to concealing them and he said later that even if they had offered him a sum which he felt he ought not in justice to himself and them to refuse, he would have felt a strong desire to try and compel his dear sisters to do what they believed they ought not to.

"This is our offer," said Mr. Gale and he spoke in a manner which seemed to say "If you don't take it, why we'll be sorry for them and you." He looked at his treasurer for a confirmation to nod and he clearing it went on. "We are prepared to offer and pay you and will intercede for such a contract with the stipulation about their safety that I mentioned before---we are prepared to pay you fifty thousand dollars a year now what do you say to that Prince Penrod. Fifty thousand dollars a year?" repeated Mr. Gale unctuously rolling the words off his tongue. "Twenty thousand dollars a year. Think of it. Or fifty to add."

"I am thinking of it," said Penrod gently and I thank you for the offer. It is indeed very generous, but I must give you the same answer I cannot accept. It is up to my sisters and Heaven knows they won't yield. Go to them if you wish to get them do as you feel. I cannot."

"Prince Penrod" exclaimed General Hinde in surprise.

"Prince, Prince," exclaimed the two visitors. But Penrod smiled and shook his head.

"Oh I know very well what I am saying, and what I am turning down," he said calmly. "But I simply cannot accept. I would gladly see them else where though if they were safe, but father believes they're safe in the army doing this than remaining home unarmed. I have other plans too. If you wish them to do as you desire speak to father, but I am sorry you have had your trip for nothing. But then if they succeeded in many unusual incidents in the past and gone through safely what I believe no saints ever experience they could safely go through other adventures in the future. Besides if they are really angel possessed why do you feel so the safety. It's silly I must refuse because I can't accept. I would if I could but, tell you I have no say in the matter. Consult them or go to my father. He alone can do nothing."

"Is that your final answer?" asked Mr. Gale.

"Yes." "Don't you want to take a day or two to think it over?" asked the Treasurer. "Remember if anything terrible ever happened to them you are their responsibility. You are even going into the fox lines to get some spies and they're coming with you on your request. Don't be hasty or rash. I tell you those landelinian devils who ought now to be in hell are not to be trifled with."

and for heavens sake remember there no boy or young man in the world who can boast of having little sisters like you have no command that his sole duty to keep them from harm's path and may say you will find us liberal in other ways. We'd do anything to save them from harm. You too ought to be home instead of going about fiercely attacking the enemy. Something may also happen to you. This is not an ordinary war, it's a hellish struggle and dangerous every where. Landelinia is a seething hell loose on us and you're trifling with such soldiery. Think it over you would have some time to yourself."

"That is what, most need," returned Penrod. "Time to my self. No thank you gentleman I cannot accept."

"Be careful," warned Mr. Gale, and it sounded as though there might be a threat of warning in his voice. "This is our last offer and your last chance."

"We will not renew this. We'll try schemes and plots to get them out of this hell hole they fell into. If you do not accept our fifty thousand dollar offer now you will never get it again."

"I realize that," said Penrod. "But I told you my sisters have the say on that matter and if I cannot accept I must be prepared to take the consequences."

"Very well then," said Mr. Gale. "God help them, and you too. There seems nothing for us to do Mr. Ware but to go back to Argelina Agathia if possible. I bid you good day and good night," and he bowed sadly but politely to Penrod. "I hope you will have some reason to regret your refusal of our offer but the enemy is not to be trifled with."

"I hope so my self," said Penrod lightly. "I hope the visitors had gone, General Vi Hinde and two of his

Prince friend, and shaking his head (maybe dead) remarked: "!!!!!!"

"God know you know your own business Prince best than we do. Yet I cannot but feel you have made a serious mistake...."

"Oh yes," asked Penrod. "By not accepting the bribe and taking that money. If I a prince who am so rich as to own a nation take money from some body else and especially for something which is no business of mine but my sister's? I can easily get more than that in a day, and I have an idea in mind for an improve improvement in our military spy work against the foe. And your own plans will soon be ready so that you can crush Viviananna's army before he can oust him from the territory of Podgio. Besides, a prince doesn't really need any money. We all love gold more than any worldly goods, in fact in comparison with him money and treasures are a mere nothing."

"I know you are right on that Prince, but you must remember that you are what Mr. Gale said. There is no boy who can in the whole wide world boast of having little sisters like you have, nor a brother or father either," said General Glade-Rinia who was with Hinder-Rinia. "And remember this big war, (where so many battles are fiercer than the whole world war was by now the same may know) has made for us many dreadful changes, and things that so often brought the whole of Abbeennia and her sister-states the most handsome incomes in the world where we out-rival every nation, hardly sell at all now. Remember Abbeennia. That city has never been covered from the disaster yet and is still partly underwater and all her territory. That disaster shows the enemy is not to be trifled with wicked as she is."

"Oh don't worry you general. We still have all our big sound banks owned only by the Government. I'm expecting Hanson Vivian my uncle back to join father any day now and he'll give us the annual statement of our account, and then we'll know where we still stand. And you must know that though the effort on father's every thing is being done at what ever the expense and even blood shed if necessary to prevent such flood and explosion disasters in the future. I'm not afraid of the money end. Our country even though the enemy is holding but as may be said valiantly is doing well and it is going to do better. We even have not the same miles yet in the field which we easily could put out to easily over Whalm Glade-Rinia. Our part of the war now is only a trial part of the drama. The main act has not come yet, and also I have a new idea that will make the enemy wish they had left my sister alone, no matter what they did in defense of our country."

"That's all very well Prince," said the general Glade-Rinia himself who seemed oppressed by something. "As you say money is nothing at all in comparison to love of God, and I know you are right, and that in all probabilities our cause will triumph rising the world by the good breaking victory later on. But there is something about the petitions of those men I do not like. They were very disturbed, almost angry, and scared at your refusal of their offer. I could see that they may feel a sense of danger for you waste your where you don't see it your self. Prince, don't want to be a croaker but I think you will have to watch out, if you don't heed the warning of those two Gemini. They know more about the enemy than you do despite all your work as Adeldefob, there is no going to be trouble for you sisters and I'm afraid you too. The enemy these days are not to be trifled with." And general Glade-Rinia shook his head dolefully.

"Well what ever the enemy do when it's clean and above board is the spice of effort and victory for us." He turned Pen-Rod lightly. "I am not afraid of that."

"No but it is often unfair and underhand," said general Hinder-Rinia. "I think it would have been better Pen-Rod to have accepted that offer of fifty thousand dollars a year, clean money is a good sum."

"Yes, but you must understand general, cannot accept even if I wanted to. You or they don't understand what I mean. If father does not object to their doings, is it my business to but in to put in my say. I'd get the walking papers in a hurry. If those two men want to have something to do on that matter let them go to father as proposed and when he says they'll do for him only, but the danger is far less often times than the Gemini imagine. I've often heard that though it seems to approach and harm could never overtake an angel possessed child, for to harm the child you'll first have to harm the angel. If demons possessing people have much power that it only takes a miracle to drive one out, how can you harm a true good angel possessing a child. Their fears about my sisters are foolish ones. Their expeditions are nothing and they told me so that every time they did anything they only made fools of the enemy, and may make me much safer for them yet with some thing that occurred to me only a short while ago. I got about those Gemini men general, and I'll tell you my new idea, but wait, I want Tim and James to hear it. Where are they? Where did they go?"

"They went in my other side of the house a little while ago with you sisters. Then they all went out when those two men came to do something important and--" At that moment from the garden at the side of the library the sound of voices in dispute could be heard.

"Now you get right away from that lower window," exclaimed some one who could be none other than a boy scout. "What do you want to clatter up this place for peeping in at other people's windows. Be you a spy. Get away from here or I'll have a soldier place you under arrest."

"No so a more kid like you want me to get out, so please you put me in place," cried a big voice, that of a man.

"There's something wrong out side," cried Pen-Rod outside. "I'll have to go outside and give that abbe-nock something to do that will fix his length. If he's a spy he'll get his." Put as Pen-Rod was about to leave the room, another voice was heard in the garden.

"You are under arrest Mr.," said some one which sounded like another voice and it appeared to be that of a girl. "My brother is a pirate. Well you face looks like a lemon slice. The garden is no place for people like you. Spying I'll bet. Don't move toward me or I'll riddle you with pistol shot. And you call the off ice of the garden and have him marched to the camp for investigation."

"Wait'll show that giant spy whether I am a pirate or not," cried the boy. "I could riddle him too. Riddling spies is my middle name."

"Be careful," said his sister who was moving up as Hinder-Rinia came up to take charge of the prisoners. "Keep your eyes on him so he won't make a break and run."

"He can't get it in he likes," chuckled the boy. "I'll get it good if he tries. Then there was silence, and Pen-Rod and the general looking out saw the man followed by the boy about leading a tall man dressed in civilian clothes away, while coming up the walk was the two boys, and Violet, and he sister.

"I was just going to look for you (not a joke)," said Pen-Rod.

"So why we had to go off in such a hurry and leave you alone," said Violet, but do you know without our knowing it we met that man who once said I wouldn't want to be one of the Vivian girls. He increased to call the world. He made that me mark again and he has a great deal. I'm going to leave him to you to do what you will. He is not a prisoner though only we won't let him go any until you see him."

"That's all right Violet that's all right," said Pen-Rod genially. "As he says he wouldn't want to be one of you. Well I'm going to make him when I have the chance. I'll make him accompany me on an expedition, probably this, and if he is a coward and doesn't well I'll make him so. Not time he'll keep his mouth shut."

"I wished safely to get back and see you," said him and it's about something very important."

"No trouble, hop on," replied Pen-Rod, for the manner of the boy was rather easy.

"Trouble, oh no. There is no trouble Pen-Rod. In fact there may be the other way about. Pen-Rod, have an idea and there may be a permanent rift for you sisters in it. That's it permanent rift."

"Good," cried the Young Prince. "Right as well bits off a big lump while you are at it. So you have a good idea. Well also I have myself but I'll listen to you first. What is it Jamie dear?" he added as she went on to him to attract his attention.

"Do you wish to see that man who broke him wait?"

"Let him wait by all means. I'll see him after Tim is through with him. Then I have my plans with him."

"Then he'll need to Tim and asked!!!!

"What is your idea?"

"It's a new kind of plan Pen-Rod. I haven't got it all worked out yet but I can give you a good rough outline. On my way over I got to thinking about the spy work of intelligence and how he does it so long within the foe lines, and then of you being an Adeldefob, and the like, and it occurred to me that the present plan of you and us two and you sisters, we main cleverly disguised to be long time still in the foe lines like Adeldefob, I thought that would be no appearance but we won't decide on that now. After that plan is going to be an appearance and I want to talk to you before you decide about it. The idea is to whizz in and out of the foe lines of spying involved in my plan, and I--"

"And I'll be a friend of spying involved in my plan, and I--"

"At that moment the general and sister of steel and wood from the garden out of what was of which Pen-Rod and his sister and the two boys had been talking. Then followed a jumble of words.

"Something's wrong again," cried Pen-Rod as he ran toward them.

"Side of the house. I mean it's a fight with a big this time."

"Indeed, indeed, and the all that that man was the case of Pen-Rod and his sister and the two boys, as they rounded the corner of the house and looked into the newly opened garden. There stood a man in a soldier's uniform, holding a pistol in his hand as if he were only a small wood the face of some at a smiling man in plain clothes. The other man was plainly trying to get at him. His enemy but he was prevented by the long distance held the pistol and of him.

travelling through the Glandelinian camps as simple as taking out your shoe and to go sliding down an easy road. It was that Penrod, and you a good while ago that I know that for an idea!"

"You Timothy G. overcame disappointment, Penrod was not enthusiastic, though his sisters were interested enough. The young prince gazed at his eccentric boy friend and then said slowly:

"Well that's all right in theory but how is it going to work out in practice?"

"That's what I wished to talk to you about, Penrod was the reply. "That is what, he replied over to you again for that's my big idea. It's not that great!"

"I'm really sorry to shut you out of my castle," said Jennie herself. "But for the life of us we can't see how it will work. Of course in theory if you could by a miracle change the sound of our voices which we cannot do, there would be some good success to your plan. And if this could be done, I grant that we could do wonders for your idea—but that was what really gave us away to those gossips who seemed to readily recognize us despite the cleverest disguise."

disguises we would use to make up, our sound of speech, and the air of grace about us, and our manner of walk which is almost impossible to disguise. We can only do that successfully in a Glandelinian army where we are not known. But how are you going to get us not to miss Mass. Radcliffe told us he never heard of Mass at all within the Glandelinian armies. He had to go out by night to get back to the Christian lines to hear Mass every morning and be back in time to be within for Mass, and how he accomplished that Heaven only knows. How are we going to disguise our manner, voices, and air of grace?"

"Learn how to do it," said Tim promptly. "You can cultivate that some how I'm sure, you could go to a teacher who could learn you how to disguise your voices. You can imitate every gosh hang bird and animal in his country so good, so also I guess you could learn to disguise your voices. That's a small detail that could be easily worked out. I leave that to you, you sisters and your brother!"

"I'd rather you wouldn't said Angelina herself. "That's the whole difficulty of changing our voices, manner and air of grace. It could be accomplished of course but it would take time and we couldn't practice that with the foe lines. Wait I'll explain it to you. Then the princess went into details. She told of the ponderous work she and her sisters had attempted in disguise to hide their beauty and though they had succeeded in making themselves look like different girls, hiding their beauty was like trying to hide a fish in a glass globe full of water and nothing else, and spoke of their terrible ideal of not trying to speak at all within hearing of foe officers for fear their voices could be recognized."

"Anything that you would gain by trying to learn to disguise our voices would be lost any way because though we disguise at times as boys we can't look like boys," Angelina told Tim. "Besides if we could change the manner of our graceful steps and walk or our ways it would create such an effort on our part that we would have to go studying it for days before we could pronounce our selves perfect enough to take the chances of going for that length of time into the foe lines. We would only be making little fools out of ourselves and gain nothing by it any how. No one can stay too long within the foe lines without causing suspicion, you would have to live their ways, which is wicked, do what they do, and if we noted no long an scout we'd be compelled to give child slaves to henipus work and toil and ill treatment which is against our constitution. My I and my sisters have gone through experiences in our earlier life which we take good care to avoid in the future. Attempts a thousand times have been made by the Glandelinians to run us to earth, even within the Christian lines and what James can tell you happened to us, we can't tell you and what trouble James had to bring us through it all would make you shudder and shudder and spy no long within the foe lines without detection would be out of the question. It's perilous enough to chance chase after those spies with out doing that. That plan of yours Tim dear is out of the question, thank heavens and averts. The Glandelinians are too dangerous now to try that. Often I and my sisters have been tempted to flee to the United States if I didn't that might Penrod dear?"

"Yes indeed," answered the prince.

"You think so too Penrod?" asked Tim.

"I'm sure of it."

"Oh dear! That's too bad. I sure thought I had a new idea. Well you and your sisters had the most experience and ought to know the plan goes on the trash heap. Well I'll say no more about it. You and your sisters ought to know best Penrod. I wasn't thinking of it so much for myself, it was for you and they. I thought you'd like some new idea to work on, so you could make a fool of the enemy in the eyes of the world."

"Much obliged, I'm dear but I have a new idea," said Penrod.

"You have what is it? Tell me and you sisters, if it isn't a secret," went on the eccentric boy about as much delighted over Penrod's new plan as he had been over his own, so doomed to failure so soon.

"It isn't a secret from you, and my sisters know it all ready for it is the same idea any how," said Penrod. "They got the idea while we came here. We are not going into the foe lines after all."

"Oh! Not why have they again tried to back out? He asked with a sort of grin."

"No giggled Violet. "The spies we are after are here, in camp."

"My gosh. Then they didn't leave for the foe lines!"

"They couldn't."

"I wanted to tell the plan then to my sisters," said Penrod but, had trouble making myself understood because of the noise of the confounded street cars. The spies are in the city again."

"Those street cars do make a terrible great racket," conceded James himself. "But I suppose anything cannot be done about it. What is your plan, Penrod?"

"Well these spies, by disguising as Melfob, making off he came here to spy too, and my sisters can act as Confederates. And that's what I'm going to do. Not because I want to do so but I believe that way we can capture them and such a capture would be valuable, especially if we get the main ones."

We got to capture them by a trick, as to do so openly would bring us disaster as they are dangerous. So also go over the enemy's lines some times and not be seen or recognized would be valuable many times. And that's what I'm going to do, work throughout the city as Melfob. I've got a plan to do so without being mistaken by our friends as an enemy. I tell you one thing. Had I been alone when we came upon Radl Radcliffe all would have been well for, believe me the members who Melfob is, we were a little foolish after all to have run off and hidden as we did but I've got the germ of an idea and now—"

"Excuse me" said a voice behind Penrod, his sisters and the two boys, and turning the young Prince beheld the form of Henry Gale President of the Pando Gemini Universal Society of Military War-detectives. Penrod had drawn a pencil and paper from his pocket, and as he and his sisters and the two other boys were sitting on the steps of General Hindes headquarters the young prince was about to demonstrate by a drawing, a part of his new project, when the interruption came in the shape of one of the men who had, an hour before, made that sort of bribe offer to Penrod.

"Excuse me" went on Mr. Henry Peton Gale. "I Mr. Ware and I got to talking it over on our way to the station—the matter of having you ask your sisters to give up this dreadful dangerous military work of theirs, I say in now in their presence here too—and we concluded that it was worth one hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year for us to have to do it. I came back—"

"It isn't of the slightest use Mr. Gale, I assure you," said Penrod a bit heatedly, for he did not like the persistency of this man nor did he like his coming on these parts of the headquarters ground unannounced and in this secret manner. "I told you I could not and would not accept your offer. It is not altogether a matter of money any how what about their possession angels. They are well protected. My word is final."

"Oh very well if you put it that way," said Mr. Gale stiffly. "Of course the there is nothing more to say. But I thought perhaps you did not consider we had offered you enough and—"

"Your offer is far enough from a financial standpoint," said Penrod. "But I simply cannot accept it. And I have other plans. Frank," he called to one of the boy scouts who was passing kindly see Mr. Gale to the gate, and then let me know how it was any one came in here without a pass or permit."

"Yes sir," said the boy scout, as he stood significantly waiting.

"There were no guards at the gate when I came in," said Mr. Gale and "The man seemed antagonizing." I wanted this time to speak to you before your sisters—"

"To ask you to consider your offer—so I came back."

"It's against the rules to admit strangers to the headquarters private grounds," said Penrod. "Good day."

The President of the Universal City Gemini did not respond, but there was a look on his face as he turned away that had Penrod and his sisters even present, might have caused them some great uneasiness. But they did not see. Instead Penrod resumed his talk with Tim.

"Prince your idea is most interesting," declared the eccentric man. I hope you will be able to work it out."

"I'm going to try," said the young prince. "I hope that man—Mr. Gale did not mean anything of what I was saying. He sneaked up on us before we were aware" any one was new but ourselves."

"I don't imagine he heard very much, Pen-rod said. "He may have heard you mention about you being 'Adeldefob'---"

"That is just what I wish he didn't hear" broke in Pen-rod. "That's the germ of my idea."

"But if he is a real member of the Gemini he sure wouldn't betray us," said Tim.

"That is not the point. These members of the Gemini see that the Glandelinians are getting more dangerous every day, and once it becomes known that I am working on that he'll put obstacles in our way to prevent us doing what he considers dangerous duties---wall the risk is no use carrying over spilled milk" and he smiled at the homely proverb. "I'll have to work in secret on ce I've started." "Do you think the Abbeannian government would approve of you not giving in to the advice of the Gemini Pen-rod?" asked James.

"I think it should be glad to if it wishes our Nation to win in this war. It cannot compel us any way. Only Father can do that. Consider any how what my sisters or what a wonderful part my sisters have and are playing in this gigantic war! It is really a struggle to see who will be the master of the world---the wickedness of Glandelinia, or the holiness of Abbeannia---and suddenly up to now the wickedness of Glandelinia, or the holiness of Abbeannia---and suddenly up to now I have to say the Glandelinians are having the advantage, even in spite of all the best the boy and girl scout regiments have helped our armies to do. Through the help of that confounded Glancy the Glandelinian armies have more and more began to forge ahead, and now it is said General Izner-Myltze with his armies is leading every thing or will shortly. We have been a bit slow with our military movements but soon we will be booming along with the help of our Dear Blessed Lord Abbeannia will soon soon have the mastery over the wicked for good and all."

"I hope so," sighed little Daisy. "We must beat the wicked."

Briefly Pen-rod spoke of what General Izner-Myltze's armies were doing in their campaigns and advances, that through all his career, though the Christians as to say in a slang way had thrown him all hell upon him were not able to check his headlong advance and mention too was made of what many other Glandelinian generals especially the four Manleys, Glancy, and Manlet had done alongside to the successes of dangerous and unbeaten Myltze. Pen-rod mentioned however that in no way though was Myltze a cruel man, and no towns, villages and cities had been wantonly destroyed in the path of his advance or child-re harmed.

"But despite the wickedness of Glandelinia's cause Glandelinian generals like the Manleys, Fedewal, and the like have made gallant names for themselves bravely fighting successfully against our grand army and unless we plan something against them and prevent the work of their spies they will be doing better against us. My sisters have told me that often," declared Pen-rod. "And is silence as to what they intend to do the chief recommendation?" asked Tim.

"Yes," replied Pen-rod. "Or rather it will be if I or others don't have something perfected pretty soon. Our own spies and agents have done work as speedy as any of the enemy have. It is only the terrific power of the Glandelinian armies and their abilities of the generals that is a handicap. It is a handicap to our generals, and as the enemy so frequently destroy so much communications it makes things less satisfactory for us. Then too the action of the enemy scout patrols more clever than our own warns the enemy generals of the approach of a Christian army some times long before it can be seen with our own plans working to perfection if it can be accomplished. All this disaster would be done away with with my new plans in case I can perfect it, the enemy's lines by approaching armies could be approached as silently as American Indians over in America used to approach the long cabins of the white settlers. I'd like to train the armies and the ski-mob lines to approach the enemy that way. That will be our great advantage. --not that easy methods of the battle can be won more promptly go for that after all is an detail not so important but to approach the enemy's lines in the silence of the night would be a distinct gain."

"I believe it would," Pen-rod exclaimed James himself. "and I think too that at your father would be glad to get armies trained to do the attacking that way" he added.

"put ain't that sort of attacking treacherous?" asked Violet.

"Pen-rod laughed out loud scornfully.

"What do the enemy do?" asked. "Indians were never treacherous that way. War against Nature, war against all Good, ruthlessly without warning causing Nature to war itself against cities and towns, burning all our forests, blowing up whole mountain ranges, destroying Abbeann, making big floods, massacring countless numbers of children in a manner you my sisters only can tell of and if that ain't treacherous what is it. I'm going to train my armies that way no matter what any body says. And Emperor Vivians army my father's will be the first one trained that way if he wants it if I can make my plans a success for Heaven knows I know enough Indian Tricks to do the work. That is unless those more clever Glandelinian generals get ahead of me."

"What other Glandelinian generals?" asked Hottie.

"Well for instance, that Glancy, and his crowd. He's an American." was the answer.

"So he isn't said Catherine. "He came from that country called Ireland didn't he?"

"Well that may give us a show then" said Pen-rod feeling much relieved.

"But he knows enough about American War History to follow the plans and actions of those so called Civil War Generals. If I was sure that they didn't feel offended for refusing their offer on that bribe of theirs I'd have engaged Gale and War to help on the plan, though of course I could draft them, and now that Gale overheard---as he must have---what I intended working on he and War may be worried more than ever. There must be something in it after all or other wise they wouldn't come offering money to have you little girls go home, but it ain't safe home either I'm afraid. It seems safe in the army."

"Well if it ain't safe any where then the United States for me" said Violet. "but why run away from the enemy. put do you mean to try and really out wit those spies we are after?"

"Yes. It would be a big feather in the caps of their generals if they succeeded in their mission, for they know that our Government Armies has not been so very successful in their attempts against the foe. That's why they are so desperate I guess. We are pursuing them, but I wouldn't want to change places with them."

"I shouldn't be surprised too Pen-rod" conceded Jennie herself. "Since you turned out after all by the good grace of God to be our lost youngest brother, brother, and since you are so famous in all you did, and how you once before our very eyes captured single handed from the enemy that giant cannon and the great searchlight during a raid you have come into greater prominence before father and the Abbeannian nation than ever before and are a terror to the enemy. They never molest you and when you are with us they leave us alone. And what you have done is a wonderful success. God has been awfully good to us and we don't deserve---"

"Can that talk" said Jim sarcastically. "what good don't you deserve I'd like to know. You came for other's only and not you-selves. Where did you secure the big searchlight Pen-rod?"

"I secured it" admitted Pen-rod modestly enough in the Glandelinian camps during that raid I made that night to avenge Lodw Lowdens treatment of my sister Jennie. Since then the big searchlight seems to have been of some great benefit to the Christian battle front, and though they have not yet been able to manufacture and transport as many of those big cannons, captured it is progressing I understand. The government is using the two things I have captured and there is no necessity of commanding them either since I had freely offered them to the Government."

"Well since I can't help you with my plan which I proposed" said Tim with a smile. "let me do what I can toward your role as Adeldefob Prince. What are you going to do?"

"Oh I don't know---but I've got to have ourselves pretend we are in league with the spies in order to trap and kill them, kill them we must they cannot be captured alive they're too dangerous. I guess that plan would be as good as any. And now to get down to brass tacks, as the poet says I believe I will speak to that man my sister said they arrested. Violet you know who he is. Have him brought before us."

Violet went and soon came back between two soldiers and the man. Pen-rod sized him up and then grinned.

"What are you on probation for?" the young prince asked.

"I didn't mean any harm. I was asked by a boy scout how I would like to be one of the princes and I say nothing doing because they'll live a lot harder, I wouldn't want to be them for all the world."

"This is your second time isn't it?"

"Yes Prince."

"Who arrested you?"

"That boy scout arrested him" said Jennie with a pout. "He got so we when he said that."

Pen-rod was silent for a moment though that grin to their surprise never left his face. Finally he spoke, then of course he looked more serious.

"I don't care what it is, alright or serious I don't like any disturbing words about or against my sister. I don't know how serious you offense may be in the eyes of God, but your manner shows you probably are an enemy of the Cross. Am I right?"

"What do you mean Prince?"

"You stumble at little trials and difficulties I suppose."

"Well I'll have to admit, do I must confess I slightly blasphemed over a toothache last night."

"You did?" And Penrod now frowned while his sisters gave a sudden start and turned pale.

"Yes Prince."

"Tell you fool, and He died on the Cross for you. What did you do. Or use Him or swear or use vile language."

"I said He was cruel to let me suffer like that?"

"Tim couldn't help it he giggled. That sounded so absurd."

"Why didn't you go to a dentist and have it attended to?" Tim then answered.

"I was afraid."

"Oh you were?" put in Penrod. "And you put in a complaint. Well Ours Blessed Lord did not give you that toothache. And you could have ended it by going to a dentist. There is not a dentist in our country that can't stop a pain in a tooth. A toothache is no joke I'll admit but it is not to be blasphemed about. You blasphemy was a mortal sin and you say it was a slight one."

"You lied about Him too. He is not cruel but very merciful. Your offense is serious, but not enough to merit a lashing. But I'm going to punish you just the same. You are going to do what you said you distate. Going to be one of my sisters."

"But I can't, I'm a man Prince."

"I don't mean I have power to turn you into a girl!" said Penrod sarcastically. "But you are going to go through an adventure with us for punishment and if you don't make good it's going to be bad for you. We are after spies and we are going to make you help us get them. If you turn out brave all right, we'll forgive you, but if you are cowardly and desert you'll face a firing squad."

"I'm no soldier Prince and jigg!"

"Well you are drafted right now. You need no uniform as you are." Then turning to the soldiers who stood on each side of the man; "Let him be free. He is not a prisoner but if he tries to leave camp remember don't hesitate to shoot. I'm going to make him make good in restitution and redress for that blasphemy and the words he said concerning my sisters." They obeyed and the man not much shaken by his sentence said;

"Where am I going to go?"

"You are going to stay in this house. He said 'John' to the general's aide camp."

"How this man a room room."

"And the boy did."

"Now dear sisters-----"

"Gentlemen to see you Prince," interrupted the same boy returning after showing the other fellow a room.

"Well for me," cried Tim. "We've visited. I hope it isn't Gale or War come back to paste you about what they worry about."

Indeed Penrod looked up with a distinct appearance of being annoyed that was to Violet and his sisters unusual with him, for he was nearly always, except concerning the ways of the enemy good natured beyond natural ways it seemed.

But the scowl that has replaced the pleasant look on his face while he was talking to Tim and his sisters about his plan was at once wiped away as he looked at the card the boy scout held out to him.

"Bring him in right away," he ordered. "He need not have stood on that ceremony at all."

"Well he said it was a military business call," returned the boy scout with a cheerful grin, and he said he wanted it done according to form, so he gave me his card to bring you."

"What does he think I am because I'm a pttttt Prince?" said Penrod. "No more to me now; suppose I'll receive the title of 'I own the world'. How him in. And he grinned himself."

"Who is it?" asked his sisters and the two boys together.

"It's Fred Perkins," Penrod answered and old time boy friend of you dear good little girls, though why he is putting on all this formality I can't fathom. Every body wants to make of me more than I suppose."

The boy scout went back to the main gate and told the soldiers on guard the there to admit Fred, who had so formally sent in his card (not hard) "Oh His Majesty Prince Penrod, I believe!" began the boy with that suave formal air which usually precedes a military meeting between a prince and his aide de camp.

"I suppose that is my name," said Penrod with a suppressed grin, while his sisters giggled, and he spoke as stiffly as though to a perfectly strange. "Prince Penrod, the greatest little prince the world ever knew of," went on Fred.

"Yes?" and indicating them, "These are my darling sisters, and two princely boy friends of mine."

"Oh then, I am in the right place. Just sign here please, on the dotted line on this--" and he held out a form of paper with wadding on it, and plenty of dotted lines and a fountain pen to Penrod, who took them half mechanically.

"Huh, what's the big idea Fred?" asked the young Prince, unable longer to carry on the joke. "Is this a war-form for my arrest for being such a good boy, or merely a testimonial to you. If it's the latter and conceals your new news which you surely show by handing this to me, I'll gladly sign it."

"Well it's something like that," laughed Fred. "That's your application for another block of 'Child Slave Liberty Bonds', Penrod, and I want you as a personal favor to me, as a military business favor to your good and Holy Country for the welfare of the poor unhappy child slaves, and as you plainly duty to your Country's sake and your darling sisters and Father and Mother, to double your last subscription like your sisters have done."

Penrod looked at the sum Fred had filed in on the blank form of another paper, and uttered a slight whistle of surprise, while again his sisters couldn't suppress a slight giggle, and Jennie jokingly pushed Penrod.

"That's all right now," said Fred with the air of a professional salesman, "You can stand that and more too. You see I'm letting you off easy. Why I got your dear Father and Mother and Uncle---each for three times that much, for what they took the last time, and your dear sisters themselves---hard as they are working for the Country's cause---gave me a nice application, so it's up to you to do--"

"Nug Nuff said!" exclaimed Penrod sententiously, as he promptly signed his name. "I must have to reconsider my recent refusal of the offer of the Universal Gemini Headquarters in Pandora, though if I haven't money enough to meet this subscription, Fred."

"Oh you'll meet it all right," much obliged" and Fred folded the Abbeismian Liberty Bond subscription paper and put it in his pocket, "but did you turn down the offer of these Military Detectives?"

"I did," answered Penrod. "But how did you know about it Fred?"

"I just let me say I'm heartily sorry you decided not to accept the offer of their advice. Of course it is not of my business but I can see something for both of us boding that, don't want to talk about. All the Gemini have become very rich through their work for Prince and have lots of money, and they have made up all sorts of schemes to have you doings and the doings of your sisters investigated as if they were spying on you yourselves, and investigated the enemy too, and Heaven tells you they know the dangers more than you do. I hate to say it Penrod, and to your sisters too, but if they could they'd use tricks of force to prevent you and they from continuing on your work just for your sakes so dangerous is the enemy becoming. You can remember what a job

James had recently to save your sisters from so many spies and so dangerous was the situation that all suspects as you know were massacred in their behalf. The Gemini have some government contracts which they seized from the enemy recently and they found out about Glandelinia's concern of your sisters, and that made Da-ga-sent Gale and War. The way I happened to know they were likely to make you an offer is this-- continued Fred Perkins. The Gemini in Pandora do military business with the one biggest branch in Angelina Agatha, with which another branch of which my father is connected. The other day I happened to see some correspondence about you. These Gemini members of the their heads of the Pandora Branch asked the boy and girl scout leaders about you to find out certain things about, and as a matter of military business and duty they had to give the information out of a small report, you know nothing unusual you know and it isn't the first time it's been done since your success in your efforts to be come so tremendous. But that's how it happened to know these fellows contemplated dickering with you."

"Do you know Gale or War?" Penrod asked.

"Not personally, but in military business way, Penrod I'd warn you for your sisters to take their advice and watch out for the enemy, as the enemy is dangerous these days. They even put one over on your own government all right as you well know and the more may be some unpleasant publicity to it later. But they are putting up a big bluff, and pretending they can turn out a lot of flying machines for use on the battle field when they can't. I know your sisters may not fear the Manly Manleys and the others Penrod, as they really are only big floods of flashers and bluffs at that but for God's sake keep them away from Lacy's Clancy's army and the other one under General Michael Gray Jiggs. They're dangerous fellows, and in military ways they're sharp dealers. Why don't you get busy on that end of the game Penrod. I know already in behalf of your Country, and for your sisters, you've more than done your bit, with Liberty Bonds, subscriptions to the Military Y.M.C.A. other war work, leading in raids, fast rating the enemy in everything, besides your famous captures, and also capturing many famous inventions of the enemy, but you such a shark on other things that you have learned over in the United States, I'd think you'd train you armies that way and cause the enemy a big scare. You can do it Pen-od."

"I would in a minute, Fred and you know it, but the fact of the matter is I have not the equipment for such a way to do things. I've sent for plenty of things from the United States from the address where I left them but they haven't arrived yet, and I know the enemy is coming in ever-increasing numbers. A terrible battle is raging between Podgie and De Pressionville and raging still and the war is growing more violent every day. Most of my raiding work against the enemy, and my efforts to frustrate any of the spies is only most of all an experimenting business here, while James and I know more about outwitting spies than I do, he being an American and I not. I have told the government officials they can have and work on any plan I've got, and you know I've done all I can, and yet the enemy is not weakened."

"Yes I remember that," said Fred. "De Pressionville shows that. You are no slacker and the enemy dreads you. I am good at shouldering a rifle too but during this spell when our armies are compelled to be inactive watching and guarding Pando-ra I keep myself at this Abbieannian Liberty Loan work. Well your Government ought to know."

"That's what I say," agreed Pen-od.

"And by the way," continued Fred. "I've this late evening met Radcliffe and some Fargo-ian boyscouts. They were in Pando-ra. They're trailing they say ten or eleven Glandelinian boy scouts who cleverly eluded them in Pando-ra though an Alley. Radcliffe believes they passed General Hinde's proper property here and are escaping. He's a relentless pursuer but did you see any strange boys pass through here Prince?"

"Pen-od for this moment had forgotten his meeting with that party in the alley while in disguise, and the truth that Radcliffe had trailed the supposed boy scouts here, alarmed Pen-od.

"Jhyb goosh," he said looking suspiciously at General Hinde-nine. "He said anything about that. When did he meet them in Pando-ra?"

"I don't know the hour but it was late in the afternoon. Radcliffe told me and said he is bound to run them to earth. You know he never fails in anything." Pen-od's face turned black.

"Eleven Glandelinian spies and boys. It cannot be. Radcliffe must have made a mistake. Seen anything of them Violet when we came here?"

They all had forgotten their experience, and thinking really about the spies Violet and her sisters looked alarmed, though Violet shook her head in answer. Pen-od left the steps and walked over to the guards at the gate.

"Say," he said. "Seen anything of eleven Glandelinian boy scouts snooping around here. I got word they passed here and Radcliffe if hot foot after them."

"Jhy no Prince. Only you, your sister and two boys came here with you, and Valte Starving too. No one was in sight that was suspicious. Were they disguised as Christian scouts?"

"That's what I do not know. Hey Fred come here. I want to ask you something."

"Yes, they were in Glandelinian uniform," said Fred to Pen-od's question. "They were on horse back too."

"Well that beats all the cake," said Pen-od. "Are you sure 'no the guard' they didn't come here?"

"Yes."

Pen-od and Violet and her sisters and the others looked badly worried. "I've got something else in my mind that may help me catch certain spies," said Pen-od. "But I'm deathly afraid to make the plans now."

"What is it?" asked Fred looking cautiously around. "You can tell me in a whisper."

"Did you ever hear of a boy scout called 'Adeldefot' asked Pen-od.

"Jhy yes. You are him," said Fred. Then Pen-od told him friend in whispers a few details, such as those he had been telling him.

"Then I don't wonder you turned down the offer of the Unive-sal Gemini." He remarked Fred at the conclusion of the details. "If you can succeed this will be a heap more help to the Abbieannian Government Pen-od, than anything else. And if you get shot and can't meet your newest Liberty Bond payment, why I guess the bank will stretch your credit a little."

"Thanks," laughed Pen-od. "But I'll not need to ask them."

The friends talked together a little longer then Fred had to take his departure to solicit his subscriptions, while Pen-od then sent a notice to officials to be on the lookout for the Glandelinian spies just mentioned. "And watch out for those eleven spies," warned Fred. "I'm not telling you this as a boy scout official, for I'm not supposed to, but as a personal."

"I'll be on the watch," said Pen-od. "I hope Radcliffe and his officials come soon. I'll help them in their quest."

And as he sent his sisters in to warn General Hinde-nine, and went into his own room he wondered why it was the General, and Fred had warned him that he had been foolish not to accept the offer of Gale and Valte. The rest of the evening before supper was busy for Pen-od and his sisters.

to.

Radcliffe and his gang had not arrived. Pen-od while waiting for his rival had made up his mind to go to work on his plans to capture the main spies he was after, all else according to the idea of his sisters were put aside, but he was worried about those Glandelinian boy scouts. In fact though it was supposed to be himself and his sisters and two boy followers being trailed by mistake, had not known it, the danger now was real, eleven were snooping around some where but had not come here as supposed. Pen-od sent a secret note to little Nell softly in his father's Headquarters, telling her what he was going to do, and asking her to say nothing about it, and when he had captured the spy she'll be given a chance to tell all she knew about Abbieann, which of course that dear brave little girl agreed to.

"Come and see me when you can Pen-od dear," she sent back word. "But I know you won't have much chance when you are experimenting with your disguise plans. Be careful though, those spies are dangerous, and will fight to the death if cornered. You can only capture them by a trick. And I shall be working so hard writing a long story for you on behalf of what really happened at Abbieann and who are responsible that I can't get much chance to entertain you or your beautiful seven little guardian angels who are your sisters. I'll tell them guard-ian angels because they are part human and part angel, being possessed by them. But the war big as it is can't last for ever."

"Nag nag Pen-od with a sigh, as he put away his secret place he letter."

"And thank our dear blessed Lord it can't."

The young Prince then with the help of his sisters threw himself into the perplexing work of inventing proper disguises for his sisters to defy all detection with all the favors he had given to the capture of the Glandelinian war tank. The giant cannon, the wonderful search light and other machines though he locked himself and his sisters in the room as if he had made themselves and too the tightest prisoners on record. He was afraid about the news of those eleven spies.

"And" named Pen-od as he and his sisters sat at his work table there with pencil and paper before him since this is a problem in dry goods and acoustics combined. I had best begin I suppose dear sisters, by first going back over the various disguises you told me you used to use and after noting what to form this time on how to make you so nothing can detect you. Now as to the first the principal disguises are --"

At that instant there broke on Pen-od's ears and his sisters too a succession of discordant sounds which seemed to be a combination of an old fashioned Indian Yaw-whoop college student yells at a foot ball game, and words such as this "stop stop where do you think you are going" come back here. "Shoot the skunks, added by the sounds of shots, and something falling down. All outside."

"Words" what that is. "Used the young Prince, the first to hastily rise. "Better we solve that problem before we tackle the disguise situation."

Pen-od followed by his sisters rushed from the front door of General Hinde-nine's headquarters, and saw a number of soldiers running and shooting at several other fleeing figures just disappearing in the dark, two of them firing back but hitting no one. The soldiers despite the darkness continued after the fugitives who proved to be not what Pen-od had thought, only boys of the enemy, but warily men. Then still came in another distinct other distinct sounds that alarmed him. They seemed to come from a large burn given over recently to electrical apparatus of some kind, and which at the time was not in use as the owner wasn't home.

"Somebody in the sisters" he called, and in fact he was right for he had heard yells coming from the open door of the place. And if it isn't one of those spies I'm sure by guess. Wonder what he can be doing there and what happened to him he is yelling so loudly."

He followed by his sisters crossed the yard between the headquarters and the electrical shop as swiftly as they could, and as he was the first to enter the latter place, he was greeted with a series of wild yells.

"Good volume of sounds here at all events," quipped Pen-od. "Hello there. What's going on? Is any one hurt? That's the matter!" he cried, for at first he could see no one in the dim light of the place, nor could his sisters.

"No one hurt," demand of Pen-od as he advanced.

"Oh boy who ever you are, come quick. I'm most dead and can't let go," was the cry.

"I see what it is and I know he can't let go," chimed in the voice of Jennie. "What is it sister, what has happened to the man?" cried Pen-od running forward though no very powerful curement could be turned on in the small electrical shop at this period of unuse. Unuse, there was enough to be very painful and also to knock you senseless. "What is it Jennie."

"It looks to me as if that man got himself into some sort of trouble," she while she and her sister were alarmed. "We must have got hold of one of those strange contraptions and he can't let go. Look at him squirm! I'm afraid he'll get killed. We've got the switch Pen-rod. Get it and help him."

Then came yells of rage and pain from the man, and they were so loud and vigorous mingled with the pleas of the little girls in their effort to find the proper switch to liberate him that it was no wonder they were startled. The sound of the machine was heard in that part of the camp and a number of soldiers came running toward the shed. But before then Pen-rod had put an end to the trouble here. One look showed him what had happened. Just how the man who was an acquaintance and a friend of his and his sisters had entered the electrical shop Pen-rod did not then stop to inquire. But he saw that in appearance the man must have grasped the handles of one of the strange electrical machines, designed for charging Leyden jars used in the owner's experiments and the powerful though not dangerous current had so paralyzed, temporarily the muscles of the man's hands and arms that he could not let go, and therefore he was squirming and unable to ease himself, while Violet and her sisters were frantic. It was just as she suddenly cried: "Pen-rod, Pen-rod, the switch is the switch. I see it. You can reach it. Please please shut it off" and she said it in a tone as if she was the man instead in that situation and Pen-rod seeing the one she indicated reached up and pulled out the switch thus shutting off the current.

Once free from the powerful current, the man looked at his numb hands and Pen-rod having found the switch that makes a light turned it on. From the men he found out the cause. He had went into the place with the purpose to handle some sort of small machinery by Hinderlines request, and he had from behind been assaulted by two strange men who caused either by accident or design the man to be in the position Pen-rod found him in. In trying to contest his two enemies his two hands some how got in connection with the handle of the machine, in which current was either still on, or had been turned on by his assailants. Then he received a shock he long remembered and he really believed his attacker should be responsible for it.

"Though," said Pen-rod telling the general about it at the supper-table "even if they did not do it, those attackers would have turned on the current if they had known by doing so they could have made good their purpose. Now if I like and I wonder what they were doing here or how they got in. I'm afraid they are after me now instead of just after them."

"Yes but Gale and Wale warned you Prince," said the general. "but what is it this you hinted at--new unbreakable disguises for you--sisters you called it I believe? Are you really serious in trying to form that out?"

"Yes your Excellency I am! I think there is a big field for us to work in and we could also use them when we travel along through the enemy's lines--perhaps only at night--and not be seen or heard. Think of the about work could that could be done."

"Well yes that could be done if you could get means for such disguises as you propose. But I don't believe it could be done. The enemy is too wise."

"Well maybe not your excellency. But I'm going to try."

"How are you going to start Pen-rod?" asked the general.

"I'm going to experiment a bit at first on the old disguises my sisters have still kept. They've got a lot of old disguises and I'm going to try to make them over. As they said if I spoil them the loss won't amount to anything and if I succeed--well we can help out our Father's and Country's cause all the more. With God's help we can go most anything you know."

"Well with out his help I don't believe it can be done."

After supper Pen-rod began work in earnest that night on the big problem. Intending to start and try till bed time and work on it the next day after telephoning his father where he and his sisters and James were. That it was a big problem Pen-rod and his sisters were not disposed to deny and that it would be a valuable plan even the somewhat sceptical general admitted. So as Pen-rod said he would do he began at the very foundation, and studied the fundamental principles of disguises.

The disguise for Violet dear the young prince told her in speaking about the problem "is a sensation difficult to form because of your beauty and the beauty of your sisters. Your faces are the greatest of the problem."

"You are not going to find a sort of false faces for us are you Pen-rod?" asked Jennie.

"If that is so" piped up Daisy "that would be an easy way to solve the problem about our beautiful little faces but I doubt if you could fool the Glandelinian soldiers and Generals that way."

"Now No I'm not figuring on doing the trick that way" said Pen-rod with a laugh. "I've only got to find some way to help you cut down in the temporary disguises the beauty of your faces by some trick face disguise so none of the Glandelinians who may know you little girls, won't be able to recognize you unless they know the art of magic."

"Yes but you must remember the fundamental principles of sound," said Joice.

"Yes I know sound is a vibration which is peculiar to the ear, though the vibration caused by the sound waves may be felt in many parts of the body. But the ear is a great receiver of sound. I suppose you refer to the sound of your voices."

"You are not going to invent a sort of muffle for the ears are you?" asked Argeline with a giggle. "That too would be an easy way to solve that problem but I'll bet you you could not get the Glandelinians to wear your ears so they wouldn't hear the sound of my voice and those of my sisters." and they all giggled.

"No I don't think so" laughed Pen-rod. "It's impossible to cut down the tone of your voices and your voices are naturally sweet and peculiar impossible to disguise or imitate."

"Well I can tell you right off the reel how they could disguise their voices quickly," said Tim.

"How?" asked Pen-rod eagerly.

"I've succeeded in it once maybe it'll work on them if they would care to try it. Drink Brandy with hot pepper not too much but enough to slightly feel it for a few minutes."

"Hum" said Pen-rod musingly while his sisters again giggled. "Yes that would be a simple way out and we'll do it if you'll tell me how we can breathe in a vacuum."

"Oh I didn't agree to do that," laughed Tim. "But I know another way. They could pose and seven deaf and dumb boys who can't hear or talk, and you know totally deaf persons may be made aware of sound through the vibrations received through their hands and feet. They receive of course only the more intense, or largest sound waves and can not hear notes of music or spoken words, though they may feel the vibrations when a piano is played."

"That may work and may not," said Pen-rod "since they cannot disguise their voices which is the most important part of their detection, or even change the nature of their faces it's up to me to solve the problem some other way. The little girls don't really talk loud enough to be heard very close, while my voice I don't know is terribly sharp and loud, but I can imitate other voices too, and assume that as Adelsfob. There when my sisters do talk they don't make noise enough to worry about within four lines when Glandelinian officials are not too close. It's when they are questioned is the trouble and to get rid of that will be my first attempt."

"Can it be done?" asked James.

"I do not know" was Pen-rod's frank answer.

"They do in shows learning great actors how to cultivate and change their voices greatly," went on James. "Some of them being men can imitate a woman's voice to a perfection beyond belief."

"Yes, but no doubt that took years of practice" said Pen-rod and there is more difficulty to my sisters voices and they are unusual. I doubt if any training could enable them to be able to disguise their voices to any appreciable extent and vent a vertogulie as they call it wouldn't do any good or any in argument you would hold in the mouth. The Glandelinians could discover that well enough. But I'll try most along the line of face disguises and take the chances on their response tension of being deaf and dumb children."

"In this country they sell all things where in children use to disguise voices," went on Hettie herself. "couldn't you buy seven of those contraptions and see if we couldn't experiment on them?"

"I doubt it," said Pen-rod shaking his head.

"They have in certain stores too wig for children," said Argeline.

"Could you buy them and have them put on and change our looks?"

"I doubt that too," said Pen-rod. "Of course you must understand it is the same principle as that of the strange way you can bob or fix your hair and put all such devices you use did not cut down your facial beauty and the wig won't help you in that. However I'm going to solve the problem or bust."

And Pen-rod and his sisters came near "busting" James remarked later when something happened which we will soon see, where in all narrowly escaped with their lives.

Two days had passed since the start of his evolution of his new idea and following the visiting of the representatives of the Universal Gemini Branch of Pseudo-Galince then, neither Gale nor Wale were had communicated with Pen-rod.

"But I must be on the watch against Glandelinian spies" thought the young prince. "I'm pretty sure too Gale heard me mention what I was going to try to invent, and he knows the ears are for spies who may try to get ahead of me and put a stoppage to my plans. Not that I'm afraid of being den- out of any any success but I simply don't want to be taken by any glandellians." 612

The details of Penrod's invention for the disguise cannot be gone into but only by it was based on the principle of not only how to get them to disguise their voices within the formulas, sluck up on the carrying of their successful walk, and change the appearance of their faces, but also of producing less blood like sound in their voices. It is of course the strange bird like musical sound of their voices that causes them to be detected by the enemy more than their faces. They have often been able to make themselves look like other gls, and check some of their beauty to a considerable extent but not enough to enable them to defy recognition. Penrod was not planning what disguises they should cover themselves, but of their facial and their voices.

Finally Penrod during the day had got up a sort of head wear which he thought could fit Jennie's head well if she fixed her hair tight and which would make her look altogether like a different girl and not quite so pretty. He had called them into the old shed where in the center was set up an old powerful but not very speedy old time boat engine. He had had some success in making the head disguise from some old hair he had taken from an old hair cushion and then invited his sisters and James and Jim into it to see what he hoped would be a final experiment on at least Jennie. His sisters and the two boys had assembled in the shed and one of the boy scouts was setting up about some refreshments which Penrod had provided.

"What's the strange wig for?" asked Tim.
"I'm hoping it'll work on Jennie. One of my sisters is going to try it on Jennie first. Or in other words--"

"Give it to us chiefly in other words, if you please." Pleading Violet with her customary giggle. Let that go and see if the wig will do some tricks. Start on with the wig and see if any of us will look less pretty."

"Oh with that on you'll look like a monkey all right," said Penrod as he approached the place where the wig was hanging near the big engine which was mounted on a big block. "The wig isn't perfected yet but I hope to have it soon. And here is that boy scout of mine. On there you are. Come here and."

"Yes sir. Am I to help you in this job?"
"Yes just stand guard at the door with rifle in hand and prevent any one from entering."

"That is what I will do Prince."
"Now I guess we are all ready. Can you see Tim and James, and the rest of you little angels while I first put it on who ever readily comes for a visit to me--you Jennie, Jennie--all right?"

"Yes." They answered. They stood near the side wall of the shop, while Penrod stood near the block on which the big engine had been mounted.
"All ready" called the boy inventor of disguises as he placed the wig on Jennie's head. "And when it is placed right I believe you will see the difference."

He had placed the wig on Jennie's head when suddenly there came a roar as though a volcanic blast had been let off in the shop, a deafening roar as if half a dozen Automobiles cut out wheels to explode their cannon underneath. The sides of the shed shook as if there was an earthquake, the roof was lifted up, and Penrod and his sisters were tossed backwards overhead and heeled heels as though by the giant hands of a monster, and James and Tim saw even the big engine fly from the block and shoot straight through what was left of the building ceiling or roof with a crashing crash and splintering sound that could be heard for over a mile. The place was instantly filled with flying bits of wood and a thick dense suffocating cloud of strong smelling smelly sulphurous smoke.

Curious as it certainly may seem (on the moonbeam) James and James were the first to recover themselves and settle to his feet he gave one look at the engine block from whence the big engine had been blown off. Then he looked at the post rate figures of the others around him half buried under fallen timbers and other wreckage, none of them hurt but all stunned and very much startled. Then the gaze of James traveled to the east side of the big shed saw that the whole wall had been blasted out and the wall at one end too and then his gaze also traveled to the big hole in the shattered roof. Indeed it was a gaping hole for the big engine was very heavy even though the roof was not of any flimsy material and had been made strong. And then James exclaimed:

"Good Lord and heavens! did I make the big engine do that?"
His tone was one of such startled consternation and no tragic that Penrod, useful as he felt over the occurrence and the destruction of his disguise he had invented and the dire danger they all had been in, could not help but laugh.
"I take it hearing that from you, Prince that we're all right, but how are we going to get out from under all this junk." said Tim Crovaton and Penrod helped him and the others out with James aid, Tim brushing some dirt off his uniform coat. He was a pretty dresser.

"Yes indeed, we seem to be all right" replied Penrod slowly. "I can't say what damage the 'flying machine' has done outside but--"
"Heavens and earth, but what happened?" asked Walter Starling. "I saw you put that wig on you sister Jennie and then things went topsy turvy. Surely the wig didn't do that. The angels must have made an awful big protest then and--"
"No that wasn't the fault at all" said Penrod with a dark look on his face. "The trouble was as I guess I'll find out when I'll investigate with the help of others that we were bombed. The bomb must have been in here somewhere. Some where set on proper time to go off and we did not know of its presence. The Machine was not the cause for there was no need of it to do so as there was no compressed steam to cause that though, believe the bomb was directly underneath it. And didn't you smell the smoke. It smelled like dynamite powder I guess that is the whole explanation. I'll bet the possessors on angels saw us all."
"I'm inclined to agree with you brother dear" said Jennie dryly. "Don't let's press the spies too much yet. Eliminate the perils by degrees until the devils are off their guard and it will be safe. They mean business, and I'll bet the bomb was meant for you and not us."

"I guess so" agreed Penrod. "One of those spies who were chased last night might have planted that bomb and timed it to explode just when it did. Heard a sound in here like a clock ticking but thought it was one. It sounded right underneath the engine and I fancied it was one hidden there."

By this time a crowd of frantic and very anxious soldiers and boys and girls, scouts, and even general Hinderline, gladderline and other officers had congregated around the big shattered shed through the roof of which the big engine had been blown. Penrod opened the door to assure general Hinderline and the others that no one was hurt, and then the young prince saw the big engine half buried in the dirt about a hundred yards away from the building.

"Thank God some of us were standing directly over it when the explosion drove it up," said Penrod as he made an inspection of the broken engine. "The engine would have gone through the roof with it."

"The central vent went sailing," commented James Andrews. "Must have been a lot of power in that bomb underneath Penrod."
"Lucky the wall of the shed went outward and the ceiling didn't come down on us" said Alice.

"Was it a bomb?" asked general Hinderline. "I thought you were experimenting on that engine the way I saw it go up."

"It was" said Penrod grimly. "I'd like to lay my hands on the fellow who planted it. I'd blow him from the mount mouth of a cannon and mean it too."

And this was evidenced by the bent and twisted rods that had held the big engine to the standing block and by the big cylinders some of which were torn apart as though made of paper instead of heavy steel. But for the fact that all the force of the bomb explosion was directed upward instead of sideways as bombs usually do, none might have been left alive in the shop, though evidently too it might have been the engine notices too that saved their lives. All had escaped most fortunately and miraculously, and they realized this.

"Well queried James as Penrod gave orders to have the damaged engine moved and the building repaired. "Does this end your intention of disguise?" and going after the spies?"

"End it what do you mean?"
"I mean are you going to experiment on any disguises any more?"
"Why of course, just because some glandellian snake bombed us doesn't mean that I'm going to give up. And there's the wig I put on Jennie's head way up in the leaves of that big tree though how it got there is a mystery. By this experience isn't anything. I remember the day before I found out who my daughter was a was nearly blown up more than once by a bomb, and you little girls remember how we got stuck in the submarine under a lake and for a long time none of us knew how to work the machine or to raise it to the surface until we experimented."

"I should say I did and we too," exclaimed Violet with a shudder. "We don't want any more of that. But as being between being blown up through a roof and held at the bottom of the lake, I don't know that there's much choice."
"Well perhaps not especially when it's a bomb," agreed Penrod solemnly. "But as for ending my experiments, I wouldn't dream of such a thing, though the spies may explode a volcano underneath. Why I've only just begun, and I'll soon climb that tree and take care to cover that wig though it is about a hundred feet up on that tall pine tree. I'll have plenty of good disguises yet."

"And none explosive ones, hope," added James kind of jokingly. "Heavens Penrod but if my father and mother and sisters and little brothers knew what danger I'd been in they'd with draw me from the secret force."

"Well the next time I'll invite you to a disguise test I'll be more careful."

"...we ain't going to be any more next time as far as I'm concerned," laughed Daisy. "I think it is safer for me and my girls to go and sell and peddle newspapers and magazines."

And though they joked about it, they all realised the narrow escape they had had. As for James his wounds showed how the spy could have come in without being seen and plant the bomb. True to his determination Penrod did not give up his experimental work on the disguise disguise making. The big beautiful engine that had been blown through the roof by the bomb explosion was useless now, and it was sent to the scrap heap after as much of it as possible was salvaged.

Perrod had climbed the trees and secured the wig which had not been injured after the fall, and he afterwards worked along the same lines as at first, and it was no easy problem to do either of these, Perrod had to admit as he progressed even with his sisters helping him. All previous types of head disguises had to be discarded and a new one evolved.

"James dear, I need some one to help me" said Perrod that afternoon. "Could you not find a good man who is used to experimental work that you could find?"

"Why yes" was the answer, "I at least know a man who is a friend of mine who is busy on a new bomb of your own you got up for explosive signal purposes in the sky, but you could take him off that---"

"I don't interposed Penrod" I want that work to go on. Isn't there some one else you know about?"

"Well there is a new soldier or officer who came to General Hinde nine yesterday we recommended. The general took him on yesterday and he is said to be wonderful at making wigs. Knows a lot about facial disfigurements. I guess the general could let you have him---Bowie is his name. The only thing about it though is that the general would not like to give you a man of whom no one is dead certain, then you are working on this new device."

"Oh I guess that will be all right" said Penrod. "There won't be any secrets he can get, if you mean you think he might be up to spy work."

"That is what I did mean Perrod. you never can tell you know, and among the enemy you and you assist us have countless bitter enemies."

"Yes but I'll take care that this man doesn't see the plans, or any of my drawings. I only want some one to do the work of cleaning out the stuff I use for the disguise with soap and water. We can let him think it is only to be used again for newly made cushions."

"Oh then I guess it will be all right. I'll have the general sent Bowser and you."

That day Penrod rather liked the new assistant and so did his sisters, for he seemed quiet and efficient, and acted too as if he was a good Catholic like the rest of the Abbeysmans. He did not ask questions either about the work on which he was engaged, and yet what struck them was however he didn't pay any attention or make any comment about the beautiful children, Violet and her sisters who were so obviously about them, but did as he was told. He was the first man who never took note of their beauty or winning ways. As Penrod had said however who never took note of their beauty or winning ways. As Pen-rod had said however, he kept his plans and driving under lock and key----in a safe to be exact----and he did not think they were in any danger of losing his new help. A who even went devotedly to Mass the next morning as all did. But nevertheless Pen-rod held him into the night to talk over the powers of those who were opposed to him, though though being experienced he did know and was well acquainted of the dangers to which they would stoop to gain their ends. He and his sisters had been working hard on his new device and by the afternoon of the next day had reached a point further along than when the bomb explosion occurred. He began to see success ahead of him, and he and his sisters were jubilant, but this did not make him careless and the fact was he never left Bower alone to himself in the experimental shop at any time. But once he was compelled to do so when his sisters called him to dinner, and as he came back to the test room unexpectedly, he saw Bower apparently sound asleep some distance away from the safe. Nor was over Pen-rod was almost certain he heard the steel door clank shut as he approached the building, and then before he could try to cause his help, which he thought fell asleep on work duty, Pen-rod looked from a window and saw a stranger running away from the building when the explosion had recently happened.

"Who in the world is that?" he said. "That man? Did he come in here? Was he coming with my safe?" cried Penrod as he saw Bowser retreating, asleep, and then Penrod knew it was time to act. The window was open and with one bound Penrod was out and with drawn sabre running after the stranger who had seen departing in such a hurry. The man was but a short distance ahead of him and Penrod saw he was stuffing some papers into his pocket.

"Here you, come back. Stop or I'll shoot," cried red Penrod but the man ran on the faster.

"That's a Glaxo-Glandelinian spy sure as living," he laughed. "And he put Rowse to sleep with something some thing some drug most likely." He added:

he added, "I've got to cut ch that fellow." and he speeded his pace as he ran after the fellow shouting off his pistol in order to shoot the camp. There was no question in the mind of Penrod but that the man he was running after was guilty of being a Glandoll spy even though he was dressed in the uniform of a Christian soldier in the first place he was a stranger and had no right whatever inside the big fence that surrounded general Hindermine's headquarters. Then too, the very fact that he ran away was suspicious. And this coupled with the apparent going to sleep of POWs close to the safe, providing he wasn't forcibly put to sleep by one on the part of the spy made Penrod fear that some of his plans were they had been stolen. These he was very anxious to recover if this strange soldier had them and so he raced after him with a ill speed. Penrod would have fired but there was too much danger of hitting somebody else.

"Stop, stop" called Penrod, but the on-rushing stranger did not heed. Penrod then seeing an opportunity leveled his pistol and fired but the spy must have suspected this for he dodged behind a tree and Penrod's shot only hit the tree. Penrod fired several times more in hope of frightening the man from behind the tree but then he fled off in another direction, returning a shot but missing Penrod wide. The cries of the young Prince, and the sounds of the shots soon attracted the attention of the soldiers and quite a number came running from their various tents to give what service was needed and four soldiers mounted horses and sped after Penrod to help him. But they were all too far away to give effective chase and though they too opened fire the shots did not hit the fugitive. The runaway looking back to see how near the young Prince and the other pursuers were to him, suddenly changed his course and retreating this Penrod thought and noting this Penrod thought 'I've got the skunk now. He'll be badly bogged if he runs that way and gets into quick sand and if he goes deep enough it'll be impossible for any one to save him ---' For the way led to a piece of swampy land (not hard) that after the recent heavy rains was a veritable dangerous apparently bottomless quicksand bog which was dangerous for any thing caught in it and more than one man had been caught there and where it had taken sixty men three days to get him out though he was in it only to his hips when rescue work began. "He can't run across that dangerous swamp, that's sure" reflected Penrod.

"He can't run across that dangerous swamp, that's sure" reflected Penrod with some satisfaction. "I'll get him all right."

With some satisfaction, "I'll get him all right," But he wanted to catch the man beside a mud hole before he reached the dangerous bog, and to this end Penrod increased his speed to such good end that though a boy he could run better and longer than any man he ever met yet. That presently on the firm ground that bordered the quicksands and bog on swamp Penrod was almost within reaching distance of the stranger, which the prince could see was no experienced spy. But the latter kept up running and dodging, and turned so Penrod could not lay hands on him, suddenly turning around a clump of trees the fleeing man headed straight for a big vegetable quicksand bog that a little further off from a mud hole lay directly in his path. It was a part of the swamp—the most liquid part of the bog, and a home of frogs and lizards. So late it seemed the man who was evidently unaware of the proximity of the swamp, saw his danger. Though he stepped into the mud hole it seemed to take time to turn back on top of himself. In time from avoiding the other bog not far beyond from which there is no escape, and though he was a few penrod did not want to have to go to a five or six hours work of trying to get the man rescued, so he did the next best thing to prevent him from rushing headlong into the brown quicksand. He went partly into the mud hole himself and sticking out his foot tripped the man so that he fell in with a big splash, the muddy wet water flying all around some even over the young Prince. At that moment on horse back violet and her sisters came out having seen that. For a moment the man disappeared completely beneath the surface, for the mud hole was rather deep, just where Penrod had thrown him. Then there was another violent agitation of the surface and a very woebegone and muddy face was raised from the slough, followed by the rest of the figure of the man. Slowly he got to his feet, mud and water dripping from him. He cleared his face by rubbing his hands over it, not that it made it clean but it removed masses of mud from his eyes, nose and mouth so that he could see and speak, though his face began to grow pale as he gasped for breath.

first operation was to gasp for breath. "What, -- what are you doing like in uniform to me?" he demanded of Penrod, looking askew at Violet and her sisters on horse back who had surrounded the mud hole but looking out for the boy... and as the man opened his mouth they were aware of a glitter which disclosed the fact that the man had two rows of front teeth of gold.

"WHAT AM I DOING?" repeated Penrod. "I think it is up to you to answer that question not me. What are you doing? Are you a spy?"

"Yes, -----you-----you tripped me into this mud hole," declared the man.

"Y ou,----you----you t ripp ed me into this man--"

"I did yes, because you were trespassing on my property, and ran away with instead of halting when I told you, and had I not done you too you would have run into the bog," went on Penrod. "Who are you, and what are you doing? What did you do to Bowse in my shop?"

"Nothing I wasn't doing nothing."

"Well we'll inquire into that. I want to see what you have in your pocket a Mr. spybeef - spy before I believe you. Come on out."

"You have a no right boy to go to my pocket a." blustered the stranger a. "Oh have I not? Well I'm going to take the right, and if I find papers of mine in your pocket it is just too bad for you. Sister a dear, you are all on horse back. One of you rope him with your lasso---that's right and see that he does get away. We'll take him back and search him."

Being roped now and his arms pinioned by his side, for Violet and her sisters were just as good with a lasso and rope as any experienced cow boy was the there was no question of the man getting away after that.

"Bring him along sister a dear" said Penrod and they moved on, Violet having a good grip on the end of the rope and the man was forced to walk to the speed of the horses walking him along toward general Hindershaugh's to the mud and water splashing, and oozing from his shoes at every step.

"Ngy you kids look here." The gold toothed man cried as he was forced along. "You ain't got any right to arrest me even if you be kid soldiers. I ain't done nothing." And each time he spoke the bright rows of teeth in his mouth glittered in the sun.

"I don't know whether he has really done anything to you or not Penrod," giggled Daisy. "But he sure got a good mud bath. What a splash. Tee hee. I nearly died laughing."

"Well never-theless I'm going to take him back and see what he has done to Bowse. He may know something about this."

"If Bowse does I don't believe he'll tell," said Jennie.

"Why not?" asked Penrod quickly.

"Because he's gone."

"Gone? Where? He was asleep on something by the safe. Bowse gone?"

"Yes" answered Hettie in a turn at a look from Jennie. "I saw him running out of our experiment shop as we mounted our horses to race for you to help. I didn't think at the time that he was doing more than going for said perhaps. But I see the game now. He pretended he was asleep."

"Oh you mean him?" and Penrod pointed to the dripping figure.

"Yes" said Daisy in a low voice as Violet went on ahead with the prisoners with a pistol ready in case he would try to break. "If as you say this man may have been in league with Bowse, the latter has smelled a rat and skipped. He has run away, and I only hope he has not done any damage or got hold of any of your plans."

"We'll soon know about that" said Penrod. "I wonder who is at the bottom of this."

"Maybe any one of those Glandelinian generals, especially Myletze" suggested An Angelina.

"You mean either Myletze, Clancy or Jiggs or some other?"

"Yes."

"Oh I don't believe any one of those generals would stoop to any such measure as this" replied Penrod. "But we can't be too careful. We'll investigate."

The first result of the investigation was to disclose the fact that Bowse or Bowse was gone. He had taken his few possessions, and left that neighborhood of the Christian lines, while Penrod was racing after the stranger. A hasty examination of the safe by Violet herself did not reveal anything missing, as Penrod's papers and plans were all intact. But Violet knew they showed evidence of having been looked over, for she had put them away for him herself, recently and they were out of the safe. The folder in which she had placed them, and not neatly either as she always does.

"I begin to see it myself" she said misgivingly. "Bowse must have managed to open the safe while you came to us to dinner and no doubt he must have made a hasty copy of some of the drawings of the disguises you were making, and passed them out of the window to this gold toothed man, who tried to make off with them. Did you find anything on him sister a dear?" as Jennie who had searched came into the office just then.

"Not a thing Violet dear not a thing," was the answer. "The soldier commanded to have him searched even took off every bit of his clothes and wrapped him in a blanket after giving him a shower bath to clean the mud off from him. He is in the tart getting dry now but under guard. But there isn't a thing in any of his pockets."

"But I saw him stuffing some papers in as he ran so swiftly away from me," said Penrod.

"We must be sure about this then," said Jennie. "And as to the soldier's 'Don't let the fellow get away. I want to question him. I'll read his mind as he answers me and that way I may detect something."

"Oh he's safe enough," answered the man. "Our big strong fellow George is guarding him. He won't get away."

"Then I in person shall have a look at his clothes," decided Jennie. "He may have a secret pocket."

The man's clothes were brought to her and she and her sisters went through them closely and carefully but nothing like this was disclosed and the most careful search did not reveal anything incriminating in the man's garments.

"He might have thrown away the papers Bowse gave him," said Penrod. "Maybe they are at the bottom of the mud hole. If they are there even if not covered they're safe enough. But have a search made of the ground where this man ran. They were yellow papers."

This was very carefully done, but without result. A number of the soldiers even took the planks to scoop all the mud out of the mud hole without finding anything. Then Penrod and the generals himself had a talk with the stranger who refused to give his name. The man was sullen and angry. He talked loudly about his innocence and of "having the law on" Penrod for having tripped him into the mud.

"All right if you want to make a complaint go to my father," said the boy. "He's the only law can that can make me a penalty. So if you do I'll make one against you for trespassing and for trying to spy. Why did you come on my grounds sir?"

"I was looking for something I lost."

"How did you get in? That guard admitted you at the gate?"

"I--- I just walked in" said the man but Penrod and his sisters knew this could not be true as no stranger was admitted without a pass, and none had been issued. The man denied knowing anything about Bowse's pass but the latter's flight and disappearance answered evidence enough that something was wrong.

"Take him to the residence camp," ordered Penrod to one of the corporals of the guard, and when the latter reported that had been done he added in an earnest tone:

"He said if he ever escapes he'd get even with you Prince."

"All right," said Penrod easily. "I'll be on the watch."

The young prince and also his sisters made a thorough examination of his little experiment shop, but nothing was gone nor no damage had been done, and they began to think Penrod had been too quick for the conspirators, if such they were. His plans and drawings were intact, and though Bowse might have given a copy to the stranger with the rows of gold teeth, the latter did not take any away with him. That he had some important papers he wished to conceal and escape with him seemed certain, but the splash in the mud hole had ended this. No trace was found of Bowse and an effort Penrod made to ascertain if the man was a spy in the employ of Stanley or the others came to naught. The man had come well recommended, and the other army where he was last employed had nothing but good to say of him.

"Well it's a mystery," decided Penrod.

"Well thank God His Dear Blessed Mother you got out of it pretty all Penrod" said Angelina.

"Yes and if that gold toothed man had had the papers on him he would not have got off so easily," added Jennie.

Taking a lesson from what had happened, Penrod indeed was very much more careful in the following experiments on his new set of disguises for his sisters. He that day made some changes in his shop, and took Tim in to help on the new disguises thus insure perfect secrecy as the disguises developed. Penrod also changed the safe in which he kept his plans and papers for the one he had used previous to the incident in which Bowse and the stranger who took the mud bath figured was one, the combination of which could be easily discovered and worked by an expert. The new safe was much more complicated, and the force Penrod felt that his plans, specifications and so forth which he had worked out were in less danger.

"I can just about figure out what happened," said Tim Groveton to Penrod, when told of the circumstances. "The Glandelinian generals are provoked because by guarding your sisters so well recently you would not give the Glandelinians the benefit of capturing them one again and so they sent a spy to pretend to get work with you. They perhaps hoped to secure some of your ideas for their own or perhaps probably discover what disguises you are making so they can know and be able to detect the spy, or they may have had a deeper motive."

"What deeper motive could they have Tim?"

"They might have hoped to disable you or some of your plans, so you couldn't succeed with them. All Glandelinian generals are very unscrupulous or what you call it so I hear, and will do anything to succeed and win this

"I shall find out and most surely you shall be on your guard against them."

"I will indeed, not for my sake but for my sister's sake," Penrod promised. "But I don't believe there is any danger now. Anyhow we all have to take some chances in a war you know."

"Yes, but for you sister's sake be careful as you can. Jack Evans can't be with them all the time. How I am the plans now coming on?"
 "Pretty good. I've had a lot of failures and the thing isn't so easy as I at first imagined it would be and now with my sister's back at me for Vivian's headquarters except Daisy who stayed here for a time and is also going as father sent for her, and I remaining here things is not so good and I'm lonesome and going too as soon as I can get these things the way. Voices of people is a funny thing and I'm just beginning to understand some of the laws on voices I learned at school in America. But I think I am on the right track with the facial disguises, and the cutting down of their unusual beauty by these means, means." "But surely you don't want to destroy the beauty of your sister's?" said Tim.
 "Penrod laughed.

"You are not paying any attention to what I'm saying Tim," he said. "Their beauty is only hidden by these disguises only as long as they keep them on. I'm working working both ends you see--making disguises that will make them look look homely enough and also providing means to take care that the disguises don't come off so quickly as to cause detection. It isn't possible to make a change in their voices so they'll have to pose as mutes. The only thing that can be done is to change the aspect of their faces."

"What about the clothing disguises?"
 "Oh they are not giving me any trouble. The situation on that cannot make any difference but I am also working on improvements to those. Take it altogether I'll have them so transformed that even the devil won't know them is my plans come out all right."

"Have you said anything to your father yet?"
 "No I want to have the disguises perfectly perfected before I do. Besides I don't want any publicity about them until I am ready. If these spies are after me now instead of after them, I will fool them."

"That's right Penrod. Well, I must go as I hear little Daisy calling me."

"I suppose you will be glad when all this trouble with spies is all over?"
 "Well I should. But I'm not like you. I can't invent things against me."

"But Tim you have an awful smooth line of talk," he had Penrod. "I believe you could sell chili con carne to some of the fishes in the Great Salt Lake in America where I came from--that is if it has fishes."

"I don't know that it has Penrod, I never saw the lake, and anyhow I'm not posing as a salt salesman, and Tim grinned. "at I must really go or she'll wonder what's keeping me. He's terribly lonesome for her sister too and it's up to me to see that she doesn't break down before she goes back to them to meet her with you."

"Go to it Tim. And I'll get busy on my plans. I'll partly perfect them by to night and finish them in the morning."

Getting busy was Penrod's favorite occupation and when he was working on a new idea, as was the case now he was seldom idle night or day.

"I have hardly seen you for nearly four days," little Nell wrote him that day. "We got the letter that day. You sister's except Daisy who came back said you were doing wonderfully. Are you not ever coming to see me any more, and learn me to be a girl scout who was so good to you in Abilene?"

"Yes Penrod wrote back. "I'll be over to meet you now with little Daisy flower of mine, and she sure looks like a daisy angel to night."

From this it may be gathered that Penrod was on the verge of success. While not altogether satisfied with his progress was the young prince felt that he was on the right track. The more he was certain that must be added, and when to be made in the disguises certain refinements that must be added, and when this should be done, Penrod felt pretty certain that he would have what would prove to be a real good disguise. It was not absolutely perfect ones. On the late afternoon of this day Penrod was not engaged with some of the last details of the experiment. The disguises for faces and head were about ready and he was making some intricate calculations in connection to a head disguise for voice. Penrod had set down on paper some computations regarding the voice of one of the wires for her and was working out the amount of it was to which he could subject a man to fit when a shadow was cast across the drawing board he had propped up in his lap. In an instant Penrod pulled a blank sheet over his head of face and disappeared and looked up a slender fellow coming over him. "That another spy was at hand. But a heavy voice surrounded him.

"Please go to bed," said James. "You shall yourself up here like a commit in the mountains. Why don't you come out and enjoy life....."

"Hello glad to see you," cried Penrod joyfully. "You are just in time."

"Time for what supper?" asked the boy, with a chuckle. "If so I will gladly accept."

"By yes I imagine there must be a supper in prospect somewhere James," said Penrod with a smile. "We'll have to see General Hinde--nines house keeps about that. But what I meant was that you are just in time to have a home back side with me if you want to go."

"To where?"
 "Oh any where through camp. I have nearly finished the disguises, and when we get back to father's house, now I'm going to have them tried out. Would you like to come along on a home back side?"

"I would," exclaimed James. "But why do you go at night? Isn't it safe by day light?"
 "Oh that does not make much difference as long as we are remaining within the division lines. The reason I'm going to take the home back side to night is that I don't want any spies about."

"Oh I see. Are they camping on your trail?"
 "Not exactly. But I cannot tell where they may be. If I should start out in daylight, and some thing would happen to our horses, I don't know what a crowd always collects to see a wounded horse."

"That's right Penrod."
 "That decided me to start off after dark. Then if we have to come down by a side road we shan't have any prying eyes."

"I see. Well Penrod I'll go with you. Fortunately I didn't tell you--little sister Daisy, who was going when I started out this afternoon, so she won't worry until I'm over, and then it won't be so bad. I'll have pool with the deer I'm handy any time you are."

"Good. Stay to supper and I'll show you what I have made. Then we'll take a ride after dark."

This suited the boy and a little later after the had eaten one of the house keeps he went to his room including a collection of which he was very fond. James accompanied Penrod to show the way they kept the horses.

"What's a horse boy? This horse is it Penrod?" asked the boy as he viewed the horse.

"Yes that's the horse."
 "It doesn't look different from one of your regular horses," Penrod. "No it isn't. The main difference is here in the stalls." And Penrod showed him the stalls where the stalls were fixed. Then he took his friend to show the disguises were and showed him these. James they seemed to consist of a man's collection of at leastly four or five.

"If you could see how they look in them," said Penrod to his friend. "But the main trick of cutting down the beauty by these disguises is done by these things and he put one on himself."

"It's sure great," said the boy. "Well I'll go and, when you are Penrod."
 "Well go as soon as its dark and the reply. "But first I'll have to have my horse changed for and show you the facial disguises for my sister's."

Penrod did and James could hardly believe his eyes. "They are not at all completed yet," said Penrod. "I'll finish them in the morning."

"You are a right Penrod," cried James. "You sure did make good disguises." This was perfectly true.

With in the few lines they'll never be discovered unless they speak" said Penrod. "I'll soon give you a chance to verify my statement."

Soon after supper when the shades of evening were falling he and James were mounted on their horses to go forth. Would Penrod's hopes be justified would he be disappointed?

"All ready James?" asked Penrod as he looked to see that all was in good condition about the saddles and the horses.

"All ready and we shall be," Penrod. "Was the answer. "Why don't you take your little sister--Daisy a long time she isn't going out with you?"

"She's not here," said Penrod. "She's with my sister's. She went this afternoon being called. I'll go to see her."

"Well I don't know why I am," said James but some how I feel that something is going to happen on this trip."

"No sense," laughed Penrod. "Don't be nervous that in all."

"I suppose so. Penrod I'll be going to back out, something like that, but I'll show the trip was successful over with Penrod, just certainly do."

"I'll still be in a little while," he said and Penrod he settled himself comfortably in his saddle and pulled the sully at his front. "You've gone home back riding like this before, and when we rode other horses besides our own too."

"Yes I know I have. Oh I don't say it will be all right. Pen-rod, and yet some how I can't help feeling."

But Prince Pen-rod felt that the best way to get James's companions to rest was to start the horses for a hard ride and so the horses were urged forward, many soldiers and boy scouts and girls too, converging at first about the two on horse back to see the beginning of the night. Though frankly it was Pen-rod's intention to do a little secret night scouting. General Hinderline who missed the little girls was the one also and General Glade-Little had been invited to come and join the ride but she wished to go to bed early that night she said. Walter Starving was away on some military business and he could not be present to join. However as Pen-rod expected to do better when he and his sisters were disguised he the horse was not exactly sorry for the absence of his friends, though he felt terribly lonesome for his sisters and only one night away to be mild you, but could you blame him? I'll bet they were lonesome for him too.

"Give me path" called the young Prince to the crowd in front and off they started. The two horses moved swiftly along the level road though of course making a considerable amount of dust, and away from the lighted camp fires. Faster and faster they went, and as the horses' hooves were covered with something soft they galloped almost as silently as a great owl (not howl) which swoops down out of the darkness—a bit of the velvety blackness itself. Onward and onward they sped and as Pen-rod listened to catch the noise of the horses' hooves his heart gave a bound of hope, for he could not detect even slight sounds, and besides the horses also were black.

"And my disguises are a success." Exulted Pen-rod to himself. "Thank God for it was His Help. The disguises are a success, but they are not perfect yet to use," he added. "I know however how to turn the trick."

He urged the horse then from the encampment out over the open country and then when they were going a little more faster he called back to James who was riding a little behind him. "How do you like it?"

"Great!" exclaimed the boy scout. "God bless us all but it's great. Why there's hardly a sound from the horses' feet, Pen-rod, and, can hear you quite plainly."

"And I can hear you and other sounds," added Pen-rod. "I don't believe if there are any Gland Indian soldiers out scouting any where and he rodded in the direction of the foot lines, though James could see nothing back of the corners of the darkness. They know we are here any where out here."

"I agree with you" was the answer. "But Pen-rod my friend with the disguises I believe you have solved the trick. You have produced excellent disguises, and now it's up to you and your sisters to make use of them."

"I'm not quite ready for that yet," replied the young prince. "I have several improvements to make. But when they are finished I'll let you and my father know what they are. Then it's up to him and us."

"And you must be careful Pen-rod that none of these skulking spies of the enemy don't hear of your success and get onto how they'll look with them on, or get the disguises away from you," warned James, as Pen-rod guided his horse through an unlighted and limitless path in the silent darkness.

"On they'll have to get up pretty early in the morning to do that," boasted Pen-rod but fully and yet afterwards truthfully. "I don't want to call those roads with a bit of ghug-in, and a good bit of it too. On and on they rode, and as Pen-rod increased the speed of his horse, and continually thought of his disguises he began to have high hopes that he had made them better than he knew. Of course the horses in galloping didn't make any sound.

"I can go this one better though," said Pen-rod as he was now sliding down his horse. "There is a few mistakes I've made. I'll correct that and—"

As he spoke he thought he heard a sort of suspicious sound.

"Good night Pen-rod, what's the matter?" called James as he leaned in his horse alongside that of Pen-rod.

"Some things went, some there," Pen-rod answered. "I had to slow down my horse. We can make a halt in this big field," for just then the moon came out from behind a big cloud, and Pen-rod saw before him a grassy meadow.

"But what happened? anything wrong with your horse?"

"I might have imagined it," said Pen-rod but he thought he heard a cry for help. "I'll soon find out."

So Pen-rod rode over to the meadow and as he brought his horse to a stop the horse was so close to the riders a wild cry came from a little girl but he partly muffled so the voice could not at that time be detected.

"Help please on help."

SCOUTING STANCES, A LIGHT AND A DARK A VAIN SAD SEARCH FOR THE TRUTH OF THE MATTER

SUPPLIES.

"Did you hear that?" asked Pen-rod of his companion.

"Yes, it. If my ears didn't deceive me I should say, did hear it. Some little girl is in trouble. Pen-rod. Maybe some reckless child running round at night and now caught in a bog of quicksand, most likely, the same as that boy chap escaped, who was at your head quarters. That's it caught in quicksand/ If so we could not reach the poor kid in time."

"There's sure isn't any bog or swamp around here," James. If there was I shouldn't have taken the chances to come round here so you who would not into one in the dark. No it's something else beside that. Ha-k."

Again the cry sounded, seeming to come from a point not far from where they halted. The noise was clear and distinct but a confusion of other noises prevented them from recognizing any well known tone of the voice.

"Help, help they are—"

The voice seemed to die away in a single, as though the person's mouth had been covered quickly.

"The child's sinking, Pen-rod. She's sinking," cried James. "I once heard a little girl who almost drowned cry out, and it sounded exactly like that."

"But there isn't any water around here for any child to drown upon to drown in," declared Pen-rod quickly. "In his horse for a word. 'It's a big dry meadow. I know where we are.'"

"Then what is it?"

"I do not know, but we are going to find out. Some child attacked by some one else—something I should say. Ventured the young prince as he urged his horse faster with his spurred heels."

"Something do you mean a child out, Pen-rod."

"No for the sake of such things here any more than there is water or quicksand. Though of course it may be that some famous bull, or his savage dog has got loose and has attacked some traveler or the child. But in that case I think we could hear bellows or barks, and all we heard was a little cry for help. Though what she could be doing out here at this time of night with the enemy so near is strange."

"There's sure with me Pen-rod, it's hard to say but we are for a word faster and investigate."

"That's what I intend doing. Come on faster."

"Better use our flash light—hurry up, it's a good and dark even though the moon does show now and then..." urged James.

"Guess you are right, and as they need faster toward the spot where the call for help, and as they brought forth their flashlights. As their horses galloped swiftly along making no noise on the soft turf they listened intently for the repeat of the call for aid.

"I don't hear anything," said Pen-rod after a bit.

"Nor, added James. 'We don't know exactly which way to go Pen-rod.'"

"That's right. Guess we had better give her a hail, whoever she is poor little girl."

Pen-rod halted his horse, and raising his loud voice to a shout called as loudly as he could.

"Hello there little girl—here's the matter. We'll help you if you can tell us which way to come."

They both listened intently, but no voice answered them. At the same time however they heard a sort of sound as of heavy iron feet, and the horse seemed to be muffled in cautious not far away. Pen-rod and James looked in the direction of the sound, and the young prince flashed his light. But there was a thick clump of bushes and trees at that point and the lighted rays did not penetrate very far.

"Some one over the top of the bushes," exclaimed Pen-rod in a whisper. "But better wait a bit for a word and see what it is."

"All right," agreed James, and he too spoke in a low voice. By they did this when their previous talk had been in a loud tone, and then Pen-rod had shouted so loudly, they did not stop to explain about it. But just then, late they both admitted that they might be because they thought something was on foot—because they feared a sacrifice by Glade-Little and being committed and they wanted to support the sickly proposition if they could, and it

The sound died out so quickly that they did not know which direction it came from either.

They urged that he be towed to the dark clump of trees and lost to view. This was no need to be especially cautious in regard to being silent, as the horse made no noise whatever, and as Penrod had in advance seen and then flushed him, light, June 14 in riding up on up alongside suddenly caught him by the coat tail.

"I do," he answered, wiping his brow for the weather was very hot. "There's a road from here, just the other side of those trees, to that hill. That wagon must have gone that way. Well, there's no use in trying to follow it now, though, as it has gotten away."

"[A]t home I'll be glad to see you," he said. "I'll be glad to see you."

And he was right. They walked in and about the little grove, flashing the light at intervals but beyond marks of wagon wheels in the dust of the road, no tracks were visible. The moonlight indicated that

"Well some one must have been hurt or they wouldn't cry for help," said Penrod.

"How do you know?" asked Penrod.

"Well as long as we can't do anything here, Penrod, we'll go and travel around and then do you any."

[illegible]

"Yes but if we had asked over what we might have had, I think we never the night she sadly thought oh how he had hated that little girl's voice somehow - before she had said anything - but he could not get on with it

 - with her - he had to get on with it.

Pen and James had a hard time trying to get on because that was a long time that he had thought his friends could find him. He had a lot of trouble about the country and even in an emergency James could find the way. This he said, did and as they went on, still, Pen and James understood that it was that that had to be helped. He said that he was not as good as all the other boys.

and as he related his experience on the way toward the Central Intelligence Headquarters, he after paying to the authorities who he was he was thinking how he could help save the prisoners.

"Oh so that has nothing to do with the operations of the Algerians, but I'm going to do better yet. One day I'll take you for a ride with them in the discipline and they'll pretend they're so stupid you'll hear a pin drop."

"Not completely on the discipline but I'll soon be able to fix that up. Some of the elements are a bit thin on a needed discipline."

He said that he had been home, but he had not seen his wife. He said that he had been asked to have a little lunch, which he had gone to have. He said that he had been asked to have a little lunch, which he had gone to have. He said that he had been asked to have a little lunch, which he had gone to have.

"I forgot to produce a letter which she told had come from a police person that afternoon but which had been mislaid by a woman toy about who had been engaged to help with the house work that day.

"She took it to your shop after you had left and only now told me about it."

you" he said on a hush, and the mislive "That's it." They've gained the summit to a full three hundred thousand row gale, and they say they feel as if they should not let it go, do not accept because the enemy is on the move and danger to us is a real thing is a bit queer, though, and on the way you'll find

The million
"The million" came into being on account of the transportation movement caused by the war, and why this letter was delayed!"

having no navy millions not a drop of blood in the sea

"Well I'm sure I hope by God's help it will be all right." sighed Mrs. Jerry.

"But surely no harm could come to her," said James himself. "she is angel possessed, you know."

"That don't always make it any more comfortable," said Mrs. Jerry. "some times you can be angel possessed, and something can happen enough to cause worry you know. Angels unless it is necessary won't save my miraculous means you know, and I wish you could convince you poor sisters to that effect. Since she doesn't come yet they are as nervous as frightened kittens. Come in and tell us what to do."

"Oh poor little Daisy will be all right," declared James adding his assurance to Pen-od's.

They found Violet and her sisters nervous and a having shown signs that they had wept, and poor Jennie herself was weeping, on an attack of hysteria. Poor Vivian had sent an order to have the whole camp searched for it, and the city too.

"Daisy had telephoned me," he said, "that she would come right to us to night instead of waiting till tomorrow. I'm sure I don't know what can be keeping her."

"But Father dear it's too soon to get her yet," replied the young Prince disconsolately. "I'll wait a little while, and then if she doesn't come, I and my three boys a scout and a hundred others will go back over the road outside the city and look carefully. You know she may have had a slight fall—sprained her ankle or something like that—and not be able to ride. As she came by the turnpike a road I know for sure she wouldn't take under any conditions as it is out side of the camp and in danger of being pulled by enemy horse scouts. I'm sure she's all right, and you may be sure of that."

Pen-od tried to speak reassurance sagely but some how he did not believe himself and felt as worried as his sisters and father did but his sisters reading his face knew of it and that he didn't want to let on. He was beginning to think more and more how strange it was that his little sister had a little sister Daisy didn't return home.

"We'll all wait just a bit longer before setting on our search," he told his father and sisters. "but I'm sure she will be along at any moment now. Let's all kneel and say the Rosary for her. The Rosary helps a good deal for any one you know."

They left the house and went into the nearest Church (need not say Catholic as they're all Catholic in Abilene) and he states the Rosary came back and found her not home yet. They then went into the library of their home and there they sat waiting still saying the Rosary. They kept and out watching the clock and looking from that to the telephone which they tried to hope would ring momentarily and transmit to them good news. Then they would listen for the sound of foot steps or bicycle wheels on the gravel walk. But they heard nothing and as the seconds were ticked off on the clock the nervousness of his sisters increased until Jennie herself exclaimed bursting into tears which cut the boys to the quick.

"I can't stand it any longer," she sobbed. "We must notify the military—do something."

Father and even I did that already," said Pen-od. "I'll have to be content about my seemingly holding out, and bluffing at it for, must confess I'm getting rather down good and anxious myself, and as you little girls are looking at me so queerly that shows I can't hide anything from you. Confound the luck any way. My three companions with a good horse of scouts will start out of the city by machines. I'll use Father's, he must come with me and if it should happen as will probably turn out the case of Daisy be the case that little Daisy has met with only a simple accident she would not be in danger. Maybe she can't get back on her bicycle and cannot walk and is stranded out on some lonely road where no body passes to give her aid."

"I'm sure you are right," agreed Mrs. Jerry. "Pen-od knows best best dear. I'm sure, and as he says he remembers she's an angel possessed as any of you are and it seems foolish to worry as no harm could come to her."

"All right," just as you say only find poor little Daisy. "and Violet sighed, and turned her head away to hide her tears which were coming fast. When if poor Daisy had had a fall, or reasoned Pen-od she could call again, and again for help, and get some one to telephone unless and as he reasoned thus, Pen-od gave a mental start which his sisters didn't fail to notice as his own used word of "help." That we had little girl cry for help on the lonely meadow came back to him with startling distinctness and heart rending shock that he couldn't stand and made him so fearfully nervous and uneasy, that even not only his sisters but his father even noticed it.

"Come on Father please, and you three boys," cried Pen-od in a voice he tried to make cheerful. "We'll find that Daisy is probably walking along carrying her disabled bicycle instead of having it carry her for she can carry the one she rides. We'll soon have her back safe to us," he called to his sisters. "Come too if you want."

"I would like," began Violet. "but oh, we're too scared to upset that some thing happened to her. You look at yourself Pen-od. You can't fool me. You are so nervous only you set your big constitution holds you up."

"I wish I could go with you and help search," observed Mrs. Jerry. "and you could take Hal along."

"He can go but you must stay," said Joice to Mrs. Jerry. "We can't be too far left alone."

"All right Mother," said Pen-od. "Come along. No. Don't stop to put your hat on. It's too warm outside any way. We'll telephone as soon as we find her," called Pen-od as he and the ones to go got into the little runabout with his father and started away from the place, Nellie sitting besides Pen-od.

"What do you think of it Pen-od?" asked Tim, when they were once more on the road.

"Why I can't tell nothing yet—no yet," Pen-od said. "That is, I think nothing more than a simple accident has happened, if indeed it is anything more than she has delayed to talk to some friends, but I can't help confessing that my sister's are right. I'm dreadfully upset myself. He's as mad to me as to them and neither can't bear to have anything happen to her."

"Would she ever delay this long?"

"No indeed. That is what upset some and makes me good and scared."

"Yes," and then Pen-od my friend," said James himself. "oh how strange that of that only we heard didn't it sound so of familiarity to you. Could that have been your little sister Daisy?"

"There it was out of my suspicion that Pen-od had tried to keep his mind away from came to the fore. Well he might as well face the issue as later."

"I've been thinking of that," he said in a short of shaky voice. "It might have been little Daisy calling for help. The voice sounded exactly like hers. I tried to place it when I heard it first but couldn't."

"But we looked pen-od, near the house and couldn't discover anything. If she had suddenly been calling for help,"

James did not finish.

"He may have fallen from her wheel and been hurt," said Tim as Pen-od was leaving the city after an hour and half of riding turned the electric runabout into the high way that Daisy would most likely have taken on her way home. "Then she may have called for help and some soldier's, passing on patrol, soldier's of our side may have heard and taken her away."

"Yes but where Tim?" asked Peetie. "Pen-od. If she did call for help maybe she was taken away that's sure for, and James saw some one taken away on a horse drawn buggy. But where?"

"To some hospital I suppose," said James.

"Then had we not better inquire there? There are only two hospitals of any account around here. The ones in camp would have notified father immediately if she had been brought to any of those there. The one in Podgie still in the hands of the chivalrous could be called upon the one in White field. We could call up the one in Wheat field too and White field and—"

"We'll look around and along the road first," said Pen-od. "If we begin to make inquiries at the private hospital first there will be a lot of questions asked, and a general alarm be sent out. My sister wouldn't like that if she isn't in any danger and it may turn out after all that she has met an old time friend, and has been talking with him ever all this while forgetting all about the pleasure of time."

They were now driving along the high way that led from the camp to the outskirts of Podgie just beyond which was a part of General Vivian's camp on camps and positions. This section was country like and still in the possession of the chivalrous with very few houses and those placed at rather infrequent intervals. The road was a good one, though not the main traveled one, and no one hardly ever used this or the main road too far out because of the fear of meeting with enemy cavalry scout patrols. As Pen-od and his father and the boys, friends drove along, they scanned as best as they could in the light from the moon and the powerful lamps on the run away or runabout every part of the high way on both sides. They were looking for some different colored blot which might indicate there a little girl had fallen from her wheel and was lying in some huddled heap on the road, and hoping of seeing the bicycle too. But they saw nothing like this much to their relief.

"Do you know Pen-od," said James, when they were nearing the town of Podgie and their search thus far had been in vain. "I think we are going at this

"Why not?" asked Tim himself himself.

"Because Poo-little Daisy may have fallen, and been hurt and have been carried into any one of a dozen houses along the road. In that case we wouldn't see her. We have passed over the most lonely part of the journey and haven't seen a trace of the poor little girl. If the accident occurred near the houses her child's cries for help would have brought some one out to do something for her. If this is a part of Christian territory then being a princess she is well known around here, and even if she were unconscious and couldn't tell who she was, she could be identified by papers in her pocket or by the clothes she has on as no other girl wears what she does. Then you father and sisters would be notified by telephone."

"Perhaps you are right James. We may be wasting time this way. What do you suggest, Tim?" asked Pen-rod.

"That we don't delay any longer but call up the hospitals at once. If she is not in either of those she must be in some house and such condition that her identity cannot be established. In that case it is an event for the military police, the gendarmes, and the boy and girl scouts. We haven't found her and, think we had better give the alarm."

Pen-rod thought it over for a moment while his father also said it was the best advice. Then he came to a sudden decision.

"You are right," he told them both. "We must not waste any more time. He isn't lying anywhere along the road she ought to have traveled in coming from General Hildern's house to mine—that's sure, but before I call up the hospitals I want to try out one more idea."

"What is that Pen-rod?"

"I want to go to the place where we heard that cry for help."

"Do you think that really could have been Daisy?" asked Empress-Vivian, herself.

"It may have been. We will go and take another look around the place. I'm afraid she was evidently hurt there or something, and was taken away, for now I remember it was her voice. We may get a clue. The lights on the sunabout will give us a better chance to look around than we had by the little pocket lamp. We will try the place and if we don't find anything then I'll call up the very hospitals."

With the speedy sunabout it did not take them long to reach the place where the two had gone over the meadow on horse back a few hours before and where they had heard the little girl's cry for help. All was as dark and as silent as when they had been there before. But as Pen-rod had said the lights from his electric sunabout would give a brilliant illumination and there he now directed toward the clump of trees whence the little girl's cry for help had seemed to come.

It certainly does not appear to have been visited by any one since we came here, for remarked Pen-rod as he observed the marks of the new wagon iron hoops in the dust. "Now we'll look about more carefully."

"This they did but they were about to give up in despair and start for the nearest hospital's telephone to call up the hospitals, when Tim gave an exclamation."

"What is it as Pen-rod as he and his father looked up."

"Something bright and shining," said his boy companion. "I saw it gleam in the light of the lamp. You nearly put your foot on it Pen-rod, just step back a moment."

Pen-rod did so and the boy scout leader, with another exclamation this time of satisfaction reached down and picked up something from the dusty road.

"It's a wrist watch and a pair of rosary beads," he exclaimed. "A gold wrist watch and gold chain rosary, and both have been stepped on evidently or run over by the wagon. The watch is not much damaged but the rosary is and the crucifix is crushed. The case of the watch is a bit bent and scratched. It's stopped too," he added as he held it to his ear.

"What does it show?" asked Pen-rod anxiously.

"Eight forty seven," answered James who also looked at it as Tim consulted the little dial. "Why Pen-rod that was just about when we heard the cry for help."

"Yes, it must have been. Let me see that watch."

"No sooner had the young prince taken the time piece into his hands than he too uttered a cry of amazement and alarm."

"Do you recognize it?" asked James in great excitement.

"It's Daisy's watch," cried Pen-rod.

"And what's this lying under the sunabout," asked Empress-Vivian and he drew forth some object. "Why it's Daisy's hat."

It was.

"He must have fallen here and been hurt," said Tim.

"It was little Daisy who cried for help," answered Pen-rod and who was probably

"And who was probably taken away to his house to be taken care of by some passing farmer. It looked like a farmer's rig. They've probably taken her to some hospital. There's been an accident all right and—"

"What's this?" interrupted Tim holding it up.

Pen-rod looked at it.

"Why it's a piece of bicycle chain," said Pen-rod. "That's proves it now. He hit something in the dark and was thrown from the wheel. He's met with some mishap."

Pen-rod, his father and the three other boys were of one mind now in thinking that Daisy had met with some mishap on the road—maybe in the dark too they thought it was possible the farmer may have fallen head-down as she halted some where, and that Daisy first called for help, and was carried away by the farmer.

"If they had only answered when I hallooed at them," said Pen-rod. "We wouldn't be in all this stew now. We could have told the strangers who came to her aid who she was, and we could have taken her home to be cared for there."

"Well it's too late to think of that now," returned Empress-Vivian despondently. "We had better get into communication with her as soon as we can and then send word to my daughters and their houses keeping hope she isn't badly hurt though I don't see how it could be possible if she is really possessed. They sure would have preserved her."

Pen-rod and all the rest hoped so too, with all their heart. There was nothing to do but to get back in the sunabout and make all speed for the nearest telephone and Pen-rod lost no time in doing this. They found in podgie town a drug store which was open a little later than usual because nearby a skirmish with the enemy had called, and wounded had been treated and were still being treated, and at once Pen-rod went into the booth and called up the Podgie Podgie hospital. He was well known there as he and his father were liberal supporters of the institution which was a public affair and run by the Sisters of Charity, St. John's Hospital. Many wounded soldiers at this hour even were being treated at the dispensary, and as wounding of soldiers in frequent skirmishes were of more or less common occurrence

Pen-rod had for a recent occasion to call up the place.

"Poo-little Daisy would ask to be taken here I suppose, as it's nearest the Christian army under my father—that is if she was able to speak."

Pen-rod said to his father who agreed with him. There was little delay in getting the hospital on the line, but then Pen-rod had it, and was talking to the good mother Superior Sister Constance. He was rather surprised, to tell the truth that not only had no little girl been brought in, but that only wounded soldiers were admitted in this hospital unless by Empress-Vivian or Prince Pen-rod's special orders.

"And" said the sister. "I haven't had any accident cases for the last two weeks now. To night either Prince Lem or my about your sister Daisy but are you sure she is in some hospital?"

"That I cannot tell Sister," he said. "That is what I am trying to find out."

After saying good bye he hung up the receiver and opening the door of the booth which was only big enough to admit one person said to his father and the rest:

"Little Daisy! Daisy hell isn't there."

"Then try White field," was the suggestion, and Pen-rod did so did so, though he could not imagine why an injured little girl, such as his sister Daisy might prove to be should be taken as far as White field, when the hospital at Podgie was much nearer.

"Unless," he told them. "The people who ran my sister down didn't know about our hospital."

The reply from his first institution was at first encouraging and then turned out discouraging.

"Yes Prince," said the Head Nurse who answered. "The sister in charge of the Children's accident ward says that there was an accident case at this moment being brought in. He's a little girl too. I'll go and inquire."

"He's at that hospital" all right," said Pen-rod opening the door and speaking. "The nurse is going to inquire."

"Poo-little Daisy," said James to Tim. "Oh I hope by God's help she isn't hurt much."

"I too," said James.

Pen-rod was all excited and then the nurse he turned to the phone. "No Prince," she said. "It is not your sister. It's a little girl though who had fallen down stairs at her home and fractured her skull. She won't live. She's only two years old. There is no record of any one answering the description of your sister Daisy having been brought in this evening."

"I'm sorry."

"Hm! This is getting to be mighty loud" mused Pen-od, as he came out of the booth, "but shall we do, get back and tell my sisters, to communicate with the Gemini, and the military police."

"Why not try the Mexican Brothers' Hospital of Podgie?" asked Pen-od Vivian. "That's away over in Pando's to be sure, but it's so unlikely to be known to passing persons than either of our institutions around here, especially if the travelers were strangers and not soldiers."

"That's so" agreed Pen-od. The Mexican Brothers' Hospital was operated under the direction of the Brothers of that faith, and was well known in that part of the state. Often cases of persons who had been injured either by accident or battle had been taken there for treatment, even girls and boys, even if not kept there as patients. Vivian had said, and Pando had agreed.

"I can just about see how it happened," said Empat. Empat and Vivian himself, "somebody in the dark accidentally ran my little girl down, and stopped to pick her up after they heard her plaintive cries for help, and though the Mexican Brothers' Hospital was the first one they thought of, I don't think they took her there as the hospital only received men."

But the Military Hospital is the one we should have thought of first.

Call that up."

But once more disappointment awaited them. All day came back over the wire from the other superiors in charge that no accident case of any kind whatever not even those of little girls and boys had been brought in. Only a number of wounded soldiers.

"Tell I'm stumped and desperate" exclaimed Pen-od. "He to vanish within general Hindernes very camps and the Christian lines are supposed to be safe and now to agree private matters as I see over there a thunderstorm is coming up. I shouldn't wonder if it is not because of privacy."

"I'm afraid so" said the pig. "A storm always breaks when something especially caused by the enemy goes wrong with my daughter. But I don't see why one would come up on this occasion, but what shall we do now?"

"Such as I dislike it myself" said Tim who was as much worried as Pen-od and his father, "think we ought to communicate with you sisters. They'll be very anxious and they may have position, but heavens it can't be helped."

"I guess we'll have to" said Pen-od as it began to thunder in the distance. "But wait. I'll call up general Hindernes place first, and see if she has gone back there."

"But little Daisy had not done this, and general Hindernes who answered the telephone said Jennie Vivian had been calling frantically for Pen-od as some of her sisters were now on the verge of wild grief and even collapse.

"No help for it" said Pen-od ruefully over the phone. "We've got to tell them we have no news and can't find her. Ain't there no trace of her in your camp?"

"No" said the general. "She's no where in the camp."

Pen-od and the others then retraced their steps home, the storm coming near, and near and assuming proportions in the distance as if it was going to be a wild and terrible one for the lightning even though distances yet was getting terribly bright and the booming thunder loud. A stiff north-west wind was rising and it was cooler. There upon they hurried back to James and

And news home and soon as they came Violet herself ran to the door.

"Here you got Daisy Pen-od dear?" she pleaded piteously.

The sound of her voice touched him deeply and he felt worse than ever as he had to tell her the truth. Joyce the eldest one did collapse at the news and a doctor was called in. Pen-od called for both Angelina Aronburg and Angelina Pichee to come and stay with his sisters and take charge of the house until they, the others gone to some other part of the city could be notified and come.

"You'll need you mothers too now to stay with you little girls," he told them. "I'll notify Priests and have them say Masses for the safe return."

"Yes" we shall Violet admitted, trying bravely not to give in to her emotion. "Oh Pen-od for at least to night, wish you could stay too, and not go back to Hindernes. I leave the disguises go for some time. I'm sure something dreadful and awful must have happened to poor Daisy. Please stay and help us find her."

He laughed sarcastically. "Do you think I'm going to give up?" he challenged. "As soon as you or our mother comes, I'll take charge of everything."

And I'll conduct a desperate tenacious hunt for her. I'll send word to general Hindernes that I'm remaining here and will conduct the hunt to no end, and ask him to have all his cavalry squadrons and other soldiers as many as he can spare and can spare all the toy and gladiators search for her."

Pen-od did not get any sleep at all that night. He communicated with all the military police and the Gemini and saw to it that a general alarm was sent out. He called up all hospitals within a radius of fifty miles, and all within the Christian encampments too, but could get no trace of any injured girl whose description resembled that of Daisy.

"What can have happened?" asked Jennie tearfully, as the thunderstorm came up with a big bang of thunder that shook the house.

"Well the way I figure it out is this," said Pen-od. "You must remember our little Daisy left general Hindernes headquarters very soon after 1 and James went out for a back riding. If it is so as you say that she was riding her bicycle bicycled she must have been run into by a wagon or something in the dark. That is how her wrist watch was damaged and that was her hat we found, and also that must have happened when I and James heard the cries for help and tried desperately to trace it and found no one."

"Oh do you think poor Daisy was badly hurt?" asked Catharine.

"No I don't," and Pen-od answered truthfully. "The voice sounded as though she was in pain, certainly but it was strong and vigorous and not at all as though she was dangerously hurt."

"And what do you think happened to her after she was hurt?" asked Hettie.

"Those who picked her up took her away," decided Pen-od. "In fact we heard the wagon go but of course we were never able to connect the call for help and what followed with our little sister. Somebody in a wagon took her away for as was the wagon and it was too late to pursue."

"Where?" asked Angelina.

"I should say to some hospital. Perhaps a private one of which we know nothing and which may be somewhere. I'll get a full list from the board of Health to morrow and have father call them up while I conduct a vigorous search. It may be that the rescuers seeing the damage they had done to so pretty a little girl took our little Daisy to the home of one of themselves, and named a doctor there."

"Why would they do that?" asked Violet.

"Well they may have been so frightened by injuring such a little girl like her they did not realize what they were doing, or they may have thought she would get better treatment in a private house, if she were not badly injured, than if she should be taken to a hospital. It may have been that one of the persons in the wagon was a physician and wished to try his own skill on the little girl he had accidentally hurt."

"You make us feel more comfortable in spite of this loud storm Pen-od" said Jennie as a louder crash of thunder than usual shook the house and it was raining in torrents outside. "But even supposing all this why couldn't they telephone to us that little Daisy was all right? Any one of us always carries a telephone identification card with us and if she were unconscious it could be ascertained who she was."

"That's what I can't understand" said Pen-od frankly as a shocking crash of thunder long and deafening suddenly startled them. "It puzzles me and now this storm seems to make me suspicious. It always storms when you and my other sisters have unjust trouble. This storm puzzles me. Listen to that rain and the wind. Good gosh wasn't that a crash this instant. That's such some where. But we'll find her. We've feared I'm determined at any cost to have her home by this time to morrow night."

He tried to keep on with his telephone inquiries but could do nothing because of the storm and soon some one reported that the basement of James headquarters was flooded with two feet of water and all the company streets was becoming a veritable lake. A physician ministered to poor Joyce and even her other sisters to keep their spirits up. The night was very very long, and after two hours of horrible unusual record breaking fury in which the thunder followed one big crash after another now without stopping it gradually let up but nevertheless raged on for the rest of the night.

All night long no word of any kind came in.

Slowly the dawn broke though the mist of rainy darkness, but there didn't come much light. Search for the missing had let up. It still rained in a sort of heavy drizzle and the pale electric lights of the city streets came at intervals still through clouds in the shutters in the home of Mr. James and in the glare of which, Pen-od, little Hettie, Violet and her half-sister sisters, and even their mother James and Jim sat waiting for some word of the missing girl.

"I shall be so good" asked Hettie herself as she looked at Pen-od for his sister's sake. "I'll go up to say anything and had been saying on this position all night."

"Oh there's lots to do," he said trying to make his voice sound cheerful. "I should myself feel more upset than I am, but in my young days then I got free from those who kidnapped me or rather I was rescued by kind American Indians and all thanks they do. I know I'll put my Indian tricks in to locate her. I'm sure I'll not fail. We'll be busy all

"When we found out that period the person who accidentally ran her dot'd down a few through her keeping her children until Oh, we have said I can't find her line that has become of her and I feel it is on the same side said, for come to think of it, didn't like the sound of the last cry for help. It seemed muffled & checked off."

"Well it certainly is a puzzle," said Angelina A. - - - and Pen - - - agreed with her. It was nearly an hour and a half before they finally were out of the city and heading through the camp.

"Do you really know how to work on that trail too?" he finally asked of Angelina Ichea.

"Yes I can work on my trail," he said, "but we are just in time. He's a common soldier whom we call Silent Sam. He can help us." I telephoned him to meet us when we got into camp. There's a foreigner too but he was an Indian Tracker in his day over in the United States."

"Silent gam" exclaimed Penrod. "Have you been taking a new trip to the land of Yonder? Since you brought back some new kind of servant?"

"Most exactly a servant," said Angeline Biesse. "Though I hope he'll serve us well." And then after the introduction to the man they proceeded onward for some distance for another half hour, and soon were at the very meadow where Penrod and James had heard the cry for help. Penrod led the party to the clump of trees, near where he and James had heard the cry and found the watchman hut. Penrod dismounted from his horse and went into the road pushing his way past the bushes to see whether the rain had washed away the wheel marks or not.

To his utter astonishment they were still there only a few minutes in the long narrow hole and the road on the side of a bank the way the bicycle half concealed in a clump of scrub. Perrod pushed aside the overhanging bushes thinking to find Daley lying beyond. There was nothing else, though the bike was some what injured. He called James, Walter and Jim and showed them the white wheel. In steps it was not unlike those we use in America, the wheel rims themselves gleaming white, the spokes of the colored red yellow and green except that the foot propellers were a of the metallic always used. The chain was missing that pulls the rear wheel. The saddle seat was broken off and even with his knowledge of bicycles James could tell that it had been an exceedingly beautiful and expensive one. But it was certain device detached to the bike that attracted his attention, so they were totally different from any on any American bike. (though they bore some resemblance to apparatus always seen on American bikes.

"Yes," said Pen rod, "a beautiful one and damaged beyond repair. That proves she was in an accident all right so it was hit by something on the road. The bike's name is " Silent Sam."

"That proves she was in an accident all right" said James ruefully. "and must have been in a bad one."

"Well I find out presently for the rain did not raise the wagon wheel marks but made them only more distinct conspicuous. We'll have to leave the bike here if it's no good to any one now dumped even beyond the palis only good for the junk heap. We could salvage some part of it though and I'll find you all come with me. Now I'll just mount my horse again and then I will-----"

Penrod suddenly ceased speaking and held up a hand to enjoin silence. Then while the others watched the young prince began moving noiselessly toward a thick clump of ~~bushes~~ bushes with his pistol drawn.

"Halt who's the real hero that you Duboy den?" suddenly called Penrod and in such a sharp urgent voice that even James started, -silly as he and the rest were for something unusual. There was no answer, and Penrod suddenly threw aside the bushes.

"He's there!" asked Perrod this time happily.
 "Perrod dan..." cried Angelina Amoniaev "but are you seeing things?"
 "No! Go to sleep but I'm hearing them," answered Perrod "didn't you think you heard some one moving near these bushes?"

"Well, it doesn't do me," went on Pen - edgely. "At first I thought how it was Dady there - injured and gettin' up on his feet, but now I think we were s'py galed on by some ferocious monkey, though how any one could do so and get away without me seeing him is more than I can figure out. But I'm going to have a look."

"Well, help you" offered Tim and the whole swarm began on horseback a new search of the neighborhood, but they saw no one nor did any one try to escape past them.

"and yet I had never heard some one say so," declared Penned when a search had revealed nothing. "It sounded as if some one were scuffling softly about in velvet slippers, trying to hide."

"How do you think it would have been proved?" asked Hall.

"she alone but happy trying to see that we are out here for a" was the answer, "but I guess I was too quick for them. They couldn't learn much as to our intentions by our just wanting the bike, and our nothing else had been lost had a fun run, can see."

"Who would want to gain knowledge of our purpose in an unlawful way except it was a blackmailing?" asked Mary Stanek.

"Perhaps some of the crowd that belongs to General Manley. They have been disappointed in perfecting things against our own armies at Pardo's, and think we have some idea they can listen in on and believe to their generals it would be the easiest way out of the coming disaster to their armies."

"Do a my of the spies know you are working on such things as those secret displays Penrod?" asked Jimmie and me.
"I do not imagine they do though no doubt they are trying to find out. One tried but, fooled the spy so the enemy have not any real data to go by I believe at that."

"I hope not?"

"Why did you ask?"

"Oh because I -- ~~am~~ -- I don't like to say just now but something seems suspicious."

They all made a complete search of the neighborhood, but found no one. Now was there any trace of Daisy anywhere around no. of the intrusion? "Well everything seems to be all right so we'll start on the wagon wheel tracks," remarked Penrod, after further research of the reports. "And by the way what's this in the mud, eh? It's Daisy's pink hair ribbon. Well I'll keep that as a clue. Now James and Tim if all goes as I hope you will see what my Indian trailing will do. All of you forward now and don't go too fast."

Then as Pen had mounted, they started forward not on the road for the horses feet would be spoiled the trail but on each side of it.

"He rode where the trail turned," said Penrod after they had gone some considerable distance, "and as I thought goes to the top of that small hill where we saw it against the moon last night, and Heaven, what's that lying here so in the mud." He halted the horse and without getting out of the saddle, reached down and had it in his hand.

"It's Duiny's shoe" said Tim.
"Go it is," said Pen-od. "Guess it looks like we'll be picking up something else late- on, anyhow what do you think? Was it an accident? It looks funny to me!"
"I think it was," said Argelida A Eebbitz. Aronburg, "She was hit by an old auto auto what are not allowed!!!!;---"

"But there are no traces of an auto till then," said James. "So she wasn't hit by no Auto. There's a put post not far from where we saw the bike and she might have ran into that in the dark full speed."

"but she never rides a bike to the limit" said Penrod, as they urged the horse a little faster. There's the bike badly wrecked and part are missing. Then after we go a distance we find her shoes and ribbon. You can tell easier that what they say is perfectly well, and I guess that what is strange we could find to what makes in the mud below; to her do you?"

"I'm not sure but those wagon wheel marks," replied Argentine police. "And we don't come to an end of them either though now we are near the hill. This is the deepest mystery of all the hardest test for us even think unless she really was injured and taken to a farm house she met with foul play." "But isn't there something at range though that the pouring rain didn't remove the wheel marks?" said Tim.

"It certainly is," said James. "I've seen chains far less new and not half so long in the nation's horse wheel marks in dust in many a year. I think this is wonderful. There are the marks as far as we go and we can't hardly see a break in them. I think every thing will be a success and we'll find him."

"Are you going to see and the farmer who owns it for taking care of his property. The boy went on."

"Yes now that I am sure we can find Daisy and that every thing will come out all right. But it doesn't look like the wheels of a wagon as it looked last night. It looks like a farmer's wheeling rig. Will you and I go all that distance with me?"

"We certainly will. We only wish we could find her though. We could see to it with a little ~~bit~~ better than that."

"Yes," said Arlene. "I can't imagine what has become of him. It is almost as if the earth had been opened and swallowed him. He disappeared once in a great emergency."

"It sure is a long hard day's work. Penrod." All those looking for her can't seem to get any trace of her out as we can if we hear another lady's story to help. We can make up your mind I'll give a rate more quickly than I did at first."

"But if she is angel possessed child, how can she be injured, and go down into a bog, as James once suggested, just by the angel would possess her?"

"That seems a bit odd, too," said Penrod, "an angel possessed as she is, she is missing, and you know she wouldn't do this to play a joke on us certainly, I want to test my loyalty to her, I'm sure, when she knows it would grieve her sister."

Something is wrong too, for what happened to the bike she wouldn't damage that beautiful expensive thing to put up the joke of her supposed to be disappearance, and why would she cry for help if something was not wrong. Possession angel will let some things happen you know too for a trial."

"I agree with you," said Jim.

"It was now nine o'clock in the morning of having searched at six. Penrod had decided to go on as long as day light lasted at least, and then if the hunt was not successful would camp out on some open spot for the night. Penrod had rather wished his sister was with him for their presence she would have given him more confidence, but the poor little girls were too much pre-occupied in their own grief and worry over Daisy's disappearance and in trying to do their own bit in trying to have a reason found of her disappearance. James father and all the generals and many soldiers were helping elsewhere all they could, but there were no results. Even the Gemini of the other sections were engaged but they found no more of a clue than the regular military police. At last they were on the top of the hill Penrod had spoken of, and there they deployed in line formation alongside the road slowly moving over the grass. On and on they went following the wagon wheel marks.

They soon left behind them the top of the hill and they were aware that no houses were in sight, and yet the trail continued on without hardly a break. Now the sun was trying to come out but it appeared in the north west as if the sun would soon come on the other side. The whole party for a time had continued on as silently as a bird upon a branch.

"These wagon tracks seem to go as far as the moon to me," said Penrod at last as he urged the horses on faster. "I'm sure who ever took the trail must have lived a long distance away. It's a long journey. A long way, say."

"Yes so it is," agreed the rest. "You do well to speak of it, Penrod."

For modest as the young prince was he felt in justice to himself that he must acknowledge the fact that the trail was a long one. For as they continued on it seemed as if they would never get to the house where it may end at. Of course they had not really gone so terribly far, it seemed but going slowly and being keeping an eye on the trail made it seem longer. But made Penrod find fault with that the hunt was not as good in turning out as he had expected it to be.

"At well have to keep on going," he told James, and-----

It was just at this moment that Mettley Harry Stark who had added some distance ahead when they came to a turn in the road hiding the best view of what was before came back to tell Penrod the news. Some two men in strange garb in the road who wished to see Penrod and Penrod alone.

"Who are they?" asked Penrod.

"William y Gale and his companion," was the answer.

"I'll go ahead and see them then," declared Penrod quickly. "Are they wanted over anything too?"

"They seem to be very much in a hurry," said Harry.

Penrod rode ahead and he could see by the arrival of the two men that they were of the Gemini headmen of all right.

"Oh Prince," began the president of the Pandoa Univer de Univer de Gemini de Univer de Gemini Company when he met the young prince. "I wish to assure you that we had heard that had happened was entirely without our knowledge, and though you state Daisy may have met with an accident last night on her bike, we do not at all believe that it might be-----"

"What are you talking about?" asked Penrod in a surprised tone. "Have I been so impolite as to play a trick on you?" asked I don't understand what you are driving at."

"Oh, I thought I did," Gale said and he shook his head. "I understand that you spoke to Daisy last night." said I don't understand what you are driving at."

"Do you mean that you have heard something about the accident last night?" asked the young prince and only all his horrified suspicion aroused as to a fear of a dire result after all.

"Fatal accident you suspect last night?" repeated M-Gale. "I don't expect to see an accident at all, but perhaps I am making a mistake. Oh two come across the bike last night but I felt it the next afternoon, it for a clue was to be picked up. I-----"

"Some one is making a mistake," said Penrod almost faintly. "We found the bike to this morning."

For a quarter of a minute Penrod and the president of the Universal Gemini Society of the City of Pandoa sat on the back of the wagon at an another M-Gale face as he said a word of explanation, and so did Penrod. And after that last remark of the young Prince, the man who had advanced to speak to him said:

"Well perhaps we are talking at cross purposes. I don't blame you for feeling the way you do, and yet I'm not ashamed to say to you that I have given your sister a head to the advice of that of Daisy's and Schloeder's this confounded incident would not have occurred. You will rise I expect would be all right to day."

"It isn't my fault, I can't do anything contrary to their own design. I'm their brother, it is the truth, they love me more than anything next to God and our father but when it comes to military business they're the boss" said Penrod dryly.

"I realize that," said M-Gale. "But now we have some peculiar men working for us, and they are on the job hunting; too, and sometimes they're so much to do so many possibilities of which to take advantage that we may get a little off our balance. But what I called to you to speak of you to you of something. We are troubled greatly. We of the Gemini had two at large men acting as the Gemini, and now Harry Stark was a sufferer from two desperate. Two men desperate. Well then what I came up to say was that if you are a thinking of trying to find your little sister Daisy and, hope by God's help that you'll find her, I want to ask you if you are going to tell all a man by the name of Blainfanger, wish to say that he is one of my despots and he had absolutely no authority to-----"

"Excuse me," broke in Penrod. "But by Blainfanger do you mean the man who also posed as Bowser the spy?"

"No I do not. Though I regret to say that Bowser once appeared to be one of my members and has deserted. I have men and other men who titles looking for both. I believe posing as members of the Gemini they're Glendellman spies. He too had no authority to come into general Blainfanger's army looking as he said for a position. He mysterious as it was still in our service when he did that. He robbed me of a map, and important papers and set my house on fire."

"Is that so," said Penrod. "I realize now that he was a spy, who tried to come into my head quarters to find out some of the secrets of my disguises. Did you ever whole house burn?"

"Yes," exclaimed M-Gale and my family and I narrowly escaped with our lives and my little girl is in a hospital with burns. But I hope by God's help too that Bowser really did you no harm."

"No he didn't get the chance," said Penrod grimly. "He did that other spy--the one with the gold teeth. I wonder how he liked our midhole?"

"He was large," said M-Gale bitterly. "It's about him I came to warn of something."

"With all the work you and you members have on hand you might have saved yourself the trouble," said Penrod. "I don't want to discuss him."

"But I wish to make sure," said M-Gale. "That what he has done will not come upon your sister Daisy. We fear him most terribly. His methods we cannot count on. He is too dangerous--too dangerous-----"

"Oh don't worry," interrupted Penrod. "He hasn't done anything to me or Daisy--he didn't get the chance. You need not fear him on his account. He did me no harm, and-----"

"But I understand from what I heard of him that-----"

"Now I don't want to seem impolite," broke in Penrod. "No do I want to seem presumptuous to take part in after some of the acts of your despots."

But now with Daisy missing, we have very busy hunting for her and our time is fully occupied. I'm afraid that Daisy was carried off by her after all and that's for me. I'll have to say-----"

"But won't you give me a chance to-----" began the president.

"Now the less we discuss this matter the better," interrupted Penrod.

"I agree," as you call the man with the rows of gold teeth didn't really do anything to me so many great harm to my possessions as far as I can learn, and since he has nothing to do with Daisy, his case is a closed book--closed book with my eyes, and if he has heard, find him with the will to do him harm and at the stake which is the penalty for kidnapping children from within the Christian line."

"Oh well if you look at it that way, the way is nothing further to say," said M-Gale. "So fully," I understood she was gone and I don't believe she was hurt. I suspect those two despots. But since this happened hasn't M-Gale seen you?" he asked Penrod quickly.

"No I haven't seen him."

"Oh then that accounts for it," was the quick answer. "Well if you would the matter I should suppose we should also. We are not to blame that those

...and the date... did she go in a long, in a long, and we ...padding anything to say to any how... look out for them. They're... found that out. They're a danger and I'll I'll not put it past that they have Daisy in a prison."

This at once Penrod, after a while, as being rather a queer mark, but he did not think so at the time...

However, Penrod seemed very much to like the new device of scheme to trace and locate Daisy and he readily wanted the President of the Gemini to help him in some other way, and he promised to do all in his power to help him, not until Mr. Gale had taken his leave and Penrod and his friends proceeded forward on the search that Penrod did some very hard thinking. He knew everything was possible and every thing desperately possible was being done to find the missing princess but she had disappeared and as completely as though she had fallen on her bicycle into a stretch of unknown unknown quick sand bogs in the meadow in which you sink down in half a minute or so and never come up. If she had which he almost had a vague fear of then she must have met an awful death. To find out how it felt to be forced to not be able to have two minutes Penrod had once tried to do so and couldn't even comfort himself to half a minute that he had had to give in.
But to make sure of it he had even before going forth on the trail during the hunt for the minute he suspects made an examination of every spot where he believed he had heard the cry, and not a trace of waste puddles of a bog did he come across. The ground was absolutely solid some places even like rock and stone. Even as he had been informed an effort had been made to trace the path through the Girl Scouts Association which had a large membership. That in the members and superiors were asked to make inquiries to ascertain if possible whether any one had heard of any unreported accidents. One in which little Daisy might have been carried away by persons who had accidentally been down.

But this too had come to naught, and the military police and other authorities on the authorities were at a loss how to farther to proceed. There two theories about it in different places. One was maybe the possession angels had spirited her away from him and his sister to a certain length of time and for some good reason of their own maybe to give her a taste of heavenly happiness for a short while. It was the other theory in other quarters that what ever happened that she was safe, but that the possession angels put her out on some mission which was so secret that she must accomplish it with out even telling any one even her sister, or was rescued by some body from an enemy patrol and who was detaining her not knowing how to bring her back without encounter with other patrol. This belief was a slight relief to Violet and her sister and their mother and father in many ways for it prevented them from giving way to the fear that Daisy was dead despite the fact that it was known in the family, is not in true part a of this would world that angel possess as child we do not die, though unless the angel will it not, they can be killed. That she was alive was Penrod's firm opinion and he was doing all he could to prove it.

They soon reached a small village and found that on the road through it the wagon marks still continued on without stopping. As every body in the town had been in bed at the time no one even knew of a cart passing through until they saw the wagon wheel marks in the morning.

"I wonder if Gale could have meant that?" Penrod uttered. "I wonder if he could have meant that I must find out from Dargard what's wrong. Guess I didn't think of that before."

He halted his column of a scheme and sent into a telephone booth the was a telephone booth. Then he put in a long distanced call to Angelina Athalia, asking to speak to Dargard. When eventually he was connected with the office of the Gemini's main National Branch he was told that Dargard and Dr. Scholander was coming to Pandora having started as soon as the news flashed across the country that Daisy was missing, and that he was coming to investigate the possibilities.

"This is tough luck," mused Penrod, his suspicions doubtly increased now. "I can't let this rest here. I've got to get after it. As soon as I make this final effort I'll get after Gale and know to hunt down something else. I wonder if it was that he was clearing all the while. I begin to believe it was. He then called to the operator again, and asked for the Headquarters of the Universal Union and Gemini Branch of Pandora. Though when connected he was told that Gale and Dr. Scholander were not having conducted a search themselves outside of Pandora. Penrod gave orders to who were the best to have all attempts made to find out side of Pandora what could not give satisfactory explanations. He suggested and if any one was found holding Daisy to hold them and find out why. If they were spies Heaven help them."
Then Penrod's attendant he allowed his followers to get that little they felt like before proceeding. The townsfolk which had heard of the sad affair were all in a great deal of sympathy and had all played for the safe return and every Mass held in the village church had been held for her.

The Military Constable offered him services, and Penrod was glad to have him and his men along as he had decided to press the hunt.

"No," he said before they went ahead again. "Every one must go to his post for the recovery of Daisy, before we continue to give up before a night. And when we succeed in finding her and she is in kind hands I'll reward them for it even despite the anxiety they caused, for it was not intentional. But what ever it is we must devote all our time to finding her, and believe you will do it seems as if all of you felt felt to feel the same as I do to the deadly sense of raced to eat and had to be coaxed hard to do so. We'll cast off all other duties however deeply they affect us for she or any of her sisters are just as important. If even not far more than the cause of the country is, and Heaven knows my sister's how much sacrificed such more than even themselves or it seems to help win the war. But this will end my inventive work on the disguise until Daisy is found. If she is alive, and if she is dead, and all and all I mean it, Hanley, a whole army will pay for it dearly."

Preparations again were made and again they went forward being forced however to see the road but the column sent right off to the town and retrograde of the wheel marks. They made a good start from the town and the houses were so quiet in that sampling that no one could have heard them.

"I think we got every thing just as we want it," said Penrod much pleased, "I also called up my home and told my parents and sister not to worry how long it would take us to get back as we were still following the trail."

"I believe you," answered Tim. "It couldn't be better but allow it!"
At that moment there came a loud explosion, which for a few moments threw them all in confusion.

"What happened?" cried Tim as he leaned forward in his saddle as a great white cloud of smoke enveloped them all so that they couldn't see a thing for a few minutes.

"Don't know, exactly," was the answer. Penrod quickly consoled the panic that was about to start. "Sound sounded as though there was a tremendous explosion some where out none of us were injured."

"Do you think we can dare proceed safely?"
"Oh yes I guess so but every body have you rifles in readiness if we need to get into trouble. Good thing it didn't hit us."

"You are right," said Angelina Athalia. "A bomb burst. A bomb burst.
Now they want forward more cautiously and yet quickly but thanks to our blessed Lord nothing further that they desired happened. They went forward just now leaving the town and Penrod knowing how to command leadership had every body under control and as a perfect control as was possible under the circumstances."

"We'll get the road right if something else doesn't happen," he said to Tim who rode alongside him with a grimace. "We were bombed I'll bet by some unseen foe who no doubt threw a hand grenade."

"Well let's hope that it won't happen again," said Tim. "It may have been from an unseen clandestine gunner all so as we are in good shape yet and taking on a chance."

If it would have been so then they were as a matter of fact, for the explosion readily had come from some unseen clandestine spy who had a cannon posted a little beyond the town, but as good fortune would have it, that was the only shell he had. As yet however Penrod was unaware of the exact nature of the explosion or its cause but every body kept a look out for a supposed gunner and had he been seen he would have been out of luck. They would have given him a hail of bullets that he couldn't live through. The explosion had caused panic in the town and brought a confused mass of people out of their houses to see what had happened. All Penrod however believed he knew was that the shell had been a hand made explosion, and that now leaving the town they had to be on their guard. No one could see the gun or a gunner who he now lay hidden as he was behind a good thick bush, but from that direction burst a slight column of smoke, and seeing that the scouts deployed into a column each had a rifle as separate from each other as possible, little shells shooting she was away by taking the lead, and they at once assumed the position but when they put the shells, they at first saw no one. On this fact Penrod believed that the only source of shooting happened as he had occurred on the corner than the machine was bombed and had killed the man the roof of the machine junk shop.

"But luckily this man," he said, "did not die. Any how it may have been some one other in the town who threw a hand grenade."

And this seemed to be the only evidence.

The half defined path through the wood lot in the direction of the cry led then in a series of turns and twists and it seemed as if it extended through a dense patch of wood growth thickly where with the storm coming closer now and the thundering sound of the wind through the trees it was so dark that it seemed as if night had fallen. There came a great roar of thunder and it began to rain.

"No matter what the storm does we got to go on," said Penrod desperately. "It seems any way when my sisters are in trouble to come. I'm wondering why I'm going to follow that cry goosh goosh how it cut me to the heart, and get to the end of this road—even if it is only a wood pile. For ten minutes more the two kept on following by the best not paying any attention to the marks now but following the direction of the cry, which seemed to have come again but further off. Then suddenly as it started to rain in blinding torrents they came within ten feet suddenly within sight of him something which made them feel as if they had reached their goal and even too far when as the first cries might have come. In a clearing among the trees there was a large cabin an immense shack of logs—and from the appearance it was deserted. There was not a sign of life around it.

The came a most terrific sky splitting crash of thunder but they paid no attention. The peevish cry they had heard was still ringing in their ears. They wondered what was in that dark shack. "I'm going to approach it from the door front," said Penrod loud enough to be heard above the roar of the wild storm. "The rest of you surround it and keep yourselves at the ready. If I give any loud signal burst in."

For a moment after the others obeyed, at the sight of the deserted cabin staring at Penrod, James and Tim as it were through the rain mark from its hiding place amid the trees, the young prince and his two companions did not move. They just stood looking at the place despite the down pour of rain and fierce wind that made the trees roar so loud.

"Well," said Penrod at length. "We found it didn't wet."

For a moment at the sight of the long red cabin half seen in the darkness to a point of rain falling at Penrod and his companions as it was face the killer place and the trees, the young Prince and his friends did not move. They just stood looking at the place. "Well," said Penrod at length at length. "We found the cabin at last didn't we, that's the way it was. The rain is not."

"We found something any how," said James. "I bet it was a man or a woman, but we have got to see."

"We'll see," said Penrod, impulsively. "I'm going to see that's the way the way at any cost."

"There doesn't appear to be much of anything," said Tim as he looked toward the cabin with lonely eyes.

"I should say that place has not been used even on a chicken coop in a long time," said Penrod. "I bet it was a man or a woman, but we have got to see."

"Wait just a minute," cried his companion Tim catching him by the coat. "Don't be in such a hurry."

"Why not?" asked Penrod. "There isn't any danger, is there?"

"It is hard to tell. There is no telling who may be in that cabin in spite of its deserted appearance. And though there is no sign of any kind up it may be that we wouldn't be welcome. If there are any in that shack, which is possible and they see us, they might take a notion to shoot at us first and ask questions as to our intentions after we are down when it would be too late to explain."

"I wouldn't," exclaimed Penrod. "There are no any signs there, and if there were with the place, they wouldn't dare shoot. I'm going to see what the story is, and if there is one."

But the young prince of life, and taking this as an indication that their advance would not be disputed, he and the two others followed Penrod. The latter advanced until they could take in all the details of the shack. It was made of logs and once had been chinked with mud or clay. Some of this had fallen out, leaving spaces between the wooden planks.

"It wasn't a bad cabin at one time," decided Penrod. "Maybe it was a place where some one camped out during the summer in times of peace, but it has not been used of late. I never knew there was such a place around here, and I thought I knew this locality pretty well."

"I never heard of it either," said Tim. "Let's give a shout and see if Daley or any other around here get here to cry out again. 'Hello there!' he called in sufficiently vigorous tones to have been heard as a ordinary sleeper and heard above the roar of the thunder. But the answer was no answer and as it grew darker and the rain heavier, the place took on a most lonely aspect.

"Let's go up and break in," suggested Penrod. "We can't lose any more time if we are to go on our way till dark."

"Go ahead," said Tim and together they went to the cabin door.

"Locked," exclaimed Penrod as he saw a padlock attached to the cabin. It appeared to be fastened through two big staples driven one into the door and the other into the jamb at right angles to one another and overlapping.

To their surprise however they were able to easily pull out the staples and the door swung open. This proved the place had evidently been forced before and the lock had not been opened by a key. The staple had been pulled out and placed loosely in the hole. At that moment nothing could be made out in the dark interior of the shack, but as their eyes became used to the gloom, Penrod and his two companions were able to see that the shack consisted of two big rooms. In the first one was a big coal and cooking stove, a big table, and a chair. It seemed that needed for such a place big as it was and it was evident from the and skeleton hanging on the wall as well as from the fact that the cabin was built on one side that this was the kitchen and living room combined.

"Have you seen Daley?" cried Penrod as he stepped inside. Only a dull glow answered. The floor could now see where a doorway entrance to an inner room and this quick glance showed was the sleeping apartment, a big bunk being built on the side walls.

"Well, somebody had it pretty comfortable here," decided Penrod as he looked around. "They've been cooking and sleeping here, and not so very long ago either it wouldn't be such a bad place if it was cleaned out."

"That's right," agreed Angelina. "You wouldn't mind cooking here yourself, if there was any fishing around."

"The place can't be very far away," suggested Penrod. "And now let's see what we can find, and see if we can get a line on who has been here, not just tell us it is a bad place."

He opened a window in the sleeping room which faced the rear portion of the boat so that there was no chance of any one coming in and pushed back the heavy plank shutter that had been closed. When the light came in it was seen that both bunk beds had evidence of having been lately slept in. The blanket was tossed back as if the occupants had risen, and in the outer room on the stove were signs that indicated a meal had been served but many hours gone by.

"Now," observed Penrod hastily, with the echo of Daisy's cry still ringing in his ears, "if we could only find out who owns this and who has been here lately!"

Tim stooped over and, thrusting below the end of the plank that trailed on the floor from one of the bunks, picked up something.

"What is it?" asked Penrod.

"Looks like a white leather pocket book," said the answer. "That's what it is. The boy about lead went on as he held the object to the light only to have it reveal much better than a blinding flash of lightning. It's a little girl's pocket book."

"That he has it," exclaimed Penrod quickly. He took the pocket book from Tim's hand. Then the four boys in a sudden cry, "A clew at last!" he exclaimed. "A clew at last! Daisy has been in this cabin. Her cry came from here all night."

"How do you know?" asked James.

"This is her pocket book," said Penrod excitedly. "I'd know it if it was among a million in a store. I've seen her always have it. That's Daisy's pocket book all right. Besides if you want evidence—look."

He opened the leather flap and showed the three on the stump in cold letters and a medal pinned on the name of little Daisy.

"Well, what do you make of it Penrod?" asked the three together as he finished his examination of the little pocket book. "What does it mean? The pocket book is empty and that—"

"Might mean almost anything," completed Penrod. "But it is a clew all right. She's been here and I'm pretty certain she was brought here in the night with the wagon wheel—the one we turned so far out handy."

"But that doesn't help us now," said Tim. "The point is to find out how lately little Daisy was here, and what has happened to her since. The book isn't anything in the pocket book is the point."

"Nothing," answered Penrod, making a careful examination so as to be sure.

"It's an empty book. That you've heard that. The book was brought here that had happened to Daisy found it. Robbed by spies. He was laid out right instead of being run down as I and James thought, was laid out and brought and then the little body was brought here."

"There you go again Penrod jumping to conclusions," said Jim with a friendly smile and with the familiarity of an old and valued helper.

"If she was murdered and how came we to hear her cry out you name. She may be in perfect good health just because you found the empty pocket book doesn't argue that they have killed her. Of course it is possible now she is in the hands of enemies all right and I'll admit they have taken her away in it all right but that doesn't prove they have done her any great personal harm. The thing for us to do is to find out who knows about this shack, who owns it, on whose land it is, especially he kept it besieged, find out whether any one has been here lately and try and hide ourselves so as to trap them. They may be in a you know."

"Good idea," said Penrod. "They've been here lately. Whether they have been seen or not. There's a chance the wagon wheel tracks all the way up to here. All this rain is not enough, then either by making their shoes so wet. Daisy must have been here just before we came. That's it. Let that be a clue out of our way. I wonder what's in it. I've a mind to look."

"I wouldn't bother about it now," said James. "We got Daisy to look for."

"Yes and we must find some other clues."

They looked about in the fast fading light but at first could discover nothing more than evidence that the eleven persons had been lately in the shack since the last twenty hours. They had had their meals there, and had slept. The object this seemed to be all that could be established other than that Daisy's pocket book was the only thing of its kind on the boat. Penrod was looking through the closet door which he intended to pick up and to his surprise the door was the only one of some food which accounted for the presence of the little girl's pocket book. And as Penrod looked at his hand came in contact with something large wrapped in paper on an upper shelf. It was something soft but something inside clinked metallicly.

"What's that?" asked the three others in one breath. "Kilvan or some other other weapon wrapped in it?"

"It is only a couple of knives wrapped in some piece of cloth," answered Penrod, "and they've been used lately. I can see something of this cloth and you—"

"Suddenly Penrod ceased speaking and held the cloth up to the light. It turned out to be a uniform and yellowed with purple dots around the lower portion of the skirt.

"My sister's dress," he exclaimed wrathfully. "Was she trying to slip her skirts the devil?"

Then he drew forth a knife and looked at it with a small but powerful magnifying glass which he drew from his pocket taking it out in front of the shack where the light was better, the rain however having slackened for a time and the sky not so dark any more.

"I thought so," he cried in alarm. "Look here at the three of you quick."

"What is it?" they asked at once.

"No the clew," answered James looking.

It appeared however that they had discovered a clew to the evidence of the of some wicked crime for there was something like blood on the knife, and on the dress at some point or places and that it might prove to be the blood of poor little Daisy.

"What is it?" asked Jim unable to guess at what Penrod was looking through the powerful glass. "What do you see? Is it the blood of poor little Daisy?"

But the satisfaction that showed on Penrod's face did not seem to indicate such a possibility as these.

"It is blood all right," said the young police, "and unless I'm mistaken it is the blood of a young pig or some other farm animal."

"What?" cried James. "Do you mean that the spies must have stolen some farm animal or something, probably a hog for the reason?"

"That's what I think," answered Penrod. "For this is no human blood. I know it sounds pretty far-fetched," he went on, "but take a look for yourself. If those blood particles on the knife and on the dress too are not exactly the blood of a hog I'll never claim I'm an expert at detecting things again. An Indian will tell you the same. They've learned me to detect all different kinds of blood and the way to know some farm animal's blood I'll miss my guess."

James himself peered through the powerful glass moving out a little further from the shack so as to get the best light possible on the subject of his examination. It was fast getting dark again, and the storm showed signs of resuming another of its wild spasms.

"Am I right?" asked Penrod.

"You are right," declared James. "This is exactly the blood of a hog all right, and you are right as to it being a young one too. It would seem Penrod that the culprit stole a farm animal young hog to feast upon."

"My idea exactly," cried Penrod. "The spy who must have got into the farm animal's hog pen in some undiscovered manner did his work and then brought the animal here to kill and feast upon. They must have known of our approach and fled with Daisy leaving her blood spotted dress and knife. Believe the blood got on the dress from the knife. Daisy must have been here before we came. No I'll not say that either finding her pocket book doesn't prove that she was here. It might have been brought here by one of the spies and dropped. Her cry of my name as heard didn't sound from this cabin either. It came from out side and was very loud and piercing and at the end sounded as if one of the skunks clapped his dirty stick sticking hard over her mouth. But I'm sure we are on the track of the men who kidnapped her as well as those who tried to learn something of the mystery of my invention. Well," he laughed sarcastically, "I'll show them that I'm an Indian besides a white boy. I've tried to kill persons all my spare time in the which for some and they were not so hard on this. Who ever had the right we are so over-confident to leave wagon wheel marks so easily to follow. If it is possible I'll make sure she'll be safe home by to night or my name is not Penrod, and as to those who stole her."

"I agree with you," said Jim. "Of course there is a possibility that the spies stole the hog, and that the knife itself belonged to the farmer. That proves a farm animal must not be far from here. But the chances are—"

"There is only one way to make sure," said Penrod. "Let's take the dress and knife with us, and see about the farm animal about the knife. We'll find the farm animal and find out about this shack. We'll take these back, and we can just about make it before it gets any worse this storm. That don't give us any more time to look around here," and they went out.

"I fancy we have seen all there is to see here," said Penrod. "Daisy isn't here and whether she is or not is a question. But the other accounts can still keep the place as it is in case the spies come back. I know they were here and had something to do with her fate. The disappearance, I'm positive of that, and I'm sure there had a hand in it who tried to steal the plans of my inventions, I'm positive of that. We will have our own clean fire and the own this place, who has been using it and all we can do along that line. Let six of the scouts ride within the shack in the back, and so they can take the signal by the pipes if they do come back with my rifle. I don't seem to tell me they will go if you are ready let it travel for the fact though even I do not know why I have a feeling that Daisy is ready to do more than we all don't know why but I do."

I in myself volunteered to stay behind and be with the six within the cabin and Penrod agreed. Then Penrod and the two others stating they'd be back as soon as they interviewed the farmer set out to make their way toward the house. They felt sure the farmer was. It was fast becoming dark, it seemed as if night time was coming on at one thirty in the afternoon but they could hurry along with more speed now as they did not have to stop to look for the marks of the peculiar wagon wheel tire and for loops. They also had noticed the path along which they had traveled and in less than half the time they had spent coming they were back on the large main road once more. Though it was starting to pour rain again and lightning and thunder were more than it had been before. Making sure as far as they could tell, no fresh marks were on the road, and as the lightning flashes were more frequent now they again compared the blood marks on the knife and the dress using what they had forgotten before a small but powerful oleo lamp, to aid them. In this examination as it was too dark to see otherwise, and they had to do so quick before they were washed off as it was raining perfect floods, a veritable cloud burst now and what they saw even in that short time caused the young prince to exclaim:

"That settles it. I know now since the flash and my strong place a veil I it truthfully. These marks really after all are from human blood. Oh Go to sleep I am afraid Daisy is dead."

"Oh don't say that," said Angelina. "Aren't you talking to her eyes. Think she cried for you only half an hour ago."

"Yes but this was found after hours," blubbered Penrod with tears in his own eyes."

"Oh it can't be a matter she's angel possessed" said James. "Though after all it's right to say. That is human blood. The strong light now proves that. You have called the turn now. But remember too one of those fellows in killing the hog or shaver—it was a covering the meat might have accidentally cut himself and the blood is from that. The next thing to do is to look up and find who connects with the knife who stole it from the farmer."

"Yes to do that and find Daisy poor angel," said Angelina. "Aren't you?" "We have plenty of work ahead of us, and let's get to some place before we get drowned out. It's raining terrible now and it's good we have our blessed rain coat and the outfit on. Let's get back to civilization and send some word to the anxious folks at Pardo. They'll be getting worried."

Just as she finished the word came an appalling crash of thunder, and when it died away and the rain fell still under Penrod said:

"It doesn't seem as if there is a man, out of here without using a guide. It's a thing so hard you can't see fifty feet" and as he said this a crash of thunder came ten times louder than before. It was a terrific thunder explosion and fairly shook the heavens in a deafening salvo. But Penrod and his two friends finally reached the seldom used road which ran along the field that contained the lonely shack and following this through all the rain and deafening din, where four great thunder claps roared simultaneously as one from flashes in four different directions simultaneously they soon reached a farmhouse a mile further on a high sloping ground. Out to their relief there was a telephone in the place but the farmer who kindly received them said they couldn't use it as they couldn't get so close to make any on account of the violence of the long after midnight storm. He said also it was only a party line set up by some neighboring farmer's for their own private use, but he said that he would get in a call for them as soon as the storm lets up (a crash of thunder came then that made Penrod think the house was going to be shaken down) and he could connect with one of the parties to whom the private line ran and had a long distance instrument and after a talk with him Penrod could get into connection with those at home.

"I'd like," said Penrod, after thanking their temporary host, a kindly old woman named Hank. "Heldon" Can you tell us anything about an old cabin that stands back the shed and has a window against which the mortal rain was glancing indicated the location of the mysterious shack. "Well, yes I can tell you a little about it but not very much," said Hank. "It is mine. I own that shack."

"You do?"

"I certainly do. I built it some time ago and I can most of all this land up here and the woods too. I use it in the winter time as it's too cold here in my home here."

"Well I thought," began Penrod while Angelina and James looked at each other. "You say it's mine can I see it?" said the farmer. "I know you seem to doubt my word but it is true. I can prove it by my deeds. However—since the beginning of spring up to now my shack has not been used since."

"Oh yes it has," exclaimed Penrod. "He just came from the place, it hasn't been open yet and the farmer said that when some one has been sleeping there and eating there the hall for a few things I would not concern it to my self unless any of my business but I suspect they are some fellow I and my followers are after we got it made rounded."

"There has," exclaimed the farmer. "Well I didn't know that. Well I haven't didn't give any body permission to use it."

"Well to think of it," said his son a young boy about Penrod's size if not same age. "I do not then off. They had with them some kid a little girl who seemed to be a boy called 'Penrod' I tried to locate them but they were gone. I just came up now to speak of it as I returned as the storm is too heavy for going out. I saw our pig fence which you told me was stolen turn into the old road that usually use to drive into our shack. I tried to cover the pig but they were too many for me. Yes some strange rough men in civilian clothes has been at our cabin just a half hour or more ago."

"Do you know who they are?" asked Penrod eagerly. "We are looking for a dear little princess one of the sisters of the Daughters of the Nation who disappeared mysteriously last night after eight o'clock within the very Christian lines and I just found her pocket book and dress there in your shack."

"You did," exclaimed Hank. "A little princess, you mean one of those dear-blessed Virgin girls. Why that's queer. That's awful. I'll tell you what you should do by about office. Do you know their good and famous brother prince Penrod, why didn't you tell him?" asked.

"I don't need to tell him," Penrod answered. "The little girl is Daisy, Vivian herself."

"Well it's too bad about her missing in that way went on the farmer," read about it in the paper but I never suspected she was around here in my shack—High Mandy," he added calling to his wife. "Where's my big shooting iron."

"I'll get it for you," she called. "I'll bring your sons too. What you want them for?"

"I'm going to help these two boys and girl scout find the missing princess child. Angelina though men have been prisoners" and then he asked Penrod the details, and Penrod told the story of his own and the appearance of the others on the scene to the small wonder of the farmer and his family for besides his wife and son he had a smaller boy and two beautiful bright looking cheerful but sympathetic little girls. Penrod then said:

"Did you miss anything besides your pig?"

"Yes I've lost a big knife and a couple of dozen chickens and one good big hog. I suppose they stole that to feed themselves by."

"How many were in the big place?" asked Penrod of the farmer's son. "Was a little girl in the pig?"

"I couldn't be sure of that but they had a good sized any old way wrapped bundle of some sort like it was a bunch of old clothes. There were only three men in the place eight of them on horse and they had at large to be long the big they were Glendellian feat was to me. Those on the pig were silent, but those on horse back were talking together—better I draw the shade shades and the confounded lightning would be blinding us" now as I said they were talking together, pretty earnestly it seemed to me."

"And there was no little girl on any of the horses?" asked Penrod.

"To the best of my knowledge was the answer. What a copy of 'Penrod' Penrod later came from the big pig. These men looked to me and acted like business men looking over land something like that and did not appear to carry weapons or rifles. They just turned in on the road that leads to our winter cabin home and urged the pig on faster when they saw me as I carried by buckshot gun. I fired at them but they got away. They have our pig. We got the new wheels put on yesterday morning. We missed it at seven last night."

"But how could it be the copy of 'Penrod' came from the pig when you say she can't go on it."

"I don't know but it did. It may be have been hidden where I could not see her."

"Neither of them on horse back as you said did not have her," decided Penrod.

"I guess that clear found isn't going to amount to very much."

"It may," insisted James. "They may have had poor little Daisy in the old all the while—concealed in the back of some—the seat you know. We have got to find out more about these men and get the pig back for the farmer too Penrod."

"Well yes, I suppose so Hank said now."

"Well the way may be some good luck," said Angelina A. Ock, "G. I. remember you have stationed within the truck seven persons, six to a including him the place is surrounded by the coast and some have ridden at the beginning of the highway road. As this storm out side is getting worse the men will not being able to find shelter come back a believe this storm is just at its worse now and yet will not let up for some time to come."

"That's so easy my Good thing, we have done that," cried the young Indians. "and I and my son will help you," said the Father. "We are both good shots." "Thank you," remarked Pen-od. "We will accept your offer if you played good by having your cabin with watched. These rounds we may come back and if they do they'll run right into the trap."

to they'll run right into the trap."
The farmer and his son donned their raincoats and started out.
"But you are so full of foolish joy," said the farmer. "Since the case of such a good little princess affects you, and since you are said a high-ranked boy scout, you should have notified her mother, Prince Penrod's twin that she was missing. If he heard of her missing, I'll be bound he would soon be on her trail. I will all on that." "I will help you search further," be or heart-kill, put I will all out that I will not. I will not let them "That will be fine" - cried Penrod. "I got the aid of the Gaminis and as for I didn't see how I could as I knew they were too busy with military matters and tracing spies and seditions. All enemies to both - with means that they did it for me because she is a princess. I'm sure the Secret Military Service men can get traces of the persons responsible for the detention of little Daisy where ever she is."

"I know those people," said Mr. Heldon, "and they'll do that. I'm also a member of that body though I'm also a farmer and I'll give my personal attention to the matter. You know Mr. Henry Gale. He's my son also."

"you mean?" yes. "

"Yes.

"Yes."

Now as to follow a busy time despite the storm which showed no signs of letting up in noise and rain. Pen-rod knew he had given a clue as to those entering the cabin within and in-out to capture all those who reached, while besides this already soldiers and boy scouts were coming forward scouting the country around the locality of the cabin seeking a trace of Daisy if they could only find her. The women continued to talk or about how "Pen-rod" should have told the girls he had and finally Pen-rod said:

"That would not have done any good for it once has been found of her through every effort it was made. I must confess I - Heldon that I'm his brother - Prince Pen-od, and I'm beginning to feel after all that my boast of my annies having to get up early in the morning to get ahead of me is being a premature to say the least, and now this confounded storm seems to talk of my effort - self only it would let up -aining so hard."

They continued on and soon were closed to the scene of the stretch of country where they had started on the trail that led to the cabin. Suddenly in the distance Pen-od was aware of a horse and a pig, and three men on it, and eight men following. There were two men on the drive seat, and one sitting on the rear of the rig, and as Pen-od looked with his field glasses to the surprise of the gaping astonished farmer and his son and the two others a most brilliant flash of lightning showed him there was no little girl on it if not in the rig. The whole wagon and the men and horse were illuminated aough by the flash of lightning, (which gave no forth a horse thunder clap than ever yet) to be seen as easily but the men not being near enough to see the party did not look in any other direction as they passed so they were unconscious of any danger when they were passing the house. "Isn't this a at the back, and the men on horse back to the duck it's just too bad,"

[illegible]

"He-he-he-he! Well, now, if they go into the duck it's just too bad," asked The "Can we dare go forward? Prince without letting them see you?" asked The
"We can use a lot of voice as if ten of the men in the wagon and on horse would hear this despite the loud racket caused by the long thunder storm."
"I guess so," answered the young prince. "We can creep up near them to the cabin and then we can see what those fellows are up to. It looks suspicious to me and if they go into the cabin they'll get the surprise of their lives."
"But they go forward then and see what will happen," said James. "If they get suspicious and believe someone is in the cabin looking for them they'll have to run into us and won't get away so far. We can surprise them."

"My plan" voiced Penrod. "voiced Penrod." quickly they put themselves out of sight for a moment and waited until the carriage and its occupants and the two men were out of sight behind a clump of trees. It was, however, dark and his companions felt sure of the destination of the men--the famous cabin in the woods. Then they started again, but the darkness hid the cabin. They were all sufficiently alarmed, however, to carry a small flashlight. As soon as they came near a place where the flashlight beams of the women would show despite the pouring rain, P. O.

"I thought so," he exclaimed, as he saw the square the long marks left by iron hoops. "It's the same junk, some of them in the wagon, let's come up to the cabin and hand them off in case they get wise that any one is in the cabin and makes an attempt to escape."

"You - boy and girl, wouldn't ought to be able to do that," he turned the famous "I believe that will," said Ben and - "I believe they will," said Penrod. Or on the other hand, if they came within sight of the cabin. They saw the light stop not far from it and the man just entering the cabin. There was no light gleaming in it either yet. Then one was light. A moment later there came out cries, and then the sound of shots being fired.

out cries, and then the sound of shots being fired. "Now we have them," said Penrod. As he spoke one of the men came running out from the door and Penrod brought him down with a well aimed pistol shot adding to the noise of a good loud thunder boom. "Aah just them."

"Is there a barndoor to the place," asked Mr. Eldon amid the confusion of sound produced by the shot, mail being silent within the cabin all ready."

Penrod said "no and then they crept up to the porch. It was open and Penrod and his companions to the joy of those within stepped in. Two men were lying dead on the floor, the other outside. Seven men were standing there in the char acteristic attitude of holding up hands.

"He captured them as they entered," said mima. Two "Two we shot down and five of them escaped through the corridor and got killed by some one outside maybe you shot him, but there is no sign of Daisy."

This new s filled Penrod with wild and righteous rage for the capture of the spies did not bring to an end the mystery of the disappearance of Daisy. The furmies and his son went outside to have a look in the rig and found no one at all. The forbidden men were standing in a row covered by the boy and girl - acquaintances who looked as if they were tempted to shoot them anyway as they went - and the girl - acquaintances to not have to give quarters.

"I see it, now," said Pen-od. "My fears are so far worse now, correct. He had cut himself and had too. Then he turned to the prisoners who were now being bound with their hands behind their backs.

"What does this mean? Who are you fellows anyway, where's my sister Daisy and what's your game?" he demanded.

"Does it since you are so smart," snapped one. And he spoke but he opened his mouth than Penn had a glance of something gleam, a brightly yellow.

"Oh you are the golden toothed fellow eh, so it's you again is it? You dirty boy."

"... since the march to the mountain-top had been good too long, would cause you sisters and father extra work. You know they have suffered enough." To Penrod it was good advice, though the father suggested that they wait until the full rage of the storm had passed, as it was a long way. The prisoners could be kept in the other side of the cabin under the eaves.

Put Penrod said, "No. They must go ahead and not be delayed, and that is soon as the sun comes early in the morning he would have the sun." Penrod put on how he intended to face his sister when he returned and without Daisy.

The expedition was prepared for murder and all were mounted on their horses and the sudden prisoners were led out. Those who had been shot down had been disposed of by the father and son. Just when all was ready Penrod said, "Shouldn't we take that large bundle along with us Penrod?" "No," said Penrod. "We have no use for it. It's only a bundle of old clothing." He however looked it over carefully and then said:

"I'll sling it over my horse after all and tie it fast. It may serve for something."

He lifted it, thought the shape of it felt queer but said nothing. He carefully slung it over the horse, saw to it it was securely fastened, and then mounted his horse. They all bid good bye to the father, thanking him for his help and then they started off some what swiftly through the storm. As it had been some what slackening they felt a little more relieved and also the sky was not quite so dark and heavy any more and most of the louder thunder was coming in the east. They soon entered a better section of country and rode past a wide white pillared house that stood on a hill top among tall oaks and pines together dominating the normal sloping forest gardens that fell away to a meadow and a willow fringed brook. Penrod usually avoided looking at such houses as it was too much of a reminder to him of happy days gone by at their own home in Massachusetts. But to day for some reason or other Penrod faced this beautiful structure as he was approaching through the still gray rain. He stared at it as the horse continued on as if behind its vacant windows lay some answer to the quest he was after. He knew too that they would brighten later as the setting sun dropped opposite them to a narrow evening.

He remembered too that Daisy often called beautiful places and buildings heaven for some obscure child a woman and he wondered anxiously if she was not really dead, and in heaven now. He never inquired to himself why but understood that she and her sisters often had played some game in which it was heaven just because now their own home was high and far away. In some way too he blamed himself for the disappearance of poor Daisy. It would not have happened if he had refused to let her go away by herself. As he rode on he stopped looking at the house and contemplated the narrow view which was really lovely. All late spring lay on the hillsides and the valley between and it looked as if no war was ever known. It would have been so still and beautiful if the war had been no storm raging, to hear in that spot the happy voices of his sisters playing by a beautiful little brook at the foot of the long meadow. Soon he would be back within the Christian encampments to turn over his prisoners for safe keeping, and then into Pandora to tell his sisters that either Daisy was dead—could he dare tell them that—or that she could not be found.

He disliked more than anything to even see a tent in that way. He sighed dismally sat up in the saddle, a little graceful composed figure on the horse, young even than his sister, joy by half a year who had kept his strength and was a very handsome looking lad but now most horribly disturbed over this incident that now he did not say anything to any one, and they noticed he wished to be silent did not disturb him with how he intended to face his poor little sisters when he came home with only the prisoners and an old bundle and no sign of Daisy. Yet he couldn't understand why he still had that feeling that she was near to him but could not account why. Tim Groveton himself roused by the sound of Penrod's loud sigh began to ride close to him and they rode sedately across the meadow now. Watching Tim said he knew that Penrod was usually abrupt and sharply by memory. Though this was probably dead little Daisy's birthday, though all day long during the following of the trail he had been troubled by the collections of his lovely youngest sister who used to stand under the arching vista waiting for the sound of his foot steps coming up the drive way, on the clip clip of Penrod's horse hoofs, he had not forgotten any thing about it. He was intended to bring to her a birthday gift—a beautiful bonnet and a beautiful little new dress also. That intention was precisely about two days ago to day, for Penrod was madly in love with his sister, and Heaven knows the lives of these brave and beautiful children are not so stretch beautifully ahead as we see in a June sun on a long meadow.

But it seemed now she was dead, before he could even see her which he again blamed himself for not going fast at the first of the march and he was weeping silently to himself so he was not to be shown of one little sister, though she had hoped to keep for all time. So his little sister whom he had loved more than any one in the world equal to his other good darling sister and penrod had seen an untimely death while he and his fallow were had been hopelessly hunting for her that night and all day in a hurry to find her. Yet if he had closed his eyes and let the chimneys of the lightning on the blue of the sea disturb his clarity of vision he could believe that the formal garden of a long unchanging since the days he and his little sister with good little Daisy walked there, that the whole slope of land down the valley to the willow fringed brook was so much the same now as before the war.

He suggested he should have looked viciously at the blandishman prisoners, tried to dim the sad vision which was blanking his heart, and urged his horse on faster. He was now passing a row of willow trees and more madonna lilies in the interval and that made an ache in his heart for Daisy's return came back two fold. They were now riding through and over the meadow path and reaching a spot where the brook widened, where before was the unhappy child's play. Penrod was not wearing his cap, he never did when anything was happening to his sister and neither were the boy scouts, and at times the flash of lightning overhead blazed a glare on his golden hair and his looks from his work of trailing the lost child princess were quite extraordinary.

Penrod's mind again wandered to little Daisy and his sister. He remembered when he sat one day fishing without any success apparently, and she sat in the shade while he sat on the bank busy elsewhere and doing something from the New Testament, which she loved and he too. And the dog lay between them.

And he remembered too when little Daisy smiled when she looked up at him but seemed to find speech unnecessary. Penrod reflected to himself that he had said "Do you and your sister wish to come up to the house and have some camp-biscuits?" and Violet had said "I should like it, but later for supper." Maybe I might get a fish for which too had been fishing, while while Jennie had said "It's been so warm that we had been up to the spring and drank lots of water." As they rode on the air was fresh and by the heavy rain into the pleasant have a particular smell of wet earth and moss and of the wet of the grass and the trees, of moss and clear running water and aromatic ferns that was characteristic of these regions for as long as Penrod could remember it. Since the thunder was about slackened, even though it still was raining he could hear the familiar sounds of the brook and now, the breeze through light willow leaves, which was heard occasionally by the reach of one of the houses. Penrod fortunately Penrod thought the contour of the land hid the world from any big claretian accident, but alas. As they were going on ahead Angelina Averbuch said:

"I never did like and do not like the experience of your sisters."

I think these claretian are too down dead to even exist. I can't forget Daisy's shriek of "Penrod, Penrod" amid all the queer loud noises of the storm in the woods, which seemed to lead to the confused clamor of the whole stormward she a cold with heavy socks. These words only made Penrod picture to himself how the little same sisters of his had done things that a cold and did bring the best indication of the very angels. He only sighed as she spoke. Daisy continued: "These things is so sad, it seems as if they were a child—only lost from heaven for being good, and then down amongst these claretians, when everything should be different."

"Penrod said a little bowed as he answered:

"All good little girls and like that sort of sad and for now put it on 't keep up long with my sisters. I'll bet I'll put an end to that or if, have to test my own claretian army that comes my way." In favor of it, I think more than my father, suppose."

"Angelina said that do not know, do have never been with him always?"

"I might as well," he said. "I've listened to you all lots of things about him before I ever knew he was my father."

Angelina Averbuch smiled a little. It was a fact that when you told her about Angelina as she was called knew her very well and was usually better than Penrod, though it was only a few months longer than she put in as much as he did almost every thing else in the world, from riding a horse, and Indian Tricks to any lesser known better than any one next to his sister, better than even his cousin, Violet and her sisters had known Angelina Averbuch to follow his ways, and some how or other Penrod liked his cousin almost equal to his love of his sister. In fact the two hardly was no difference.

Penrod never made his point of it since she was a damsel little girl not to be a party to any party as he put in his cousin but extremely pretty just the same, though his eyes were of the same blue and she was just as charming when she smiled. She said "I remember and still remember as when Daisy and I were in the middle between some book once which she kept and to cheer Daisy could recite that for you."

Penrod hastily untied it and taking it from the horse's back set it down on the ground where it wasn't too wet.

The bundle he noticed by the gleam of the light that Tim still held to it was tied by ropes though it seemed loose and fluffy.

"It's too much work trying to untie those knots out here," said Penrod. "I will carry it into the house--humpf it's heavier than I thought--but up I go. Tim help me will you. We'll get this into the reception room and see what is in it." Argelia, Ambrogio, Riches, Tim and James followed while Walter, Stella and Penrod's horse went away.

They soon had it lying on the floor in the reception room, while Penrod lighted two of the gas jets. Then he looked at the bundle carefully but not long, while he drew his big sheath knife from his pocket.

"I'm going to cut those ropes," he said. "They're tied too tightly. Tim shut the door. If it's a animal inside belonging to the farmer we don't want to let it get away."

He finally had the knife out and he slipped slashed the ropes around the bundle. Then he told Penrod:

"Get ready to grab what ever is rushing out. It may be a young hog or something those spies stole. If so we'll have it sent to the farmer to look after." Then the young prince stooped down and untied the bundle. What he saw before him made him stop back in blank amazement and consternation. Tim cried out: "My God it's poor Daisy."

It was she was inside the bundle, gagged, and bound hand and foot, but alive and not even unconscious which proved she had been able to even breathe plenty of air even inside the bundle. Penrod was struck dumb for a moment and stood gaping as if he was paralyzed. Then he covering himself, he called to Tim: "Lift it up Tim while I cut her bonds and the gag. Of all the----" and his face blackened with rage but he didn't say anything more. What was the use. Tim obeyed right willingly and it was in no time that she was free and ungagged. She however was not just herself to be able to say a thing but it sure was evident that she was glad for then with a shriek of unaccountable delight she had thrown her little arms around his neck and he held her in such an embrace and of such fervent enthusiasm that she was for the moment made red quite breathless though the poor little girl broke into a passion of tears especially from the relief she felt.

"Don't cry, Daisy dear please don't," Penrod pleaded the tears of sympathy at reaching down to kiss her cheeks. "You are found now. And your sisters won't need to be grieved for you."

"Oh but I wasn't lost, they were cruel to me, cruel to me and tried to undress me to cut me because I wouldn't tell anything," wailed poor Daisy.

"I know it all, I know it all," said Penrod hugging her tight. "Oh if I had known you were in that bundle when I first saw it in that shack."

"Oh I knew you were there," she sobbed, but I couldn't talk because I was gagged. They put me in the cage after I called for you for my instinct told me you were near. They rolled me up in that bundle. I heard every word you said. James and Tim said all that time until you left and hoped to be rescued."

And was. They were dreadful. They killed three little children before my eyes a boy and two girls and threw them into a bog near the river. They didn't dare do much more to me as they got scared of me for something after they partly undressed me. Oh it was terrible. Oh Penrod, Penrod dear, how did you find me? I thought it was impossible!"

Penrod had sat her down on a bed in the room and both he and Tim now had arms around her while the two others also sat on the bed feeling so awful too.

"Were you not taken on a rig?"

"Yes--yes--I-----was."

"Well the fools blundered thinking that no one would follow the rig. Well we did."

"But how--how--could you. The storm came up last night and the rain washed away the tracks."

"Oh indeed it did not," said Penrod with a little laugh to cheer her. "The rain made the wheel marks show where we followed the trail all the way to the shack and trapped the rascals there. They're prisoners now and without knowing you was in it, carried you in that bundle all the way."

"I knew--you--you--did" she still sobbed. "I could tell by the motion of the horse it was you and you spoke too with the rascals. I heard every thing you said to the prisoners."

There was a pause, the color had gone out of Penrod's face but his arms had tightened about the quivering child and when he spoke his voice was low and not quite steady but very kind.

"You funny dear little angel of mine," he said kissing the flushed tear-stained face. "You are with me now again. Don't be unhappy now. Lie up and wait for a time."

then you can tell me the whole story. We'll just sit here for a while Daisy darling and be happy again. And both boys who had an arm around her hugged her both tight, Penrod kissing her, and in a while but from his heart saying a good prayer of Thanksgiving to God. As he finished it was true that he heard a voice in his right ear say and Tim thought he heard it too though it sounded sweet but unearthly:

"Don't let those rascals get away with it. Give them Capital Op Capital punishment. Remember your little sister was waylaid by them and only God and we know what our righteous treatment they did to her. Even she cannot tell you it's too shameful. If we didn't prevent them you'd have found your little sister dead with her poor little body all torn up and the nails scattered over the shed because she wouldn't reveal the secrets of your plans. Punish them you'll do a sin and injustice to your sister if you don't."

Penrod said nothing but seemed to nod as if to say "They'll wish they had not been born."

For some time Penrod held her in his arms and then noticed she was unusually quiet.

He looked at her:

"Quick get her to bed Tim," smiled Penrod. "The poor little dear is asleep and that is good for her. I must go to the phone. I'll see you afterwards and then I'll inform the rest."

"Hello," he said when he was at the phone in the next room. "Ops--stop give me 10-1-1, 1,000, General Jack Evans headquarters in Camp 10, 144th Infantry. Hurry as this is important and no busy signals."

He soon had the number and heard Evans' phone ring.

"Hello," came a voice which sounded like a general's. "Who's calling?"

"This is Prince Penrod speaking. Is Evans there?"

"No he's out hunting the little princess angel Daisy your sister. What to see him?"

"Have him and his secretary recalled," said Penrod. "I brought Daisy home with me."

"God be praised," came back over the wire. "God be praised. I knew she was lost, and Prince it takes boys like you to find her."

"She was not lost," said Penrod spitefully. "How about those prisoners I brought in?"

"They are under close confinement. The office said they are badly wanted. But you say she is not lost? Come she was missing then?"

"Those rascals kidnapped her within the Christian lines. I had her in a big bundle all the way home from the shack she was in before I knew it. It was awful she was gagged and bound and terribly distressed."

"That's terrible," said the general. "It'll be terrible for them too. It's a death penalty for any one stealing any child from the Christian lines in time of war and you know what it is I suppose."

"Yes, but bring at the stake," said Penrod grimly. "I can't be helped though, but I don't worry. I'll hold a court martial as soon as Daisy is brought right and condemn them. I ought to have known something was wrong when the prisoners acted so suspicious by looking so often at the bundle. They looked frightfully worried about the fact I had it with them. You are Argeline Jennings are you not?"

"No I'm her sister's police. If you want Prince I'll see to you. Orders can be issued and then come up with my sister when I like."

"Do," said Penrod. Bring Catherine Lee too if you can find her and see to it by your orders to the general that that bunch of prisoners do not escape and the sentries that allow them will forfeit their lives."

"I will. I'll do so right away. Thank God you got the snakes" and bidding good bye for the time being she hung up the receiver.

Penrod then returned into the room and suddenly Tim put his finger to his lips.

"Sh-h-h-h-h Penrod," he was asleep still. Don't awaken her."

Penrod came in quietly and looked at her for a minute. Then he whispered softly to Tim:

"I must believe my poor sister. I'll go up softly and you put the light out and close the door of the hall. Leave the room lit so my sister can see. I'll warn them not to make any noise after I tell them."

Then he crept softly up the stairs until he knew he was far enough so that his call would not awaken Daisy. Then he stopped near where the door was and cried:

"Come down sister. I'm home. I have a glad surprise for you."

In fact Violet and her sisters couldn't hardly believe their ears. Joice was the first to go out, followed by her sisters and the house keeper too.

In their distress however - they had not recognized Pen-rod's voice and when they came to the head of the stairs they were surprised to find him standing there.

"Oh Pen-rod dear you back!" cried Violet coming down to him and clasping him eagerly by the hand. She noticed he looked a little excited but not agitated.

"Where's Daisy?" she asked on so eagerly and pleading. "Did you find her?"

"I did not."

"Oh you didn't?"

"I did not until I got back here with a set of prisoners which I left in camp. I brought her back in a bundle of clothes." "In a bundle of clothes?" exclaimed Jennie excitedly. "Oh Pen-rod, Pen-rod dear I know you are always saying something to make us laugh. A bundle of -" "I brought her back in a bundle of clothes" said Pen-rod insistently. "I did not know she was in it until I reached her. She is asleep in the small bed in the reception room. Come down quietly and see her, and then afterwards I'll tell you the details." and as he finished the little girl noticed a sort of wicked gleam in his eyes and felt something was wrong, but they followed him into the room and sure enough there was Daisy though some of the tears were still on her cheeks.

"Be careful don't awaken her" she said as Violet was going too far out at the petious sight. "I'll tell you up in your room."

They sure felt relieved and silently they hugged Pen-rod and the others and kissed them in the attitude of their attitude. In the room by a corner lay a bundle of clothes which Pen-rod indicated as the one she was in, and she showed them the bonds, and the gag.

They remained for a long time in the room and some how or other the presence awakened poor little Daisy, and at the sight of her sister she flung herself out of bed and each in turn lovingly embraced her. After the excitement was a little subdued Violet said;

"She is awake now Pen-rod dear. Tell what what happened, why are those things you showed me?"

His eyes again gleamed wickedly and he had a sneer on his face as he said; "he wasn't lost, kidnapped from within the Christian lines. They busted her beautiful bike all to pieces. I trailed her up to a farmhouse shack, near which I heard her cry for help. I captured the rascals and then took the bundle home. They told me to hide her from us in case they were captured. I left the bundle in the shack, no wonder, had that queer feeling she was near me all the time. I found her in it gagged and bound and half naked confound it. If Daisy is well enough from her experience by to morrow I'll fix those scoundrels." and then he told the whole story of his search through all the atom and how it ended and the long trip home with the bundle on the horse.

"Oh I must call poor father and mother down," said Jennie feeling more happy and relieved now. "Our poor father and mother must have felt worse than we did." She ran up the steps as fast as she could and looking into the library saw him as he was before. At the sound of her entrance he raised his head.

"Oh dear -est Jennie and you sisters" he said sadly. "Why didn't you stay with me for a while. I am very lonely."

"But father dear, oh Pen-rod is so good. Thank God we found him as our brother. He brought little Daisy back."

He father was on his feet in a flash, and then he sank back in his chair for a moment with a murmured "Thank God" and then covered his face with his hands. That as she came up and in his sweetest voice said;

"Come father dear Pen-rod and the rest are waiting for you. Daisy is down stairs in the reception room."

He followed her swiftly down the stairs and when he went into the room and saw little Daisy surrounded by her now happy sisters and the others his own joy knew no bounds. He clasped her held her long in his arms while Jennie had gone again to find her mother and soon came down with her and the reunion sure was one worth for a happy scene in a good moving picture.

"Oh dear papa and mamma" cried Violet he self hugged her mother and then she too. "We are so glad so glad little Daisy is back, I don't know what to do, I feel as if I could fly. Pen-rod is sure good to us and we can't reward him enough."

"You dear little girls are so kind enough" said Pen-rod as he was holding Daisy lovingly in his arms again. But Pen-rod had to let her down as Emperor Vivian approached him.

"And what has my little son to say to me" he said, drawing the brave prince to him after he had hugged and kissed little Daisy again heartily.

"So you dear sister and your parents are so kind enough?"

"Yes indeed" said Pen-rod as his father shook his hand very warmly. "I can hear in my sister's voice that now again they are very happy, and of course that makes

"As and as it was" piped in Daisy, she then was feeling better. "How funny after all to think of my dear brother taking me for a big bundle all the way."

"Yes" but he soon discovered he didn't you Pen-rod dear" cried Catherine dancing to him and kissing him on the forehead, then clapping her hands and skipping about the room in the excess of her excitement and delight. "and she went off in peals of laughter, in which she was joined by all the others except Pen-rod who whose face was dark, and they did hear him say; to himself"

"The rest will be seven men who won't smile to me now."

"The rest was one great difficulty in this matter" said Emperor Vivian, and as he spoke his daughters who could picture near as to him were now lovingly around him and that is my dear son. How did she get lost. Why did you wrap her up in the bundle of clothes to keep her dry?"

"I didn't wrap her up in a bundle of clothes" said Pen-rod slyly. "and she didn't get lost. She was deliberately kidnapped, and he broke all smashed. I was God's Grace and Will that captured the rascals who kidnapped her. She was gagged and bound in the bundle" and Pen-rod told the whole story.

A black look crept over Emperor Vivian's face as he listened. Then he asked;

"And what are you going to do about it?"

"I'll court-martial them to morrow. But I'll select a good jury and the jury with God's Grace and Will and the others will consist of my sisters to make the twelve. I'll first with Daisy be the accusers, and then I'll be the judge as I am to it now. Father you must be the first judge to hear our complaints. And I'll make them wish they had never been born."

"I think my dear sisters must decide the question for themselves first." said Emperor Vivian. "What do you say Jennie dear?"

Jennie's only answer was to slip one hand into Pen-rod's and the other into her sister Daisy's, and her sisters came to them too looking serious and troubled.

"What do you say Jennie dear?" repeated Pen-rod looking anxiously at her.

Every one loves you little girl as you know, and no matter how terrible the punishment they'll agree and say it's justified you know. Pen-rod told me secretly what he heard what would have happened to Daisy she herself even cannot dare tell it. It is so shocking. He very angels want satisfaction you know."

"We couldn't stand the separation from poor Daisy" said Jennie the tears flowing from her eyes at the thought of the last twenty four hours. "We have always been together and we love her so. I suspect what she must have suffered. We'll be the judge jury and Pen-rod dear let's not you be any judge. Get Jack Evans to be one. I know what he will do."

"The terrible Jack Evans" said Emperor Vivian laughing. "Well so be it. Evans will be the judge. I'll do the rest and you little girls except Daisy of course will be the jury and Daisy will have to be as we call in here in Abbeannia the "Defendant." (The defendant the accuser the criminal for what he did to him so he can go be it.)"

Emperor Vivian said nothing more but he still had his arms around two of his little girls and drew them very close. There was a moment's happy silence and then they lifted their heads from their father's shoulders with a little start.

"Here there's the door bell" said Jennie. "I guess it is some body to see if poor little Daisy is back."

Pen-rod went to open the front door, and to their surprise a moment later came back with Argeline and Dolores Mc-Holliste - Jennings.

"I'm so glad you have come" said Dolores who was first to receive them and kissing their friends affectionately. "Dear little Daisy is back, she has been found. She was wrapped up in a bundle of clothes. You'll come up stairs too Mildred dear, so Mildred Maxwell had accompanied them."

"Yes as I would be delighted to. I'm glad Prince Pen-rod that you have captured those seven culprits who kidnapped poor Daisy. They won't be into any more mischief now."

Mildred's tone was severe and Prince Pen-rod appeared flattered.

"You are right they won't get into any more mischief" said Pen-rod slipping an arm around his blonde waist. "poor doesn't worry one bit more about us Mildred. Mrs Jennings is upstairs, and our aunt will be at home in a little while. She doesn't know poor Daisy is back, and I have phoned her."

The small troop of good little girls went upstairs together to their room followed by the boys. Two at a strong but not too bright gas lights was illuminating every object from the canopy in his cage which belonged once to James and was to the rows of big books on the big shelves which ran all around one side of the big sleeping (peeping) room. No brighter and pretty room prettier room would have been found easily anywhere else and Violet and her sisters had seen to its decoration so that after they left when the army would march James would always have a pretty room for his own all his life. Violet and her sisters declared often that now they felt like the little princesses they were living in such magnificent quarters.

Heaven only knows their thankfulness to God and also His Blessed Mother for the safe return of poor little Daisy."

"Wasn't those Glandolmians horrible," said Mildred as she tossed her hair on the bed in a manner that a policeman would scarcely approve of. "They are always doing disagreeable things to you good little princesses and won't leave you alone even when you ain't bothering them, even my own papa who is an officer notices it plenty and he told me quite crossly the other day that what he would do to Glandolmians was plenty if he had his hands on those kinds."

"They are dreadful and will score a one and score a one of millions of them and their leaders far better ~~than~~ beyond the pentance" but you know Our Dear Pleas ed, and had enemies too and He didn't deserve any" Jennie admitted. "I suppose it is the way."

"Well I wish it wasn't that way," said Dolores herself crossly "it's a wicked and very disagreeable one, and when it happens that they do these horrible things I always make me hate them, and I don't want to hate any one."

The re was a pathetic little quiver in polo's voice and Penrod hastened to say sympathetically I appreciate your grief in behalf of my sisters but perhaps you don't understand it's no wrong to hate all such such enemies who won't change their ways when they're lost and almost hell already while still living. I know that few if any of these glandelinians will ever be different. Don't worry about hating them. I do myself. I detest them."

"I suppose so," said Policar mournfully. "I guess they were born hateful to God. They none of them likes good people because good people love God, they only like wicked people, like the devils for instance, and hates you - states - when all the world should love them."

At this Jennie feeling better now since Daisy was back giggled and flushed a little too.

"I know plenty of what the Glandelinians like and don't like from my experience within their lines as 'Adaldefob' said Penrod and they can go to hell for all I care. My sisters are a 'too good' for them, I suppose and it's too bad about the Glandelinians. I'm not going to stand this business any more. When those prisoners are to be punished I'm not going to do it have it done publicly before my own followers but before the Glandelinian internment camp where by that example prisoners will learn what it is to molest one of my sisters."

"you are very good to you -sisters" said Argeline Jennings. and I think you sisters love you better than you true sweet heart loves her beau, Miss Saunders says that once when you were gone for a week they were never them selves and even when you were looking for Daisy they became dreadfully frightened about you when it was so long before you returned."

"I would have notified them by phone," said Perrod "but could n't do so because of the storm this afternoon as there was too much static on the wires."

"Yes," said Jean Gaunde as she was the one too. "they did cry for you too Pen-rod before you came home with Daisy to night." But I don't think it was even any where fair for them to revenge and kidnap a little girl out in the open when she was not doing any harm to nobody. Oh Prince if you little sister could only have a happy life than this I know it would be good. They don't deserve this no matter what any body says, and surely God doesn't will it either." Pen-rod's face brightened. It was always a great pleasure to him to hear his adored little sister so praised. "But they haven't got the nice times they should have only sad times, and it's best if they had been born thirty years late before this, after this awful war when probably the very thing would be all right" Colonel's said in a good aggravated tone, and when the army get into action they'll have to face other horrible possibilities and begin unpleasant things all over again. Oh dear how we do hate it all wish we could suffer with you. Why is it as boys and girls out makes the enemy afraid of us and you little girls despite it is said you are angel possessed they are not one tiny bit scared of you. I don't see why all the wicked people have all the nice things, and you dear sister have all the horrible ones."

"But surely we have lots of nice things" said Joyce soothingly "just think of all our toys, and we have so many that we often even give them to the needy and good ones too. Besides suffering they always say sanctifies one. I and my dear sisters have a very good government too you know. We even have even so much nice things than most people have, for every body loves us, and there's our dear mother and papa--every body says our mother and aunt are the loveliest and goodliest ladies in the world---and there's our grand pa and grand mother too, they are very good too."

"No they let you do every thing you want to" asked, "I'd - ed.
"We can't say on that because we never try to do every thing we want to said Violet giggling, "no one needs to make us go to bed early every evening because we need to and only we relate when military business hampers us - we have to do night spy ing and scouting. But mother worries a great deal about us and we can't blame her for - we love her so very much. We love Mrs Jerry too for you know she was mamma's nurse when she was a little girl."

"But just the same I wish you could be the same to the enemy as we are," said Mildred with a sigh. "The enemy would be afraid to molest you little princesses then. I should think the possession angels would make you worse than we are. I often went out ~~scouting~~ scouting alone and six Glandellians have men fled from me. I wouldn't mind seeing you little girls do adventure against the enemy so much. If you could make the Glandellians scared of you, but they always go at you and it's horrid."

you also love to dance. I'm sure you're going to be that way when you dance. The music is all like this. I like you know put in Argentine cheerfully. Where I'm glad Daisy is back and Penrod too. It sounds as if another thing is coming. But we don't mind. There's something and like to listen to them. Mam - Mamma he self wants us to have nice times, and to go to lots of good parties again, the way we used to before our peace and happiness died. Oh it was great those days. put duty to country first. If you count my goes before the enemy we go with it and that would be bad. And dear mamma and Auntie are so pretty and so sweet that every body loves them."

"They are the prettiest women I have ever seen," Argeline Jennings agreed. "But you little Princesses are their equal. I've heard it said that lots of all of the boys and girls counts too would like to sit and look at you, and so does Tim and Walter, Stu and James too."

"I'm glad that every one here any one has such good opinions of my sister -"
 "he said because I love them so much not for prettiness but because they're all more glad good than they're good looking, yet I must confess I like a young man and Grace - as she came to see me the other day say that there is no boy in the world as lucky as I am (in having seven little angels for sisters - he called them "Seven little cherries").

"Well I know quite a number of boys and even girls who do admire you little sisters very much" said Angelina A. Orsborg herself. "You know your dear sisters have given me quite a good large photograph of themselves and I have put it into a big frame and where ever I have my headquarters I put it there, can see it all the time. I've even seen my own Uncle General Conventinian A. Orsborg and also Uncle Hanson looking at it every time they came into my car what you may call nursery", and one morning, saw Hanson himself standing in front of my picture ever so long, and when, spoke to him he didn't seem to hear naturally I put my hand on his arm to make him look around, and then he jumped like anything, and when, asked him why he kept staring at the picture of his little nieces all the time he got very red in the face but nevertheless laughed and said;

"Why not. They're sure worth looking at all right I'll tell you."

"It's too early for supper yet," said Jimmy hurriedly. "What shall we play for a while." He had noticed how Daisy still looked and was anxious to make her herself once more as quickly as possible.

"I don't care," said Argelina. A-mo-nu-b-g. Indifferently. Violet proposed the letter game, but though Argelina and the others consented, and even little Alred who didn't know and let Jennie teach her how to play, the interest soon flagged, and before they had finished the first game, Mildred pushed the letter away, saying that she couldn't play any spelling games even if she could learn to play them right as she was too upset from what happened the night before. (In fact if the glamekinsians didn't do to Violet and her sisters what they did, they wouldn't find boy and gl-lacouts so fierce as they were, and now they were w-ec. Very time something happened this way, the husbands of p-lacouts had vague f-ur-r-a-s-a-n of boy and gl-lacouts might crush on them and plenty of h-u-c.

Violet and her sisters looked a little distressed.
 "Let's play something else then Violet suggested, as she gathered up the precious letters, and put them back in the box."
 "I guess we would rather talk before supper," said Angelina Antonberg. "I don't feel a bit like playing this afternoon so late and besides I want to talk to you and your brother about something. Do you think we might shut the door in case of a fire? It's something very private."

Penrod, and also his sisters were every much surprised, and not a little curious as well, and therefore asked Penrod to close the door which he hastened to do, and then came and sat down by Gertrude Angeline, who was looking both so rid and excited...

"It was something Radcliffe said," began Angelina Aronburg in a rather unsteady voice. "It was this morning before we were set out on this search and have I have been thinking about it all the time ever since."

"Tell me about it" said Penrod in a tone of deep interest.
"Well it was just after breakfast, and I went into the pantry for a drink of water up adcliffe and Mildred Manning were both there, and Mildred said that something was wrong that you sister Daisy should be lost 666 when she should be angel possessed. I told her she was mistaken, and that you said that you had evidences of her being only lost. He said she didn't care what anybody said, and that she felt sure that little Daisy had been kidnapped. She spoke very disingenuously about it, and declared that she was going to press the search with all her might and prove it was true because she said none of the little girls could lose themselves knowing the country so well.

I told her then that I'd tell you, and she said it would be too early for probably you would not have believed it. He then walked out of the pantry and I took a drink of water because I was very thirsty indeed. Then I said with a shrug of his shoulders, "Your dear friend Penrod better be doing something for his sisters to prevent this in the future and not put up with the wicked tantrum of the enemy or some direful thing will happen to the princesses, for, know, spying on the enemy as much as I do, just wait till the enemy get a good and started, and see what will happen. I guess you won't have long to wait from the looks of things. Those Glandelinians are dangerous, and have spies more clever than I am keeping a lookout for the poor little angels. Daisy and Mary were warned in time. I was so angry and scared, I wouldn't stay there any longer but when I asked Mildred Manning what advice meant she said she was too horrified to tell." An Angelina Aronburg Angelina Aronburg paused to note the effect of her story. Violet and Harriette were looking very grave, partly scared, while Penrod took Angelina's hand and squeezed it sympathetically.

"Do you know anything about the plans of the Glandelinian general?" Angelina Aronburg inquired after a pause.

"Penrod shook his head.

"Not any of their plans just now," he said, "but I never been in the forelines for some time."

"They are very cruel," said Angelina Aronburg with a catch in her voice. "Oh Penrod I don't want the Glandelinian spies to get at our sisters. I don't want to see as she burst into a passion of tears, it showed evidence that another storm was beginning to come up as Violet and her sisters had said. They were distressed now, and Penrod himself had both arms around his little cousin in a moment and was kissing and soothing her as best as he could.

"Don't cry don't cry please don't cry," Penrod pleaded the tears of sympathy and fear streaming down his cheeks. "Why you don't even know yet that it really is true. My papa and I am so fond of them, and we are so good, we wouldn't let any one be cruel again to them. Why a whole big number indeed thousand of Glandelinian prisoners in the internment camps will soon see a spectacle they'll never want again, and will be a warning to them. I wouldn't let any one do the dear little girls any harm."

"Little Daisy was carried away from you--you couldn't help it, oh you couldn't help it then," wailed Angelina Aronburg, "you never could that time. Mary and I had spied on the enemy of ten before this happened and she told me all about what was going to happen but I couldn't believe it at the time and yet wanted to warn you and it happened before I could. Oh it was terrible."

"But I'm sure I would have had her home last night if I had known she really was captured," said Penrod truthfully. "I didn't know anything about it and though I thought she was run down by some thing on her bike and was taken to a hospital. What if that so sisters?"

"Yes indeed," said Violet, "and all the hospitals were so desperately called up. We did not have the slightest idea of her being captured. Captured not even all the way until Penrod gave us the details after she was brought back inside the bundle and he not knowing it either."

"I don't understand how it could be done when she is so angel possessed," said Gertrude Angelina mournfully.

"Probably," said James just now speaking in, "I have an idea why. The angels may have known what these spies were up to and allowed it to happen with a design to cause their capture."

"May be so but I cannot understand it," said Angelina Aronburg. "Oh Princesses dear how lovely it would be if this cruel war was far a thing of the past and we all could again be together in our lovely home in Angelina city. Oh Mary, you are so good, more good than you are so nice and pretty that you don't deserve this. I'm sure it isn't a curse. Blessed Lord too to see all this. If this wasn't going on we could all be so nice and happy."

Before Penrod could answer some one knocked, and then turned the handle of the door.

"What in the world are you 'Heavenly child' doing in here with the door shut?" inquired a well known voice, and to their surprise Catharine Lee, an unusually bright color in her cheeks, and still wearing her uniform hat and jockey like uniform jacket, came in followed by her sisters James and a number of other also wild red Manning, the two saunders girls and Susan Renshaw.

They sure showed more joy in seeing Daisy than words can describe, and then Catharine Lee gave one glance at all the sad faces, and then he himself charged and she added in a different tone;

"Why what's the matter with you little girls here. You all look like little angels who have been lost from Heaven by straying out and losing your way back. Has anything happened?"

"Your Angelina Aronburg is very unhappy about us," said Joyce solemnly. "Unhappy about you dear princesses, poor good boys. Get rude Angelina but she will surely tell me all about it!"

Catharine Lee had hastily thrown aside her uniform jacket with the remark, "We are sure having lots of rain" and then sat down on the sofa between Penrod and Angelina Aronburg and she drew Angelina to her side. At the sound of the sweet sympathetic voice and the touch of the kind arm around her, Angelina broke down once more and burying her face on Catharine Lee's shoulder began to cry again as if her heart would break.

"It's about something Mildred Manning said," she sobbed. "He says the Glandelinians are going to per poster the Princesses with spies like they did within the camps at de procession ville to get them."

There was a pause, one of the bright color had gone out of Catharine's face but her arm had tightened about the quivering child and when she spoke her voice though low and not quite steady was kind.

"You sure are loving to your dear cousins to feel that way about it and to be so unhappy. Is it really true?"

"It is true of course it is," said Mildred Manning he said, lifting her hand and speaking rather indignantly. "Those spies are dreadful things. I've known of them all ready and my followers captured two of them this morning in camp. We have notified all city authorities to arrest every stranger that enters here."

"Oh Catharine, Catharine, don't you think you mind persuade Penrod and James not to let it happen?" said Angelina Aronburg. "They can do so very much. He likes his sisters so very much."

"I might try," said Catharine Lee smiling "but perhaps it would not be necessary to do so."

"Oh yes it would---I'm sure it would," said Angelina eagerly. "Oh dear Catharine do love them very much."

Penrod grinned. "You funny little girl," he said kissing the flushed tear-stained face of his tenderhearted cousin, "how could spies get into this place. No stranger can get in without passes, and such passes to this place is hard to get there's a lot of red tape. I've made up my mind spies could get into the city even now so I believe. But if they can they can't get in here."

"But suppose one or two of them could get in on one condition, what would happen then?"

"What kind of a condition?" inquired Catharine Lee.

"The condition that they would steal a pass from Jennie's purse who issues them."

Oh what a good chorus of laughter went up at that question.

"Steal the pass from Jennie's purse?" said Penrod. "Well I wish they would just try it for the fun of it. If any one of you wish for a good experience I'll let one of you dress as a Glandelinian girl scout or boy scout and sent you over to get a pass without permission. To rob her of one. How about you Jennie dear you've experienced at such things?"

"No," said his sister Jennie. "I'm angel possessed Penrod dear but let the Glandelinians do it. I'm not tired of life."

"There you see Angelina dear," said Penrod. "There is no Glandelinian can do what my sisters can do, and she won't take a chance in disguise. If a Glandelinian wants to steal a pass into this place well he can go ahead."

"Come one may assault the police one who has a pass," said James. "No danger," said Penrod. "The one to whom the pass is issued is a proper police guard all the way over here."

"Oh Angelina," cried Catharine Lee half laughing and half crying "Don't you understand what Prince Penrod means. No one can get here without a pass and get one without a commendation. He means how Susan Renshaw's father had such a hard time to get one to her and yet he is well known too. Violet and he he dear sisters are safer than you think. Oh Angelina are you not happy now?"

"Happy now," repeated Angelina Aronburg, still more what bewilderment. "You mean that it's true--that no spy can get into here." Catharine Lee who now had an arm around her and Penrod too and was hugging them both tight only nodded.

"But how can it be," said James in a way. "Jennie's purse is so young and delicate"

It was believed that these men, already damned spies had made some one the object of any suspicion, malice and revenge and it was a suspicion too many carry and it was also feared of that they might have something to do with little Daisy's disappearance. One soldier said: "These little P-rincesses are too good to be treated as they are from any of these Glandellians. They are patient and good, not making a call for killing, no matter what they suffered, always blessing and giving good words to God, they even have themselves at any risk of danger, decreased the wounds of injured enemy soldiers. We can blame the leaders of the Glandellians for the harm and continual abuses of the P-rincesses, and every one of them as bad as those P-rincesses that the P-rince has captured, they are all confederates and should be made partakers of their misdeeds." It was not until about two hours later that the officials on the Tribune who had examined the P-rincesses put a detail from a phone call of what the P-rincesses had really done. That caused the P-risoners to be more closely guarded until the time of the court trial shall on the morrow.

The afternoon came. It being two o'clock. Before the little girl trial was to come and Penrod told the P-rincesses before the first local session of the court shall which was held within the camp and not the city was to indict them on the same substance, that they were not only enemies to God and die to be of the Christian camp, but that they were charged with kidnapping one of the little P-rincesses, the youngest one, and outwitting her in contempt of the law of the Abbeinnian P-rince. They were accused of making commotions within Christian encampments by their spying work and had won a party of real foreigners to their own most wicked and dangerous opinions. Then proclamation of a manumission was made for one who had been a witness and who had said he knew the spy well with the golden teeth. He was asked if he knew the P-risoner with the gold teeth and what he had to say for the whole cause. Then stood forth the witness and after having been sworn in said: "From experience I believe I have known this man for some time and is one of the vilest spies ever captured by any one. He neither is a good P-rince or people. Holy custom and law of any nation, was an international spy as many governments want him badly, and to try to carry away with his purposes had done all he can to possess everything to drive Christianity off the earth by helping the enemy in this wicked way which he in general calls a good cause and yet knows it is a wicked one. In particular, once overheard him affirm that Christianity and the customs of our country of Abbeinnia could not be reconciled to anything Glandellian. By which saying he told he did not only condemn all our holy things for the sake of God, but us in the doing of them and wishes taken as the King. As to the other man next to him I have no great acquaintance with him, but I desire to have full knowledge of him, however, this I know from seeing him an hour ago, that he is not a Glandellian, as a foreigner, making himself pestilent for his deed of serving wicked Glandellia as a spy against us, and he is one of those who had a hand in the kidnapping of P-rincess Daisy. He has some writings on his persons which I could not make out as it was too high for me to reach. At first, what has happened you would ship, is to show that even spies operate within the Christian lines and even kidnap child men for their vile purposes. The third, the old man, I know not, but I heard him say that our Holy Ones and our people should be brought and such by which the whole world could not be pleased with, which saying of him my Lord you would ship very well knows what necessarily then should follow according to the plans of his generals, that we foolishly worship the Vivian P-rincesses as little goddesses, goddesses, that they are the wickedest little girls on the face of the earth, that they only pretend to be good and are not that they and Glandellia shall be damned. The fourth fellow I have known of a long time, I and my fellows have spent a year in trying to capture him, and because we knew he was a spy by hearing him speak of things that ought not to be spoken for he had often visited our noble P-rince Penrod, and had said Pezzebub ought to be in his place and had spoken contemptibly and with blasphemies of God and his most honorable families, with all our good nobility and had said to me once, 'That if all men were of his mind, if possible, there is not one of these noblemen should have any longer being in the nation, and that the Vivian P-rince should have been hanged upon crosses and burned. Besides he had not been afraid to curse you my Lord, who are now appointed by P-rince Penrod to be his judges, calling you a dirty Christian dog with many other such like vilifying to me which I'd block with shame to any with which he had befriended most of the good gentility of the whole nation. His name is not good.' I the others, I do not know, but they also had a hand in the spying work, and are accomplices of the ones who kidnapped P-rincess Daisy." When this man had told his tale the judge directed his speech to the P-rincesses at the bar.

"Though Thou vile renegade, and traitor to your own country being foreigner, has through heard what this honest soldier and gentleman has told against them, you deserve to live no longer but to be slain immediately upon the place, yet that all men may see our gentleness toward you let us hear what vile renegades like you have to say."

The P-rincesses only remained sullen, morose and silent. Another man then stood up and when sworn in said:

"These P-rincesses have done things which are diametrically opposite to Christian Christian virtues. If I say unless I am ready here to make my recantation. That the P-rince who had those gold teeth had said that the P-rince of this nation, his sisters and parents, with all the noble 'Abbeinnian of the nation its royal attendants, and the whole nation are more fit for being in hell, than on this world, and so the blessed Lord have mercy upon me if I can't even prove that he blasphemed that way."

Then the judge called the jury into session, who all this while stood by to hear and observe.

"Little ladies and gentlemen of the jury you see these men about whom so much great and up roar has been made in the encampments since the P-rince brought them in last night. You have also heard what these worthy gentle gentlemen have witnessed against them. Also you have seen and observed that they won't even answer to the accusations against them. It goes now for the court Marshall proceedings to proceed."

Vivian P-rincesses (except little Daisy, the three boys James, Tim and Walter, and Angelin in a rooming and Angelina who was filed into the jury box as solemn as if they were going on parade and took their seats. Penrod was called upon to first give his testimony as what happened on the first night and of his hunt, which Penrod did clearly and graphically. Then Penrod assuming his own authority asked little Daisy to stand which she did.

"Daisy dear, did these men hold you a P-risoner ever since you called for help on the morrow that night?"

"Yes yes Penrod dear they did. I called for help after they attacked me as I was riding by pretty wheel but I didn't know any one heard me. I began to be afraid no one heard and would the referee ever be able to help me."

Penrod turned to the judge who was Jack Evans. "Your Lordship and James heard the call that night. We tried for a long time that night but couldn't find her. We believed she had been injured or run down and we wanted plenty of P-rincess time calling up many hospitals but to no avail. He turned to little Daisy.

"And where did they keep you my little dear rest?" "In that good farm house shack half the time" was her answer and in other lonely houses. They bound and gagged me when they took me from place to place."

"How did they come to wrap you up in these?" and Penrod before the court produced the clothing she had been wrapped up in.

"They knew of your approach Penrod dear because one of them scouted and saw you and your column. I overheard the P-rince mark. That P-rince and his troop is hunting for the little P-rincesses. We got to get well hide her in the shack and full them. And they bundled me up in that after binding and gagging me and left me in the darkness."

Penrod glared at the P-rincesses. "How come Daisy dear that you were preserved from suffocation?"

"The bundle was not wrapped tight around my head and plenty of air got in."

"But what was the subject in kidnapping you Daisy dear?" asked Penrod. "Why did they make you a P-rincess?"

"Because at first in the dark they took me for you?" "You?"

"Yes Penrod dear the night I returned to your headquarters at General Hindenburg to return to you the plans which I had been seeking over to see how they would put them back in general Hindenburg safe and then put back in my jacket pocket a bundle of void writing papers. Those accounts must have followed me in the dark or have seen the bundle of papers, and mistaking me for you dressed as a P-rincess, they followed attacked me in a very lonely place and there came into a farmhouse and rode off after destroying my beautiful bicycle. They first demanded that I give up the plans, and when I couldn't because I didn't have them they choked off my cries for help and bound and gagged me and tried to knock me into unconsciousness but something seemed to stay them because they couldn't harm me. Then they first brought me to that log cabin where because I wouldn't tell anything after they discovered to that log cabin where because they almost stripped me naked, and tried to use knives on me who, really was they almost stripped me naked, and tried to use knives on me but through some reason couldn't dare touch me that way. They soon learned that the papers I carried were no plans at all but papers with nothing on at all. They were mad because they had captured me instead of you and bitterly disappointed in not getting plans of those things you were working on for us that is me and my sisters. They had kept me a prisoner for a while. They offered once when they saw they couldn't harm me to let me go if I would keep silent saying:

"If you promise to keep still about what happened to you and not give to your brothers and sisters and the Christian dogs and the military police any information about us we'll let you go gladly. We don't want you. It was all a mistake capturing you. You were the wrong person. But we are not going to let you go and set the military on us as soon as you get a chance. Give us your promise you little brat to say nothing, and we'll let you join your sisters and brothers all right hand you over to the Glandelinian army as soon as we get the chance." They were afraid of me Penrod because they saw by some unseen power they could not do me personal harm even though they were able to steal me away. I and you know why but it is not for them to know. I refused to give my promise no matter what the sacrifice for I did not believe it righteous of me just to secure my own comfort to let these rascals go unpunished if I could bring about their arrest. You heard me call your name pleadingly and came to my rescue. Put dear brother you sure gave me a very funny ride."

"I should say, did," cried Penrod, "but I did not have the slightest idea you were inside that bundle, I was too excited and distressed then over your disappearance to even think of looking into it. Did they treat you brutally dear?"

"Not after they found out who I was, what strange to them was the matter with me, and discovering I was a princess by looking through my pocket book. Of course they didn't behave very decently, but the reason they didn't do much more than they would have is because they couldn't though they were able to bind and gag me. They tore off my outer dress and my inner dress too but then something forcibly checked them and they couldn't even reach me with a knife they threatened to cut me with. They threatened to do to me the same that Glandelinians have done to little children before because wouldn't tell them where you kept your plans, and when I stubbornly refused, they tried desperately to kill me but even though I was bound so couldn't help myself, they couldn't approach me and they got scared. That is why when you were seen coming by the guards they then wrapped me in the bundle after gagging me and fled from the barn. Oh but how glad I was that you came Penrod dear even though you didn't know what was in the bundle when you suddenly changed your mind about leaving it behind and put me on your horse and tied me there."

"What made the rascals come back?" asked the Accusing Lawyer or what ever he would be called in a Court Marshall.

Daisy shook her pretty little head as she answered;

"I do not know. Maybe it was the storm. But I knew from Penrod's plot they ran into a trap and were captured."

"How did it happen that the Gemini and military detectives didn't find her?" asked Evans.

"I found out," said Penrod, "that later they had followed a false clue made by the criminals and they had been drawn miles away from the cabin. It was only by following the wagon or rig wheels that we captured them and if it was not for that she might not have never been rescued unless she could have escaped by her own efforts. I believe too," he continued with a dark look, "that my little sisters story is correct. He must have mistaken her for me, and the spy with the golden teeth and his accomplices had waylaid my little sister under the belief that she was I with the plans of something which you yourselves only know. My little sister had been attacked in a most cowardly fashion by seven very brave men while riding her wheel in a lonely place but within the Christian encampment as where it sure ought to have been totally safe for her, and then had been carried off by a set of men who were not Glandelinians but foreigners and who had no business to be serving in the Glandelinian ranks. Then they kept her in hiding a prisoner even after her identity became known and threatened her in a way of which I only know because it has been mysteriously revealed to me. This is the first time Judge Evans that my little sister has ever been attacked by foreigners, though that nationalities they represent I do not know, but I have heard here a paper that proves by their photographs in it that they are wanted in ten nations for spying purposes and for poisoning their victims in the bargain. And no matter how desperate was the pursuit and the sea-ch the representatives of these nations could never capture them. Strange men from other nations have come pestering my Father for the capturing of these spies, and even our own Government officials couldn't seem to run them down. I believe the reason I see it now I believe the reason the possession angels allowed her to be taken by them was the purpose to enable to allow me myself to run them to earth. To think of it a bunch of boy scouts under me capturing spies that ten nations couldn't capture. Well Judge what do you think should be the outcome. They have kidnapped my little sister and out raged her in a fashion which she and, even cannot tell you our best of friends as it is too terrible too shocking!"

"Daisy however had raised her little hand. He wished to tell me more. Let the little angel proceed," said Evans.

She then said;

"These men and three others for those many hours Judge were at their wits ends to keep me concealed when they found out what a stir and sensation and a general hunt my disappearance had created. The spies too were well supplied with money and in that small tight rig they took me from one place to another. They even took me through the storm last night too. They had usurped the use of the farmer's cabin and stayed there during the night because of the storm and they were sure afraid of the lightning especially after it struck three or four times close by. The ruffled pocket book, purposely dropped from where they put it as evidence to any one who may come in the cabin as my name was inside of it. They didn't harm me because they couldn't."

Penrod had now handed Evans the papers as further evidence against the spies. The three shot down were real Glandelinians. The paper itself disclosed the fact that Large "Golden Teeth" as he was called and his cronies had spied on other nations in times past. They had many names so it was doubted as the news said if they ever used their real ones or if they had any. They were also Confederate spies of the two more experienced International spies, who had a resemblance of

"Mutt and Jeff" The paper stated too that there was an unusual sensation and joy too when little Daisy was found, and a greater one when it became known the part the Glandelinian generals themselves had in her disappearance for in the mistake for Penrod. There were other spies who had been implicated in this but they escaped by remaining abroad. It came out during this court Marshall the Glandelinian generals knew the acts of Large and his companions in the spying crime and that the Glandelinian general also realized the mistake that had been made by their clumsy operatives. It was believed that this knowledge led to the case of why the Glandelinian army so far had been inactive, what had happened in brief was this. Manley and his Confederates unable to secure the plans of Penrod, had stooped to the sneaking of spies to the boy Princess place in Hindurinas part of the Christian lines to get possession of the information they were so desperately striving for. But thanks to Penrod's Indian like vigilance, power was discovered. He made an escape from Penrod's place but really got killed trying to escape from the Christian lines. The man tripped into the mud hole lost in the mud the plans Evans passed to him. They were never recovered and it was a wonder the man ever got out of it alive. Then after making a clever escape by dressing as a man Large tried again. He managed through being as a man asking to see a wounded soldier "he knew" to gain access to Penrod's headquarters, but couldn't for his life's sake find the plan and had to give it up. The attempt to way lay Penrod (which was a dangerous attempt to lay a little snake) and so got the plans from him he never carried them with him) had been tried before this only a mistake had been made and little Daisy was caught in the dark instead. Finding out their error these foreigners did tell the Glandelinian generals of their mistake by secret wire less telegraph, but believing answer that she was a more important capture still held her with the purpose to bring her to the Glandelinian camp as soon as a very strong secret escort was sent to get her. The escort came but too late, was attacked, and massacred. Then later hearing that little Daisy was rescued for such news travels fast from one camp to another Manley and his Confederates were surprised and alarmed and were secretly scared of their brother Penrod. As it was Large had little Daisy, was afraid to do anything to her, was afraid to keep her and was afraid to let her go though really as to say their prisoners became a white elephant on the hands of the conspirators and kidnappers. They had after seeing that the searchers of under generous Penrod were trailing them so rapidly checked off as spies, when she called Penrod's name, fled to the cabin wrapped her in the bundle, threw it on a lounge in the corner and then skipped from the cabin. The extremely wild fury of the storm drove them back for shelter, and believing after all no one had come to the cabin as they saw no one the rascals had done just what was really planned by Penrod, ran into the trap. Because they were International Spies it was hard to determine what the penalty for them was but it was up to violet and her other sisters to decide, even Daisy could join the jury too if she had wished even if it would have made the thirteen.

As bad as that happened to their little sister violet and her other sisters really hated to bring any one to a dreadful death and they had quite a time to really decide what should be done to the seven sound-rele Argelina. Argelina was chosen to speak first. "I can see clearly," she said that these men are not only spies serving the Glandelinians but they are also profiteers and wanted by eleven governments. One of them even for the sake of pay spied on his own country. "It is really just that we should say, away with such spies from the earth." "It wouldn't it do better to turn them over to their respective enemies whom they spied against in the other countries," asked Violet. "It is not necessary. I don't believe those governments could endure him," said Walter Starn. "If we do they may escape on board ship and make more trouble for us and those nations."

"Hang them. Hang them," said Jim. "They are so very scrubs," said Argelina. "Hanging is too good for them sound-reles."

The others had some other different arguments but Violet and her sisters could win. They had the opinion that as they were international spies, they should be given up to the governments who they had spied on, but the others insisted on what the sound-reles had done to little Daisy. Then Argelina Arrowburg said, "Remember dear cousins what the Glandelinians did to you in the past and which only after all your possession angels prevented by Natural and Supernatural means. Remember there was no one in any history or in any country that done to even Christian people what these merciless Glandelinians have tried to do to you and done before your eyes. Don't do injustice to yourselves, your sisters and your country by merely turning the sound-reles over to the governments who even don't want them except for punishment. They spied on us, stole your sister Daisy, and made Penrod for you and her sake go through storm and all to bring her back. Don't be too soft-hearted in this case as they don't deserve it. They know much more better for they're profiteers and have no business whatever in interfering with you or your little sister and Penrod for the sake of our Daisy and most loving God come to an agreement so we can be back in our June seats. Might have all the world and heaven given man I could not be reconciled to them after what they did, might as well be reconciled to the Devil and his wicked angels let us go with bringing him in guilty of death. You know a court mart shall must not last too long. It's against the law."

"Well," sighed Violet, who was always selected as the chosen leader of her sisters as she was always the most able and wisest. "I guess it has to be done." The force they were pronounced guilty, and the seven came to an end by being turned to death at the stake before the crowds of Glandelinian prisoners in the internment camps. All the way during the march to the condemnation place, they were slashed, buffeted, boy and girl scouts hit them with stones, nailed them and even picked them with swords and slashed them with knives at every opportunity. They were forcibly stripped naked at the condemnation place, hot tar and oils was poured over their bodies they were fastened on the iron posts, great piles of rubbish placed all around them, and then every thing set afire while big brass bands played any old tune or music to drown their terrible cries as the flames leaped all about them.

During the time of Daisy's disappearance the incidents occurred during the hunt for her in other sections of the country while Penrod and his posse were following the mysterious trail. Indeed thick weather was raging over all sections of Western California at the time. The spy in the forest lands of the hills nearest the Glandelinian encampments not far from Pandora, at that time California's worst and most notorious sanctuary of spies and Glandelinian military detectives lay under a down pour of rain accompanied by record breaking thunder and lightning in the darkness of a dismal night. A single poised mile high above the fifty nine mile expanse of trail threated scrub oak forest and pine too tumbled rocks and tiny green clearings would have seen no signs of human life except an occasional curl of smoke from the away backed mountain cabins. It had been since General Manley's army approached to near Pandora and indeed, morning after morning in this wild area, which was the worst of the Glandelinian spies, refugees spy child and child killers and murderous spy desperadoes, who ever since the enemy army was in sight had made this territory their fortress and hiding place, menacing the generals at Depressionville and Pandora and elsewhere. Elsewhere put on this particular recent morning after it was suspected that Daisy might have been kidnapped the eagle piercing the rain fog to the surrounding edges of plains would have seen something new and strange, something that had not happened in any time before. Files of men in uniform and broad brimmed red hats were approaching from four directions. There was the glint of rifle barrels and submers and all were on horse back, simultaneously from various towns not named here towns roughly surrounding this Pandora hill district came the various subdivisions of an army of two thousand boy and girl scouts. Before the morning had even passed they had reached the edge of the rugged hills and camped blockading all roads. The two thousand four hundred square miles of spy territory hid him in the to impregnable was locked up in a state of siege. The sickly sun trying to climb up through a cloud haze in the sky and the marching ceased. But a very quiet question tension lay over the Pandora district hills as hundreds and hundreds of shots began to sound. A few wagon loads of hawk faced men, tried to fight their way past the barriers. All were worsted and sent down to the towns as prisoners and for investigation. One dust covered wagon load fought through the blockade--its inmates escaped causing a heavy losses among the besiegers. Other wagon loads tried it, but were halted. All that morning and the next hour till noon the blockade lasted--then it was withdrawn, for good reasons, the spies were in great numbers and made a fierce and successful attack. Some however considered the elaborate attempt a failure after all in one way it wasn't. If it had not fulfilled its slogan, "five thousand dangerous spies dead or alive" at least the most spectacular spy raid of that time had smoked out and shot out and blown out badly wanted spies and days later more results began to show. A man called Floyd Tucker remained safe in the mountain fastness with his men of which he had one hundred and six time killer, and robber of two hundred and fifty Christian generals was king. And a new Clyde Johns, a Canadian spy and thousand times murderer of children with his cigar-smoking wife, Mildred Bonnie had the gotten through the blockade and had a clever tip and escaped just before hand, but Henry George and also a deeper attack and killing was driven from hiding a few days later and shot dead in a desperate fight with the Glandelinians. At the same time at another spot a gang of six men and three girls suspected at first to have had a hand in the conspiracy to kidnap Penrod and whose men had kidnapped little Daisy instead instead, and the attempted assassination of Violet and her sisters in the bombing of the Experiment shed just sometime mentioned was rounded up in a farmhouse near Mildred Manning town. Their leader was a man named Luther. A relatively minor figure Luther he took part in the gun battle that raged and they all shot their way out, all but Hines Johns who was fatally wounded and his young fourteen year old daughter who was captured after a struggle and sent to prison for life as a girl spy. Clyde Bonnie Shoemann, and Jack Evans she had a stream of the persecutors with rifle and pistol fire all the way creating terrific loss among their pursuers without a single loss to themselves, fought their way through a cornfield, shooting their way through the corn and getting away and leaving behind a great number of negatives, photos of Violet and her sisters in beautiful picture poses and many other things which no doubt they had stolen. These who escaped in such a desperate fight were sixty odd men with much worse records. Since the coming of Manley's army in this neighborhood the hills near Pandora had become famous for the hiding place of spies. Since the horror of the pursuit of the spies of Violet and her sisters from Depressionville all the way up to Pandora, the Daltons, the Kimes Brothers, Al Jennings, and Henry Starn, the James boys, and others took forth their great regiments of boy scouts routing from the ideal hiding country the spies, despite the fact that undergrowth, and little red boulders would hide a man within a few feet of a trail, and few roads which were every bad, capturing and killing many in conducting a terrific fight in which the loss was on the side of the fiercely battling spies.

None of these incidents a party of boy scouts under George Hamilton got surrounded by a posse of Glandelinian soldiers forty five miles from Appleton when they were hunting for traces of little Daisy the time she got lost. The Glandelinians were under Major Parker and Frank Weizer and mounted. They surprised and surrounded the boy scouts near a half covered ditch. The boy scouts at once opened a withering fire simultaneously from the ditch where he was hidden Henry Barrows machine gun spat bullets. The Major went down shot through the stomach and died the next day. The other officers fell from his horse his hip bone shattered. Before the surviving Glandelinians there were only ten of them out of forty could do anything the boy scouts then leaped for the ditch, join narrow and mount their horses, and the guard of soldiers saw the leader it was a girl. The mounted scouts turned and charged the remaining Glandelinians forcing them to scatter for safety. One of the boy scouts however was nearly captured through an act of treachery about twelve miles away from this scene. He had left the others after the Glandelinians were scattered. A pretty dark eyed little apparently country girl about his size stood by the high way near and seeing a boy on horse in uniform asked him for a lift in his horse to the next town.

The boy had asked her if she was going far.

"To Pandora if I can get there," said the girl.

"I'm going there myself," he said. The boy had said. He rode with him all that day and night making friends. He had noticed the uniform and military weapons he carried and as she gained his confidence, they halted and held to get practice on a side road the boy teaching her how to shoot. When she begged him to tell whether he was a Christian boy or not he admitted his identity and proposed that she join his troop as a girl scout. The chance of treacherous came while he was dismounted from his horse. A girl wearing a gray uniform as a Glandelinian scout leaped on the horse and fled—followed by a bullet which missed, notifying the Glandelinian that the thief was a town close to the Glandelinian encampments she acted as the decoy by riding slowly along the high way, knowing the boy would slowly follow with his new found girl friend to the claim his horse. He did and yet would have been captured if it had not been for the girl he befriended. The boy had a sack on his back and noticing they were hand grenades she suddenly seized one, and flung it at the party of horse men. The bomb missed them, but the explosion disconcerted the men, and the boy managed to have time to jump back on his own horse pick up his girl friend, hold his arms tight around the one who had betrayed him despite her screams and brought her prisoner within the Christian lines.

It was when the disappearance of little Daisy became known, that the whole Christian army boiled. From General Hindemine to the soldier the word passed "Find her at all costs." That had followed was a quiet get together of military agencies which had seldom acted as a unit in the past. One weakness of the system was its subdivision into separate jurisdictions and isolated local units. No such unit alone could cope with such a problem as that of the disappearance of little Daisy. Therefore the Gemini, the boy and girl scout troop, the military police and many soldiers agreed to act together and impelled special special military deputies and general officers calling out 1,000 members of the Vivianites in four companies assigned a company to each. The force across the Pandora territory a blockade unit was organized. When the Abbeinnian Department of justice agents interested in the spy nests because of generals being robbed and kidnapping of Christian children and other war crimes were assigned to each field expedition. And the nearby other sections of the Christian armies sent military detectives and the best marksmen. Day and crowded places were many towns and villages the time before the zero hour. Then at the last minute, a surprising word was sent out by wireless—the drive was off. That was a tragedy. The officials knew so large a movement could not be effected and organized without a leak. They wanted the Glandelinian spies who they suspected for the disappearance of Daisy to relax their vigilance. Long before dawn the blockade units moved from many points at once, sheltered by the blinding rain of the morning part of the all night thunder storm that seemed to have broken out that night almost immediately after little Daisy was known to be lost. The spots for the blockade had been previously chosen. On reaching them, barricades for many kind of traffic were arranged and signs posted.

"Halt. By the order of the military law."

A band of Glandelinian spies believed to have known something about the disappearance of little Daisy were caught by the blockades between a wide and deep willow creek. The Glandelinians riding their fast horses came within sight of the blockade. They seemed caught by surprise, but disregarding the shouts of "halt" they fought their way fiercely through the line of men and almost escaped but were followed by a barrage of shots. A number of them about six were killed, and every one who was left down. The spies however were of the desperate dare devil kind who knows no surrender. They allowed themselves to be captured alive and they fought on until they had no ammunition left, and then by using their fighting knives continued the conflict deeper until they were all killed. A solitary horse at the Normas live bridge near Normas rapids was found and it was believed it was one spy who had escaped. But later it was found he had met his death in the creek. Trying to wade across he was caught in quicksand and his help for help was not heard and he went under a few miles west of Pentaga. Near Pandora a hard fighting squadron of horse men got through—they seemed to have been led by two women, and the officers were inclined to believe they were some of the chief leaders of the spies. At all events they fought their way to safety celebrating their escape later by killing six State Military Highway Patrolmen on horse back near a prairie town.

To Violet and her sisters the capture of these seven spies and the unusual almost comical rescue of little Daisy was an event that made them sit up and take notice. The day after the trial and condemnation of the spies a newspaperman was able to prove before them and Penrod that these spies had been wanted by all sorts of agencies and the lives of ten nations for the last two years and never could be captured or even turned. Of course Penrod confessed that he had captured them more by chance accident than by intention at the start for he had only intentions at the time to find and recover little Daisy. Then not finding any signs of Daisy among them he even after capturing them had not suspected they had anything to do with the disappearance and not even knowing she was in the bundle had no inclinations at first of even taking it along. The only thing that decided him was that whatever the bundle of clothing was might come in handy for giving to some poor refugees and there for he had abruptly changed his mind and brought it along. It seemed strange too that little Daisy should be so waylaid within the Christian lines where surely of all places beyond even any man she should be safe from attack, and then carried off. When she was asked why she didn't even take some weapons with her knowing that as an experience before spies even within the Christian lines had beset her and her sisters, but she answered that she did, but that they had surprised her so suddenly in the dark and without warning that they had her before she could draw anything as quick as she was. They took everything away from her. Too she had been able to hear every word Tim and Penrod said when they were within the shack, and how she felt when Penrod discovered her dress and the bloody knife and thought that she had been murdered. He had not been able to call out a word because she had been gagged. She stated too the bundle had not been wrapped around her as tightly as supposed and had she not been bound she could have easily worked her self out of it.

"But it does seem strange," said Violet. "That you didn't suspect anything like little Daisy being in side the bundle."

"I'll admit it does," said Penrod in answer. "But how, I think of such a thing? The excitement of capturing those Glandelinians, and also by the violent afternoon thunder storm, and my anxiety because she was missing made me think nothing at all about the bundle. At first though Tim suggested it to me I objected to even taking the bundle along with me. Daisy can tell you that if she heard my conversation."

"Yes that is true," said Daisy. "I sure got scared for, wondered what would happen to me if I would have been left in that shack tied up and inside that bundle. I might have been there for a long time without anybody knowing it and unless something came about I might have perished. I sure was awfully worried in it too."

"I should say you was," said Penrod. "What clothes you had on were as wet as if the rain had soaked you. You see it was the angels that charged my mind and caused me to bring you along. After this any of you who go out alone better not take chances, and bring along a strong escort. Especially at night. At least I suggest that you not go out nights any more."

"We won't," said Violet. "Daisy's experience shows there is peril even within our own camp. But nevertheless Daisy's capture caused also the capture of the Glandelinians we were so long after and couldn't get hold of. But it is strange still that they took little Daisy for you Penrod."

"They were after my disguise plans," said Penrod. "That was the statement at the Court Marshal. But tell me the whole thing in a nut shell Daisy dear why did those wags tie you up in the bundle?"

"Because they were afraid to keep me, and afraid to let me free," she answered. "They got scared of me because thought they wanted to undress me totally (and she blushed at this) with the purpose to cut me up because I would not reveal you plans about the disguises. I wouldn't matter what they threatened. Then one of them was told to tear the rent of my clothes off, and he made at me as if to do it, but some how or other some unseen force held him back. Then others tried to use their knives on me as I was but couldn't reach me. They called me a little little witch and forcees, said I was using magic spells to save myself, and then one of them suddenly thought I was one of the Vivian girls, and told his comrades that angels of power possessed me as he heard we are in that condition. They were scared of me then, feeling that the storm was letting up one of them then placed all those heavy clothing on the ground in the grass with ropes at length under them and afraid to touch me used a long branch to roll me onto the ropes and coats. Then they were placed around me and the ropes drawn fast. Then they would not even touch the bundle, they rolled me into the car in all the way, and used a scoop shovel to lift me onto the couch. Then they dared me and left and I thought they'd never come back, but the storm was now making them come back for shelter. That is how you captured them."

"But I didn't capture them," said Penrod. "It was Tim."

"But I didn't capture them," said Daisy. "I heard every word. You are trying to make Tim the hero instead of yourself. You even shot the one escaping from the cabin for, know the way you fire pistols."

"But why didn't you try to do something?" when I lifted up the bundle like you did when you secured that soldier?" said Penrod. "I would have suspected then you were something was alive in the bundle."

"Then little Daisy giggled. "You go my dear brother," she said, "So you thought I was a young hog that would rush out as soon as you opened the bundle. You had time close the door so, wouldn't get away."

Penrod's face reddened at that but he grinned. "Well I'll admit that is true," he said. "Because the farmer reported the loss of two horses, a full grown one and a youngster. That is why I thought one was in the bundle. But you know what a shock I received when it turned out to be you."

"Yes said Daisy soberly." You looked as if you had seen me dead instead of alive. I believe you love me and my sisters more than we deserve."

"Don't say that Daisy dear," said Penrod. "There are lots of good things you deserve that you don't even get. The good are made to suffer the wicked to prosper. Never mind I smell something funny. The Glandelinians will run from you faster than they'll do from child scouts some day. You'll be the instrument of Glandelinia's downfall. They have the upper hand on you little girls now but I know they'll be a day of reckoning. We believe he went on that we are more spies who may have been implicated in your kidnapping and in addition to sending a strong guard to the Farmer's place to make sure he won't be molested since he helped to cause your rescue. Other men many of them hastily summoned from the nearest Federal Agency are sent to keep watch in the vicinity of the lonely cabin. They have orders to arrest who ever approaches, and a strong relay of the men are provided so that watch can be kept up night and day. Besides this other men from the Military Secret Service and the Gemini are scouring the country around the locality of the cabin, seeking a trace of two other persons whom the farmer testified were with you kidnappers but who had been seen accompanying the pig. If those rascals are to be found, they'll find him. I've claimed the bike where it had been left for evidence, and the captain said that it is not damaged beyond repair and he'll make it as good as new for no charge at all. He can easily replace the parts which is missing and repair it as it was. Meanwhile there is much to be done for us. I'm going to strike hard for what has happened, though Daisy dear you look pretty and more sanctified since it did happen, and now too you look as if you had an adventure after a while with mentioning that shows it by you. Little Daisy Dear never theless during this time the Secret Service men are still busy looking up clues which might lead to the finding of the main leader of your kidnappers who has escaped so far and will keep watch in the vicinity of the cabin. Every section will be guarded night and day so no spy can come around here to do further damage. Also an investigation is being made by Dargan and Gale of the Universal Gemini Society of Pandora, though nothing yet can be proved to link secret Glandelinian spies within their members with the outrage. Gale and I are though states that the case is true, and too bad Rodney Graves whom Dargan can depend on is in Pandora Abbeinnia just now on Government military business and cannot be informed. But all this takes time even though the waiting is wearisome, particularly in the case of this main spy leader whom we know as M. Nesto. No further trace of him can be found, though every effort is being made. He is dangerous sister, a Gemini of the foe to say and for Heavens sake watch out for him. Our troubles are not over as long as he is at large, and I'm beginning to feel sister's dear that my boasts before you of my enemies having to get up very early in the morning to get ahead of me is premature to say the least. No apprehend that someone and the rest of his followers we will have to work hard. I am determined that there will be nothing lacking when it comes to the main test, the Government is ordered to help me at its best and not only to make sure that no enemy further tempter with you my dear sisters but to take pains to see that none can even come within Pandora of that nature to mar anything. General Jackson and the other men of the Gemini are helping to the best of their ability, and Tom Swift suggested to me some improvements which which not are only incorporated in the case of your safety and happiness in the future but in the apprehension of all rascally spies in the future. As to say sister a dear one of the puzzles of the Gemini Secret Service men had to solve was that of the connection if any between the men who had anything to do with the kidnapping of you Daisy, and those who had tried to kill us by placing the bomb that shed which exploded and blew up the engine while we were in the place. That there is some connection I am certain myself but so far we cannot work it out for it does not seem possible for us to do what the government men cannot do. We have gone through lots of tests since the war had started especially you little girls. I had and you have done well though the severest tests of them all. That I was informed recently was that this thing that happens to you little girls really is a big test also on our very government. We will have to complete something for ourselves to make safety more secure for you and have the situation refined to a point where even Dargan's critical judgement will be satisfied. All that remains now positively is to give Dargan and others a chance to see how brilliantly you follow us can do the proper thing, and to this end every thing will be done to capture M. Nesto and his followers. I'd like to put a silence on all these Glandelinian spies and make the same example of M. Nesto as has been called as had been done with the others who kidnapped Daisy. My plan is to perfect the disguises I have made and in them we can trail the spy trick him and capture him. If we can do that we can demonstrate to the enemy how dangerous too we can become if, unless continually sick his spies on us. Then by some contrivance we can also do some thing else better for we could surprise Manley and his headquarters and get away with a lot of goods. I only wish however that Susan Farrol could be here to see us go off. She was the one who really started me off on this idea so to speak, as it was she gave me the plan since she learned Daisy had been stolen. But Susan Farrol was busy somewhere at a far distant part of the camp to come to see that, which we could start doing to morrow afternoon, starting from the south end of Pandora. I'll start," added Penrod.

"I'll show you on this map what route we could travel on."

"That suit's me," said Violet. "If we can do all you say we can do und as much as I believe we can do we are sure will be your debtors as we are sure are for the rescue of little Daisy."

"Well we will see," said Penrod with a smile. Preparations were made with the greatest care and Penrod went over every detail of the proposed pursuit twice to make certain that they would understand what he meant, and made sure too that no one was over-hearing what he was saying and be able to do something to thwart him at an unusual moment. But everything was all right, and finally the expedition was started all being in their new respective disguises. They also wore soft silent shoes so that no matter where they walked no sound could be heard. They didn't this time go on their own horses for that would give them away as they were well known to the enemy. Penrod speeded the expedition up to almost the last notch going down one of the city's main big wide streets, and having a party of Angelinian boy and girl scouts coming with them as a covering escort to prevent mishap or delay in case they again like before came unexpectedly upon a party of child scouts or even cavalry who would mistake them for foes.

"We are doing fine," said Penrod.

"Wonderful beautiful," said Violet.

"It's just too beautiful for words," added Jennie.

"Would have believed it possible," declared Joice.

"Yes but we will have to have the final test when we enter the foe lines if we can," added Argline.

"Not so soon," declared Penrod. "Don't do anything, until I give the proper directions. We cannot tell what M. Nesto is in the foe lines or not. We have to first make a minute examination of the hang out of these spies, but taking the chances to go among them in their hill recesses and pose as spies."

"You idea is fundamental and simple," said Catharine. "Put won't it be very dangerous?"

"If we know our onions it will be so simple in fact that it will be a wonder we have thought of it before," said Tim. "It's the last word in planning something against the enemy, but we must not apprise the enemy of our approach until we can fool them into thinking we are of their side. But we will have to serve those spies really for a time though in order to fool them. Then we will have done some of the Prince."

"I'd rather than you say that after the test is made," replied Penrod with a laugh. "Are we ready to start on our journey?"

"We have no more," said Violet.

"How about you James? Do you want to chance a day or two within foe encampment or with those spies in the hills?"

"Oh I'm ready to go with you Penrod. You can't start too soon to suit me. But isn't the danger greater on our own side of the view. Remember the Gemini, and all military are striving to capture and destroy all those spies and if they succeed we'll also meet disaster."

"I've got my plans against that," said Penrod. "The whole party started off. They have sent silently as before and the first good impression of our intentions was a confirmed. Even as they were moved along the secret court racks as if on parade there was hardly no noise from their covered horse. Penrod had taken the van; for good purposes while Tim and the boys were behind his sister, and the escort in two columns on each side. All eagerly watching James was there to find fault if he could, but he was glad he did not have to.

"The plan ought to work perfectly Penrod," he said. "My report cannot be otherwise than favorable."

"You haven't been in too much of a hurry," said Penrod who had learned caution to a full extent from his Indian friends over in America. "I want to continue on past the houses for several hours. Sometimes things like this will work well at first, but defects will develop when we least expect it. I'm going to do my best to have the horses make a noise with their hooves by running them all full speed. All ready? Go."

But it seemed impossible. The horses went onward as fast as they could go, and no sound came from their hooves. They could ride any where at day or night and never be heard and discovered. The day too was hot, and the sun shone. Only they hoped the horses wouldn't be another thunder-storm to make their plans.

"Of course this is not the prime requisite," said Tim. "But it is a good one. What we want is to be even able to approach neutral enemies at night without being heard, and, I think we ourselves can do it--in fact I'm sure it will."

As they continued on it became evident that the test was going to be a success. The afternoon passed, and it began to grow dark but a glorious full moon was up.

"Shall we turn home now," enrod asked.

"Not quite yet. I thoroughly enjoy this and it isn't often I get a chance for a moonlight horse back ride. Let's go a little closer if you please and we will see if we can attract a little of the attention from the people in the houses. We'll see if we can possibly find out if they hear our horses, though I don't see how they can."

And they did not. They even went past a park where a big crowd of women and children and old men still remained because it was a warm night. Though those on horse back passed only fifty feet from them, not a person not a person was aware of it for no body looked that way.

"That settles it," said Tim. "You have succeeded Penrod." But Penrod was not yet satisfied. He wanted a longer test. Hardly knowing why he did it he continued in the direction of Angelina's home. He heard a horse gallop across his lawn with the rest, and saw in the moonlight that she and Angelina were walking in the garden. They did not look in their direction as they passed and were totally unaware of their presence unless they caught a glimpse of them after they passed in the distance.

"It is perfectly wonderful," declared Walter Starling, and he spoke in ordinary tones that carried perfectly to the ears of Penrod and the rest. "Wonderful indeed!" cried Tim. "It's the best invention in the world. Yes, it is. Don't tell me it isn't."

And no one did.

Then Penrod and the rest returned home and discovered their disguises. Penrod intended to stop but a minute to assure his father that every thing concerning his plans was all right, and then return to his sisters to help them set the table for supper. But when Penrod sought his father in the library he was told there was a visitor in the house.

"Penrod," said his father. "This gentleman is from a Government Agency from Angelina's mother. He wants to arrange as he says for a government test of your disguises. I told him, thought you were about ready for it."

"A government test," cried Penrod. "Show the man in," he said turning to an orderly.

A tall elderly looking gentleman was ushered in. He was dressed in a Governmental uniform, very very high toned to say and wore a magnificent hat.

"Well, Prince," was the genial greeting. "I have come to tell you that the favorable report made by my friends and myself as to the performance of acted in the capturing of those seven spies, the death of three of them, and the rescue of you sister Daisy has been accepted by the War Department and the Government as of the other nations who had been afflicted by those spies is an achievement beyond measure. These nations wish you reward you, and so has our War Department. And I have come to ask what you wish for a reward."

"Penrod rose.

"I have my reward. The whole world hasn't money enough to buy my love of little sister Daisy. He is my reward," he said. "What--what?" faltered the Government agent whose name was George Andrews. "Why I understood--you don't mean--they told me you sister went through a storm and bad weather to rescue your sister and capture those landlubber spies. What gives you this reward?"

"I hope I am not mistaken," interrupted Penrod with a smile. "And when I say that I have all ready been rewarded by having my little sister back with me I mean just that. What gives you reward could expect."

"You must," faltered the Government Agent. "You say." "-----"

"I mean," went on Penrod, "that the greatest achievement of capturing those men and is the best reward I could have wished for. A whole Nation hasn't what I and my father have so what reward could we expect."

"Oh," said the Government Agent. "Oh."

And that was all he could say for a whole while.

After the man left surprised that Penrod refused the reward Penrod went to help his sisters explaining to them that he had been detained by a visitor. It was not until supper that Penrod and his sisters went out into the beautiful moonlight.

"Every thing looks enticing now," said Violet why a shy curious look at Penrod. "Let's sit on this bench in the garden."

"Sure plenty of moon light here and we can talk, and--and--"

"I'd just as soon," said Penrod quickly, and soon they were seated, he in the center between the beloved prisoners. "That's the case of the little girls we once saw of him but Violet herself had shown herself on the ground. Now dear Penrod," she cried pointing a finger at him. "What did Father say when you asked?"

"Before Penrod could say the word on the end of her tongue, Jennie suddenly almost roughly by accident clapped a hand over her brother's mouth and cried:

"That bush. It moved. And there's no wind. Joice and Angelina jumped from the bench and ran toward the bush. Catherine ran in another way. But it was too late. Some one was seen leaping a fence and he got away and was out of sight."

"Another spy," gasped Daisy. "My goodness Penrod I'm glad Jennie stopped you from speaking."

"Let's go inside in our reception room," said Violet. "No body will bother us there. We will place guards under our windows and guards whom we know."

This was done, and the guards were Tim, Nell, and Angelina, Joice, as well as James and Walter standing under the window. They knew the command. They didn't need to ask. It was short first and explain after wards.

"Father said," began Penrod. "That none of us must go to that spy camp for any thing. It is dangerous almost to suicide."

"None of us?" Are you sure?" In her excitement Jennie looked serious. "Did you say he said none of us must go there?"

"Penrod nodded.

"I cannot help it sister," he said. "I did the best I could. But Father was so scared as to be almost cross. He says it is not the danger from the spies themselves in case they cannot detect us, the real danger is even to suicide is from our guards and if they clean up the spy camp as they are trying to do now and see us among them, and us in disguise they'll think we are the decoys and we may never get a chance to prove our identity and something may happen that will be terrible. The father is right. Let the spies try it on us. I don't care a mite about that part of it. He says we ought to stay home for the time being in Pandora and take a vacation from the military work and not bother any more about the spies as long as they do not bother us. As long as we are main within the city we'll be safe as no more spies can enter. I'll stay home and help Mrs. Jerry in the house, and Father, and go forth with the instructions with the boy and girls. And then we too can go to school again while we have a little chance. We have had no chance going to school for a long time and here we have."

"Penrod said," said Jennie solemnly. "That would be a good idea but even if we went to school and continued to learn things where we left off, would it not happen that spies would steal the reward? But Father knows best and for all the we'd we wouldn't care to risk anything that he fears and objects to. We would not cause him any more worry and sorrow. He had enough when poor Daisy was missing. Oh dear, did you tell him about Nestor or Nestor?"

"Penrod nodded.

"He said that he'll be watched."

"Did you say that Nestor and many of his followers are still at large?"

"Yes," said Penrod. "But he thinks Nestor cannot get into the city."

"Cannot get into the city? If not then who was that trying to listen in on what Violet was going to say?" asked Hattie.

"Could it be Nestor?" asked Violet.

"Oh dear," cried Angelina, while a tea-half way down her cheek got lost in a dimple which came out unexpectedly. "That makes me think the spies will rather us even if we hide over in James' room. My called the United States. But did you tell Father about the letter we found from a prisoner who had been captured to day which they stole from our Aunt?"

"Yes, I gave him the letter and that made Father angry. Angrier than anything yet," said Penrod. "He said that Aunt Ann was out best Aunt and he could not see this happen even to her. He said she had educated us for many good things, and she had done so too, and the father showed that we should decide on that was best to be done but keep away from spy camp for Heaven's sake. Then I told him that while we were to remain in Pandora until the army advances again we could be sent to school. If we wanted to go to that great child-rene Catholic school that is opposite the beautiful Church we always attend Mass. until vacation season starts."

"Till vacation starts. Penrod did Father say which vacation?"

"Why the vacation that starts this year this coming month of June. It did not make any difference to him; what is it?"

For Violet was rolling over and over on the floor screaming with laughter. "Oh Penrod dear, Penrod dear," she cried, "come on, come on quick." She got to her feet grasped Penrod by the hand and asking her sisters to wait for her she hurried with him up the stairs to their room under the eaves. Before the big mirror which hung in the angle she paused.

"He pulled from a drawer a wig of hair some of that which she generally wore but which formed the same as the hair she had on her head now and plumped it carelessly on Penrod's head.

Look," she cried.

Penrod and his sister looked into the mirror, then turned and stared breathlessly at each other. Penrod had not in his surprise removed the wig and still being gazing into the mirror they could not have told each other apart. Penrod though a boy almost looked so much like Violet that with the wig on he was a twin.

Penrod donned the wig again and looked, and Violet stood there and looked. With that wig on Penrod was as like Violet as one nodding Pansy is like another and just as good looking. One day Violet had long light hair but parted primly and braided in two braids because it was so warm. Usually she wore her hair loose and in beautiful little curls. The wig was the same fashion and color, Violet had big blue eyes with twinkles in them. So had Penrod but no twinkles. Violet had a small lovely tuft up at the corners of the mouth. So had Penrod. Violet had dimples on both cheeks and so had Penrod. On his dimple was much slower in coming than Violet's. The noses were perfect on both. This was the first time that Violet and Penrod found it impossible to tell each other apart and for a moment he did not realize what it meant. Violet drew a long breath.

"We can do it," she said to him looking at him now pleadingly. "If you are not ashamed to dress as a girl like most boys in the countess are?"

"Oh is that so? Well what is your game?" he asked with a grin, giving her a good hug and kiss and holding her long. "What is your game little creature of Heaven?"

"Do you object to dressing like a little girl?" she asked for he held her tightly though in his embrace she sure felt happy.

"No just tell me the game."

"We can do it," she said. "For with that hair on you have we'd be exactly the same. The plan came to me a minute ago when I remember I caught you once putting that on before supper to see how you looked in a wig. Well find out what the spies will go to school or not against us. If you dress as one of my sisters we'll leave him at our place acting as 'Penrod' staying home and we'll go to St. Gertrude's School. Then you'll be with us in disguise as one of our sisters. Then if we are a pestered you'll be the surprise of the school. It's not that the splendid idea."

"Yes indeed you hit that to the mark. Of course we can and of course we will. Just say when and if and why and so forth with the dresses and things and I'll try it out on Father and see if he can tell who I am while you stay up here. We just got to get a good education and this is the only way until the army moves. We'll start in to-morrow. I'll wear what ever clothes I put to me and Tim or James which ever the two wants can pose as me and stay behind. We'll tell mother and sisters all about it of course. But we won't need to tell Father. We'll spring on him a surprise. And maybe your plan will cause the capture of Mesto for I believe he'll pester us even in school. But how about my voice. It doesn't sound much like a girl's."

"Put some girls to talk with the sound of boys."

"Well I'll try to learn it."

"Father said he knows about the plan," said Violet happily for Penrod was still holding her lovingly.

"Well Mesto won't know anything of it. We'll have it for our secret between you and my sisters and the two princely boys. Oh Penrod but it will be fun."

"What will they think?"

"Who?"

"The child-rene who goes to St. Gertrude's school."

"Why Penrod dear they won't know. We were so often disguised no one knows us in the city very well. Penrod dear and we can go together as we are then for we need not disguise when going to school. From the minute we begin to school we'll be having good times, and you can assume the name of..."

"Who?" cried Penrod now almost excited as his sister.

"Jose Mary Vivian," chimed Violet.

"What is my middle name?" asked Penrod.

"You can keep what you have," she said. "It's a good Saint's name."

"You can keep what you have," she said. "It's a good Saint's name."

"You can keep what you have," she said. "It's a good Saint's name."

"You can keep what you have," she said. "It's a good Saint's name."

"You can keep what you have," she said. "It's a good Saint's name."

"You can keep what you have," she said. "It's a good Saint's name."

"You can keep what you have," she said. "It's a good Saint's name."

Every thing that possibly could had turned golden as it seemed that warm early May morning. The city was bathed in bright sunshine which to day was unaffected by any forest fire smoke because a strong westerly wind was blowing. The army encampments were also busy.

To make it appear as if they didn't know too much already Violet and her sisters and Penrod chose to be in the Third Class Girls' Grade. Children in school rooms in this country are always good, quiet and well behaving but this time they couldn't help wriggling, and twisting and buzzing and humming. One of the girls even giggled and a freckled boy near her ducked his head and at first jumped away from a window in fright. Then it couldn't be helped, a sudden wave of laughter rippled across the room.

"What is it?" asked Sister Mary Ann. "It's somebody's old black horse," cried one of the girls almost giggling at the boy. "I guess she wants to come into school. Sister, she's sticking her head in the window."

"There was another ripple of laughter this time. 'It is my horse,' said a sweet blond like voice clearly. 'And I expect he is lonesome for me though how he followed me to school I do not know.'"

The sweet voice belonged to one of the little beautiful new girls with the this time beautiful yellow braids which nobody knew, but which all that time none of the children could hardly keep their eyes away from especially all the boys.

"Are you Angelina Vivian?" asked Sister Mary Ann.

"Yes I am."

"What is your horse doing in the school yard?"

"It is not my horse it is my father's. (Violet and her sisters did not reveal they were princesses yet and so were not known). 'Because of the war we had not had a chance to get to school for a long time as we I and my sisters here are girl scout leaders and instructors but we need our own kind of education. My Aunt and Father and big brothers think so. But I do not know how the horse came here some body must have carelessly let him out of the barn.'"

"A glad whinny from the horse finished Angelina's speech. And there she was stretching her long black head in the window toward her. The Sister herself couldn't help smiling. It looked so funny and the children all giggled.

"I'll let you off Angelina so you can bring back the horse," said the Sister almost laughing. "She'll distract the children, and too you father may miss her and think she is stolen."

Angelina obeyed. Slowly she led the horse called Mildred up the street toward home. It led across a bridge past the big white Catholic Church on between beautiful beautiful neat houses till it joined a new street in a slant direction which led away into their town Street where their home was. Finally when they came within sight of home she drew a long breath, and looked at the saddle. Her quick eyes detected that the horse had been ridden by some one. Old Mildred tugged at the bridle.

"I'll be home," cried Angelina. "Who rode you two days the school house...? Of course you shouldn't ask you that, a horse cannot talk. But why come to the school yard and interfere with my schooling Mildred. You take a drink here while I look at the saddle."

While she looked at the saddle a man riding a fat brown horse came up to the water-tough. He was an old soldier-an off ice with white hair and shaggy white eyebrows.

"Oh ho what are you doing with you horse?" he asked. "I thought you were going to school for a while. Don't mind my voice Princess for it doesn't seem to belong to me."

Angelina looked up. Then she smiled for the old soldier's eyes were dark and merry like a boy's.

"I like it," she said, "but for years ago I can't call me princess here. For a while I and my sisters don't want it to be known. We don't want spies peeping us in school."

Then the old man did chuckle---the guff at kind of chuckle.

"Why are you not in school with you sisters?" he asked. "Father made a horse than school eh?" and he again chuckled.

Once more Angelina told her story. "But I never thought after some one rode her and got off that she would look me up," she cried.

"So it's your father's horse and somebody rode it?" I like the name of Mildred for a horse, and I like you and your sisters for you are as good and as brave as you are beautiful. How long do you think you'll stick to going to school?"

"Oh I'll stick to it as long as I can," laughed the man. "I'll tell you what I'll do so you won't need to go home so quick. I'll give the horse a good place "to stay in my barn up there all evening," he said, his hand on a door handle and then a small city hill just outside the house. He said at last, "I'm William Father-William Brown of the Parish here, I'm the Pastor but I'm also in the army. Despite that being a priest, I've a nephew who goes to your school and is as anxious for schooling as you and your sisters are. Look out for him, Angeline. He is or may be a little girl and if he sees you you can't get him away. His name is William called Billy. Know him?"

"Has he got eyes like you and you?" cried Angeline. "And find a freckles?"

Father Brown threw back his head and laughed—a big guffaw laugh. "Biggest freckles the good sun ever made."

Angeline went back to school but she went up to the sisters' desk, and this time she whispered into the teachers' ear, and then the teachers assumed a surprised and yet respectful attitude and nodded her head yes, and Angeline took the phone and called for a number.

"Is this Father?" she asked.

"Good little angel yes," she answered.

"Did you see your horse and leave him in the school yard. You did not, you not even give orders for his use. Oh I see. Well, and the school room of child and that he sisters looked surprised and a little alarmed. "Somebody says that horse and I found evidences as was being him along, that who ever rode him was thrown off the saddle. Yes, I know, she went on, "You know as are trained so no one else can ride him. Yes I've got the hat of the fellow who had him for me, found it in the street. The horse was in the school yard. Find out from the man in charge of the barn. I'll hold the wire."

The news a few minutes wait and then came some more information over the phone. It lasted several minutes in which it was noticed she looked grave. Then then she said, "Yes Father. Sent a detail of boy and girls out over here as soon as possible."

"To to the surprise of the school room she said; sister something is wrong. I'm going to have the whole school house searched by boy and girls out."

"All right Princess," said the Sisters. "As you will."

Then Angeline turned to the class room and looking knowingly to her sisters said—

"We are known any way even though we tried to keep our identification to ourselves. I'm Princess Angeline Vivian, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Vivian. As she spoke an awed hush fell over the school room and the other daughters and my sisters. A spy stole Father's horse and that is how he came to be in the school room. The spy by this hat," she held it up, "is a man. Don't get scared though, as we are secretly armed and can protect you from him. If possible we'll have him captured if he is hiding anywhere in the school. This hat belongs to Mr. George Nestor, the very man we want."

Hi "Hi Princess Jennie. Princess Jennie."

A long shrill call, half whistle, half shriek brought Jennie to a stand still. It was her second morning at the school with her sisters. He was running just as fast as she could down the hill from Father Brown's having said he respects. He knew the whistle behind her belonged to the priest's nephew, Billy Violet had said that morning;

"What ever any one of us do, Jennie, don't turn Billy Brown down. He's been such a good boy to us even when he didn't know what we were. If you do, you'll break his heart. He's got funny loud ways of calling some one but he's sure a good boy."

That she and her sisters had seen of toys in school here made Violet and her sisters more than ever adore the boys. That they had done for Violet and her sisters cannot be told in detail here. When he overtook her she looked at him. Yet some how to day she didn't feel a bit like herself. She was so worried about the spy. Besides too, Billy could help her out. Though he was dressed as only a school boy he was a very secret captain of the Vivianites. And if there was anything she and her sisters liked best of all was the toys who served as scouts.

"In a hurry, are you not Princess?" Billy was saying. "Gosh it ain't late yet, you got twenty minutes. I've got some news for you. The time for the May Queen celebration is coming."

"For this school it isn't until the last Sunday," said Jennie. "To him she spoke exactly like a celestial angel and he felt awed at range in her presence. That's a week and a half away."

"Huh, that isn't long," said Billy. "Not when you have got to get ready for it. Such things as the M.S. will think of or think up you never heard of. What want to know is do you want to join or don't you?"

"The M.S.?" said Jennie.

"Yep," said Billy some what bashfully of course for her presence still awed him and made him feel queer. "The Mysterious Seven. They are seven of you when we do not count the other sisters of yours for she is a twin. There are a mother and a sister in it, but you and your sister can be in it if you want to. There are a chance of being more girl than boy, but I'll do for two, and the others will be main out for you. Thank you." Billy grinned. "Oh don't let my dear mother call Jennie. I'd much rather not please, but some one else out of it if they were going to be in before me and my sisters. We would never think of that."

"Just as you like, of course," said Billy respectfully. "We are still the M.S. because S means Six as well as seven. Asked you caused you said you wanted to be in all the fun while you have a chance to go to school before you father's army advances."

"I don't mind," don't want to be any mysterious seven if it makes us put somebody else out," said Jennie.

"But they would sacrifice for you."

"I know. But just the same they are just as good as we are. We may be princesses but we don't snub any one or put ourselves above any one. They are as equal as we are any time, and they deserve the fun too."

"Just as you say," said Billy. "It is little girls like you who shouldn't have enemies any where. No wonder you and your sisters are so beautiful in looks and every thing. You are so good. Well then some girls will be looking for you soon. They're a little funny perhaps but you'll like them."

Just here Jennie and Billy turned the corner, and were run into by Billy's Uncle Father Brown. He was puffing along like a tug boat on dry land as the weather was very hot.

"Well bless my stars here you are Billy," he said. "I was just looking you up. But if Princess Jennie got you in tow I guess you're on the road to an education into heaven all right."

Father Brown smiled at Jennie, but her beautiful eyes seemed to be looking right through him and she smiled back. And her eyes were so strange and angelic like, and there was something so peculiar and almost supernatural about her that he was almost as awed of her as was Billy. She was some what sorry however when he had gone on his way and Billy after politely bidding her good bye till after school had gone on his way with some boys who paid their respects to her. Her sisters had gone on ahead. But she had scarcely had gone on ten steps alone when she was pounced upon by three little girls, who lovingly dragged her along all talking and laughing together. Jennie knew them at once. The head headed one who spoke so plainly that you could understand every word but who always giggled as if she was happy and cheerful no matter what happened was Norah Joahan. The Brown-eyed, curly poly one was Polly Anna Sebastian. The one who called her Poly Question box. A taller, fairer one whose hair was fluffed about her face and tied with pretty blue ribbons, was Mary Anna Mildredson.

There was such a babble of talk, which sounded like the Queen of the May, the movable Sacred Heart, and other things that Jennie was not sure of any thing until she found herself in the school room—the center of a group of excited boys and girls about Sister Mary Anne's desk. "We've brought the sweetest angel of the school," cried Poly Question box. "And we have told her all about it—And she'll be the Queen of May." "Will you Princess Jennie?" said Sister Mary Anne eagerly. "Say yes, Jennie, quick," cried Norah pleadingly. "Why I love to act things," said Jennie, "but my sisters could do no as well. They are as good as me and—"

Violet and her other sisters surrounded her at once. "You are going to be the queen of the May," said Violet, "decidedly. We have decided that ourselves. You have had never so good time, you've got it worse than we have and deserve something good for once. And oh how we would love to see how you look. You're so pretty already why you'll hold the whole audience in the procession. Spell bound."

"Do you really mean, should do it?" Jennie caught her breath. "You must you must," said the whole school room of children. "We won't have the procession without you. You are chosen."

"But what do you mean, the queen of the May?"

"Why you are so pretty," said Billy himself now coming up. "That you could act as the live Statue of our blessed Mother. It'll do her great honor and honor which never had equalled, and you are so good, so good surely it would be the greatest event in the school."

"And the procession will be given from the Church and back," said Sister Mary Anne. "And I'm sure you'll bring more love to the blessed Mother than ever before."

"I'll try to do it," she finally said. "I hope they would make a mistake and think I'm here," and she giggled.

"I've always wished I could help our dear blessed Mother in something," said Jennie that night, when she told Father and the others all about everything.

"It will be just splendid to join such a beautiful procession," said Billy.

not to act as King of Abilene. His Uncle Father Penrod is so planned--polly would have taken part in anything before Father Penrod believes it is because I and my sisters have held him spell bound. He is in love with us something. He thinks we are little angels like the rest and is a little scared of us too. He told Teen (going to be Columbus and Tom and Paul are going to be Kings of two other Christian nations. Polly and Laura and Norma are heavenly court ladies. I've got to wear a train--

"There's a beautiful blue dress upstairs in your mother's trunk" said Mother Jerry, which would fit just like that. "The very thing" cried Jennie happily. "You'll help fit it to me won't you Mother Jerry. Don't make me try to fit it though. The beautiful big heavy beads of Mother's and the shining jeweled pins will be good on our fingers to show as our Blessed Mother does the Graces that she bestows upon the whole world."

"I'm glad you accepted to do that Jennie dear" said John. "You are the prettiest and most worthy with the best one of us all."

"You and my other sisters are just as worthy as I am" said Jennie decidedly. "Please don't say that, and I hope I myself won't get more honor than the blessed Mother does when, poor as he when a little girl in the procession. If they do I'll tell them something. When I'm the little queen of the day I want to forget all about Jennie Vivian, and think only of her and our Blessed Mother."

"But why didn't you also join the Mass" said Angeline. "It's going to be a beautiful church service they'll begin to know we love others only and not ourselves."

"And don't we. Of course we do. These six girls and I'll be the ones in it first and they were going to sacrifice themselves for me and you and my other sisters. I suppose if I had spoken of Penrod he Billy would have dropped out to let him in his place. Penrod this evening said I was right."

"But that'll make those kids love us more than ever!"

"Not that we'd now" said Penrod with his grin though he still had the girls make up on having forgotten to move it. "Please I don't want to hear it. You act as if you even have no pride for you yourselves at all. You are worthy of the love of your worst enemies (his brow grew dark as he said this) but they're too deep in the slough of sin to have any love for anybody."

"I can't help it though" said Jennie. "I can't see where other people are less than I am and my sisters do say the same--you know that's true Penrod." "You are right" said Penrod taking her in his arms. "But you deserve more happiness than you are. I love you. Remember me to my other dear sisters. They are possessed of angels, and don't think angels don't suffer and weep with you when things don't go right for you. Something will happen you'll see Jennie dear. You and my dear sisters including myself have won the children of our class but those of the whole school and the Sisters besides. The other Superior acts as if you are angels instead of little girls and is a little scared of you. You must look supernatural to her."

"If that procession comes on the last Sunday I hope it doesn't come no more" said Violet. "I'd hate to see such a good church procession break up."

"We could have it any way" said Jennie laughing as Penrod held her in his embrace. "Who is afraid of rain. And we all, all us kids could carry an umbrella and one could hold a good colored one over me. If it's a hot clear day we'll need them any way. I'll bet it'll be the prettiest sight ever seen."

"If spies don't interfere with it." said James.

At this Penrod laughed and said, "Let them interfere. They'll have some one to reckon with they won't expect. Evans is going to be there and when he is look out."

"That makes every thing so strange to me these days since we started going to school" said Catherine. "Every time we go the street in the morning is gold red or red gold, and gold red in the afternoon when we come back."

"We have noticed that too" said Violet. "I'm afraid it's some phenomenon."

At that moment from the kitchen came the sound of muffled snapping and popping. Suddenly Angeline, Angeline, Angeline with little Jennie burst in. With them came the tempting odor of hot popcorn.

"I'm going to take your father's lantern" Angeline cried and go to a store to buy some apples to roast. You take a candle, Violet my dear cousin and get me some butter. Guess we'll have a good supper to night."

But Violet offered to go for Geary and Gertrude let her while Penrod climbed the steep attic stairs. He looking as much like Violet as ever filled a basin with nuts. Then he crossed to the window to see if Violet, happy violet now was in sight. A big waving circle of light showed where the old bit lantern hung in a tree, and a swirling of rough and thudding of apples told that Violet had failed to find a store open to milk and get James permission and help to get some of his own apples from a tree. Then fun started that James believed he'll never forget in his life. It concerned Violet, and Penrod, and superstitious Abilene.

Penrod was about to call out to Violet and James, when down in the yard he saw something white and white. Into the square of light made by the kitchen window below came three tall slender figures. Two were dressed as Civilians and the third was a sort of Christian uniform. Each for some reason carried a sheet, but what the three were going to do, Penrod never knew. In his anxiety to find out, and to get ready with his pistol he leaped forward. In his foot hit the basin, it tipped, he grabbed for it, accidentally sent it flying and with a clatter of nuts it fell straight down and landed bottom side up on the step--the head of the uniformed man himself. He clapped his hands to his head, looked up, saw Violet in the window looking down, and then he glanced at the tree, and his "o-om" fell with a ring crash on the stones of the drive way. But instead of doing any of the things the man was expected to have done, he with a yell took to his heels, and with one startled look up and, at window, and then the two others flinging the sheets aside followed in panic.

Falling and getting up again, scrambling and scrambling, their sheets which they had covered flapping about them like some great white wings, all three disappeared afterward into the darkness just as some soldiers seen the fleeing figures and after crying "Halt" opened fire, but did not hit them. When Penrod came down hearing shrieking down stairs a moment after he burst in and found all of his sisters screaming--with laughter.

"Oh Dear Penrod, dear Penrod" Violet shrieked when she could speak. "They came only some joking men really men we know well to play a joke on me and when they came by the orchard they saw me up in a tree in a circle of light. That didn't frighten them any, and they came on, just as still, and then when you accidentally tipped the nuts out of the window, they saw me all over again up in the window. That was you Penrod dear, don't you see. They saw two men to Violet's at the same time--and I believe they think they saw double, or spooks--or something, for surely there is no little civilian girls who are twins. The jokes all on them. Oh Penrod why don't you laugh."

And Penrod then did laugh.

"To think of three men being afraid of me and you," she said. "That's the funniest sight I ever saw."

When James came into the school room the next morning with his sisters and Penrod too (in his disguise) Father Hardy, the superintendent of the school stood at Sister Mary Ann's desk.

"Here's a little coming to the Queen of May now," said Sister Ann. "Then she called Princess Jennie."

Jennie went to the desk.

Father Hardy is going to be the conductor of the May procession," said Sister Ann smiling at her. "And he wants to know if you will do it for another church too on the last of May."

"I--I--don't know," hesitated Jennie. "You see Father Hardy I can't act things all the time. Any one of my sisters deserves the honor too and it wouldn't seem fair for me to take part in everything and ;;;;"

"You are a first rate little queen anyhow," said Father Hardy, smiling down into Jennie's troubled face. "We all appreciate the fact that you are not at all selfish and think of others as much as you yourself. But you are so pretty that you would fit the part well well."

"But it wouldn't seem fair!"

"Jennie, Jennie don't" warned Violet. "You know what we told you. You really don't don't get the good things when you should. We ourselves could be something else some time. Do it for good Father Hardy. We'll act as your escort in that procession and do the singing."

"And I shall do it all night with me," he whispered to her.

"With me please, with me please," pleaded Polly Queen Fox.

"You promise me" said Father Hardy slipping her a wink through Jennie's. "And any how my mother is going to ask you and your sisters for the Feast of the Sacred Heart in June."

"I can't come to the feast of you at once," said Jennie. "But come to us. You'll have our company and besides under no conditions without necessary reason causes would I leave my darling sisters without their consent. Yes Sister then I'll bet the queen of May for Father Hardy too."

"All right," said Father Hardy. "Princess Jennie will be the Queen of May for me too, and you think Billy will be the attendant?"

"If Jennie asks him" smiled Sister Ann.

"And now what are you going to do about it?" asked Jennie that night after she had told her sisters of Father Hardy and others about everything every thing. "It doesn't seem fair that I should act the part and none of you my sisters act the second time. I felt like giving it over to you Violet."

You are so lovely as pretty as me. I shouldn't take the part twice and gaily, she had a complete collection of dresses and a hat

[illegible]

 "Oh! the people told him I ought to get married," she said.

hurry and everything, suppose. But the only thing to do child is to keep on going---I'm sorry I can't carry any more of you. Why doesn't the baby cry? Is there anything the matter with her?"

"Sleep," wailed Minnie as she sobbed and sobbed after the word, as she stumbled along.

"The sleep," said Harold. "Ist I with."

"If I only knew where you came from, and where you could be sent," said Catherine. "I wonder if they are really child slaves who escaped from some Gladiolusian encampment," she wondered to herself.

But there was another chorus of sobs mixed up with "Minnie" Harold, and the baby over and over again.

"You really mustn't," said Catherine. "Why if my good father should hear you, or the good boys at home, and my sisters too, I don't know what they would say. Let's play something. I know---I'll play I'm a little angel, and you are the little ones I'm guarding, and whom I'm taking to that big handsome home up there which will be like a heaven."

"House too big, too big for child slaves," said Minnie.

"Too big," echoed Harold.

"We'll play you are exactly the right size for it," said Catherine firmly. "One of you shall go into the front door first---Minnie, I think, and Harold then next, and I'll carry the baby."

But this distribution was no far from pleasing that howls again rose. It was a loudly weeping wailing crowd that finally crawled up the last hill of the street and turned into the yard of James and Germaine's home. Catherine was almost crying herself. He didn't even wait for the small flying figure to come down the stairs and from the mail box, even though it waved a letter at her, for she didn't see it. She pushed open the door, plumped the baby into Mrs. Jerry's arms, thrust Minnie and Harold into the big rocker, and fell on the floor in a breathless heap herself.

"Land of mercy," cried Mrs. Jerry. "What's all this?"

"Minnie, Harold and the baby," gasped Catherine. "A whole wailing kindergarten for you."

At this minute little Daisy burst in.

"Why didn't you wait Catherine dear?" she began. "I've been over to the letter box, and here's a letter for you from James and Germaine Vivian in one envelope,-----my gracious Harvonn Catherine whose are those babies?"

"I believe they are May presents," cried Catherine getting her breath with a laugh. "Minnie, Harold, and the baby-----please stop crying-----those funny hatted soldiers won't see you here. Minnie is for you Daisy and my sister Violet can have Harold. And the baby-----"

Here the door opened and into the hubbub came Eugene Vivian.

"What's all this?" he began looking bewildered.

Harold stopped crying. He crawled down from his chair, walked across the floor, and held out his hand to the tall stately gentleman and Monarch who just now was not in uniform but in handsome citizen's clothes.

"How-de-do," he said sweetly. "Fleath may I go in to your Tristram Thocking?" The poor kid thought it was going to be Christmas no doubt. When Eugene Vivian actually picked up Harold, and walked with him to the lounge Catherine gasped.

"So you have a letter from your two good brothers?" said Eugene Vivian, quite as if nothing had happened. Open it. Maybe they sent something good to you little girls."

"But first," said Catherine "what are we going to do with the little child?"

CHAPTER TWENTY THREE.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS BEGINS TO HAVE THE SADDEST TIME YET ON THE CORN.

"We will decide that after you have read the letter," said her father. "After you have read it to me then you can show it to Penrod and your sisters and the three other good boys."

Catherine had a hard time to study out the scrawling any old way without that looked like that done by a four-year-old child. It was not that their two big brothers did not write well, it was done so that in case the letter did fall into enemy hands, they could not read it, and besides it was written in poor English as a disguise, the two having had an English man do it for them. Catherine read aloud;

"Dear best sisters--"

"Dear best sisters and brother Penrod;

"I hope now you have had a few chances to let the enemy know it is time to be afraid of you since you have had plenty of schooling between times. I am sending you three small gifts. They are so beautiful and pretty, I am sure they will please you. I captured them from the enemy's lines. I know you will use and guard them well. What you do with them will again prove to us as you have always proved, what kind of little girls from Heaven you are, and whether or not I and Germaine may trust you with other important gifts. I am moving my army now toward El Vaso, and Germaine is advancing toward La Poloma. When we come back to see you and father as soon as possible we hope to see the boys who helped you to escape from the spies through Depressionville.

Affectionately yours.

Your brothers,
James and Germaine Vivian.
Your two good and loving Princes.

With many kisses we bid you good bye for the time being and we'll be seeing each other in about ten days."

"I just hate this war and readfully that it keeps our two big brothers so far away from us so long and so often," said Daisy. "And where are your three gifts I'd like to know."

"The three did you find these children?" asked her father suddenly, just as her sister came down with Penrod, and the three boys and gave a start of surprise as they saw the children, having been brought down by so much crying they heard. As best as she could Catherine, with wails from Minnie, and Harold, and the baby, Catherine told. After leaving the train the children had evidently come into the city in some military express wagon, and some how or other must have crawled off the wagon when it stopped some where and then strayed down the street until they were where she picked them up.

"Just like my great sons," said Eugene Vivian. He took up the letter from Catherine, but couldn't read it, and asked her to do so again before he started which she willingly did.

"Moving on El Vaso and La Poloma," said their father. "My sons have always been doing the most unheard of things. Enemy cannot check them anywhere. Yet they rescued and shipped these babies to us---it's a wonder they ever got here but they did."

"Father," cried Violet "do you mean---does the letter mean---that our two good brothers sent those three little babies to us?"

"Looks like it doesn't it?" said Eugene Vivian. "Well we'll have to take care of them."

"Angelina dear," said Violet suddenly to Germaine Angelina.

Angelina Vivian was mending one of her own uniform stockings at one side of the table. Violet was doing something with a piece of paper and a fountain pen. (not then)

...while, he would see - sliding down the haystack in the barn. The baby was crying...

"Well, Princess dear?" said Angelina Aromag.
"Do you think we could spare all the gauz-ampies we've been collecting?"
"Well," said Angelina Aromag again, as she thrust her needle with all the good number of us have besides yours, I should think we might. But shut on earth to do with with all your gauz-ampies, Violet dear!"

"I've been calculating," said Violet. "If I could take eight geograpies every single day for thirty days, I'd have given away to many of our school mates two hundred and forty geograpies, that's twenty dozen. The children on account of the war cannot obtain those well needed books any where and all of them want to study so they can also become boys and girls scouts as soon as vacation starts."

"But I'm not going to sell them! I intend to give them away. What do I need old money for? We get more luxuries than we need and Heaven knows we can do a lot for the war-weary and the refugees."

"Giving them to the school children for nothing?" said Angelina.
"Why yes. There's a good stock of them in our library, that many of the school children need. I saw one of the little girls come one Rose when we let her visit us stop in the library and look at one of the Georgaphies. It was a pretty one, and we can spare the Georgaphies, we got so many."

"But they are not alike," said Angelina. "Why on't you ask your father the King to buy a whole lot of them for the children of your school."

"I did, and father said that would pay ten dollars a geog raphy is not to be had. Many good books have been wiped out by big book stores in many various cities set by the enemy to destroy geog raphies and publishing companies too, so that such books are not to be obtained any where. Besides there are geog raphies of different grades, and I'd love to give all the children a present. All by myself."

the children in a peasant way by myself." Violet said that she was in the kitchen, Violet didn't like Angelina A-ombu-g. She knew Papa-o-v Ivan was in the kitchen, Violet didn't like the black was tied to the open door, and just then, Maria and Hla came in, in smiling as usual. Angelina A-ombu-g, and Violet and her sisters had to go to their bowls that they did eat, but not as very much and you'll see baby. But of course Hinda and he-o-old didn't back, and of course they did wake baby, and the air was so full of "hills and toes that had time and space" for an school and the gang-ophiles were formation. Violet then thought up something to play a little fun with Angelina A-ombu-g. Pen-rod had taken off his disguise as it was to use dressing like a girl, when Violet told him the plan and asked him to-----"

About a few minutes after dinner Violet and Angelina Aronburg were washing and wiping the supper dishes. Aronburg was out on the hill for purposes known only to himself. Jennie Aronburg was putting the babies to bed hoping to keep them quiet. Her softly angelic voice singing lullabies

"Garry Mary Queen of May" mingled with the speech of Angelina's husband.
"Angelina said Violet, softly, "Do you suppose we could have all the good and good photographs for the school children. We have company!"
"Garry do Angelina," pursued, both hands in the fish state, "to make hard at "Violet."

"why I thought you asked me that question before?" she said still looking hard at Violet."

"I've reckoned it all up," said Violet. "If I could live my twenty-four hours, I'd soon supply every child in the school with a bag of candy."

"I said before why not ask your father to try and buy a whole lot of them?" she said.

"I did not think of it as a violent way he can do things like that because as far as Goggs - a child can be taught in Pando - and too the way we have always been treated by school teachers - and the child has no nation where we went next he never needed to buy us anything since we were at school; besides we got so many gifts - unless I'd like to give them away, and also what would they do if we used the money we had to make a big attack, via a battle underneath in Pando."

"Well do as you like, you can spank the books all night, but leave the best ones for your sisters and you 'self."

"He, ha" it worked "said P. "I need to kiss sister Violet." Poor Robert made how she stared, but she never "I married her. The divorce is swell."

A few minutes later, Intar-Violet decided to try it on Jack Evans for he was sitting in the 1. lib. org.

Violet told Penrod to wait and then to see what would happen after two days.
If Penrod didn't recognize her and all would be well. So she finished kissing Penrod and fully went into the library. There was sitting by the table waiting for her a lot of letters - letters from her mother and father and other people.

"Oh Evans den " she cried "You have lots of eggs, raphies you can spare have you not?"

"Not now, I'll gladly give you some when I get hold of any Violet deans. Why do you want them?"

"I'll give you all I got in my own headquarters and never make use of them anyway," said Evans, "going into the Geography business."

"For a while," dimpled Violet, "you see so many children want to learn to be child scouts and they need good examples to study for that."

"They sure will need 'em," said Evans. "I'll bring along the geographical maps as well as a confid in my library."

A few minutes intervaling to speak to him in the library Evans again found Violet Vivian.

"Oh Evans dear," she said lovingly and respectfully "do you have on hand any great collection of Grop & Aphies?"

will tell you that Evans was red, and that was

"Oh, you - me I do," he said looking at her - so deeply, and wondering to himself "what she has gone better of all of a sudden."

"While + p. attended to lock up.
 "A whole lot of them in my library and so have my wife + s but not enough." She

"I'll give you them---I'll give you them," said Evans, "and give you thirty new ones in the bargain, didn't I say before that, would, then you can give them to the school children whom you love."

of course again P. n. o. d. had a good laugh and Violet said to herself "I guess before a poor person gets to be over forty books to me and then to P. n. o. d., disguised like me he'll think he is seeing double; just as those three would be joking if I did that."

would be jokes and that night. However, she thought he was fearless kept quiet. About one o'clock in the afternoon all the books were put into bundles and tied up with the purpose to have them brought to the school the next morning, but Violet didn't wait for the next morning but conveyed the books to the school house that early afternoon and they used to use the cartilage, going up and down and down, and eventually the little girls had begun to be asked to become members of the Mysterious Seven. They had accepted at once and was now a very active member indeed. This day itself was a brilliant blue and a glowing sunny day, the weather was liked. Violet hurried through her work sweat though she did and soon finished. Then on her turn she entered one of the stores and asked for a piece of wax that which she had wished to buy for sister Jennie.

The storekeeper was still thinking of Violet's magnificent eyes, when he could no longer believe his eye sight, for he saw her coming back. Her eyes were not and were no more dancing in time to the duple which came and went.

"The wa " she cried (pled) laying seven dolla rs and thirty five cents for Abbe's money on the counter. "The wa 's the money--and I want the beautiful hat for my sister -- right away please."

"But for the love of Heaven, little P., I must tell you it was sold," said the good woman, "and me it was sold," said Violet, for a really was here. "Why you have said, I just now came into the store."

"Put it in" said the sto-wan-ke-lan.

"Oh dear me," cried Violet, "why I just can't do."
"I'm sorry," but you can see for you self," said the store keeper. "I have"

But she shook her head, and slowly went out.

"Now at a range of that pool table in the hotel of 11-10-10, I saw a woman who was the wife a few minutes later when he told her all about the hat. Perhaps she wanted me to know she had the money for it, when any how I just gladly I would let her have the hat for nothing."

That same night after much sweet cooing and trotting and cooing, Hattie, Harold and the baby had finally dropped off to sleep. Violet slowly went down the stairs. In the living room at the foot of the stairs, waiting for her was Percy, but not so disconsolate now.

"Violent death," said Pen - and "I" - so so - but I didn't know you were going to the store. But anyhow you look as if you were - coming in. I got the hat for

707
 "I wish I could tell you what happened to Daddy and the other people out at the hospital when the children were, but Prince James the King wanted in a Camp Hospital now, wants to us who they were. The women this morning he used me and Violet of kidnapping the children and called some in terrible saying the children belonged to her. But Catherine picked them up, and it wasn't her fault either and there wasn't any one there so she wrote that in a big raid made by James and my son a big portion of the for lines confounding in the children were taken from a slave camp, and he sent them right on to us. But don't pay any attention if the woman comes round any where saying to any we kidnapped the children, for she won't listen to women, and think we did. She had come with the women to prove it after all but Father won't give them to her until we have the to demand an apology. But we are as upset now since our brother is wounded that we don't know what to do. Catherine wants us to come, but we can't go the way to Florida where the battle raged is impossible because it is impossible. And that's all."

"Not quite," said Empress Vivian. She came forward and stood between her little queenly daughters.

"Next year" she said cheerily. "I hope to see my little daughter as happy as than they they are now and no more of this we're going on and that's all."

"Not quite" said Emma - o Vivian. He too took his place among his beautiful little daughters. He was smiling, but his eyes looked almost as if if there had been no would be tears in them.

"It isn't every man who has daughters like mine," he said. "I hope that every father will be confirmed and that the every noon shall be the day that made the lives of my daughters so unhappy and full of trouble. Life has been a purgatory to them."

Two - and when they had returned home, and little wa-wold came out with a tumble head over heels, in front of Violet.

"How do you feel," he asked, getting to his feet. "Harris, I and the baby named some by train---" Harold became an engine. "Some by train on wagon," and he turned himself into a wagon when he came to a stop. Violet held out her hand to him and he took it.

"Well," said Billy himself. He stood up sturdy and straight and faced Jackie with honest eyes while his face turned red under the freckles.

"Now while I always knew you were a little Princess Jernie, I've got something to say. I'm just awfully sorry what the enemy have tried to do to you and your sisters, and I hope after all the Glandinians are all a big bluff as you say."

Oh. "Oh Billy" cried Jennie. "I'm not so - y-y---I never was so - glad over - y-y--- anything. It was all just adventure any way and it all came out so - be-you-ti-ful!"

and maybe next year -- just think of next year - Billy."

daughters as proper Omani decided to turn the children over to the women since she was able to prove that they were her own children.

"Well, you've got your wish," he said patting Jennie's head. "If a Jennie wadon shall have her child, she'll be turned to her to day."

"Oh," said Jennie, and there surely was no need of another word, for the radiant faces of her sisters were quite enough to convince Josephine of their gratitude.

"And can you send some body and tell Mrs. Madon she can have her children?" said Violet a few minutes later, wondering why the woman had

"Perhaps she may be hanging around somewhere" said Super-ovivian.

He left the room, but very soon returned with the information that the woman had gone home; the aide de camp having seen her walking down the street two hours ago crying as she went. The little girl began to look distressed again.

"O: couldn't you send some one to tell her?" Daisy said eagerly "she is so unhappy; and suppose she should do something desperate thinking she would never see them again. I believe she is punished enough for her part in this."

"I'll tell you what we'll do," she said "you and your sisters shall go and tell her yourself. It's all your doing any way and she might as well know it. When per sons don't act decently to you after you have done good to them good to them I'm not much in the habit of changing my mind about them myself. But we don't keep people that blow us to others. I'll order the trip and I will you myself down to the village and back before a ripple. I know where she lives for she gave me the address.....
 Fifteen minutes later, I left, and her sisters followed me. Once more we entered the smile was seated in the carriage and the emperor and his black horses were on carrying them rapidly in the direction of the home of the London. 2.2.222

798

It was in a white and quite attractive little back street of the city, before a small but prepossessing looking cottage, that Amador-Vivian at last brought the black horse to a stand, and throwing the reins to one of the well uniformed stable-boys----who sat behind----sprung to the ground and after helping his daughter out, lifted the three small children from their high seat. It was a rather noisy proceeding on the part of the great coachman, but he was calling one on one of the fronts of a place for the purpose of being heard, and the town children, when she herself should have come herself, and perhaps the very novelty of it caused the girl to quite enjoy the sensation. He set the children on ahead with the little girls, he himself being in up the rear point up a path bordered with clothes lines, and took knocked at the door of the cottage, which was opened after a short delay, by Mrs. Madon herself. She was quite a tidy looking person, but perhaps there was some reason for her unfavorable opinion of her character for she was a cold hard body, but her eyes were far from crying, and there was no doubt as to the fact of her being in real trouble. The true reason she showed no gratitude was because she had been told by some one, probably a gossip or an enemy of the little girls, that two of them had kidnapped her children and wouldn't give them back, and had hid them in the school. But she had by now received information of the falsehood of the story and was naturally resentful of her neighbors. She had not even known they were the Vivian girls she had heard so much about. She would not have acted that way. Parity it wasn't her fault, but Amador-Vivian had been so offended that he didn't see it that way. In fact he not known that she had only been fooled by a foe.

"Well Mrs Maden" began superciliously to the Irish woman, "and who now wasted time in unnecessary words in these times, these as you and who have wasted time in useless quarrels in the knowing my poor queenly daughters, and despite your act in of ingratitude for what you do to them have done for your children they have come to tell me that you may have your children, and here they are."

The woman clasped her hands and burst into a rather incoherent torrent of gratitude and blessing, in the midst of which Emperor-Myrian caught her up.

c ut her sho - t.
 "There's nothing to thank me for," he said in a harsh abrupt voice. "If you had not brought the proof that the child was not belonged to you, you would have had a very hard time in seeing them again, but cannot see my own daughter daughters unhappy ever over the trouble of an unworthy person as you showed to be and us they took it in their heads to forgive you despite your act of ingratitude you are closing back your child ren, and here's your record back, don't let them get set ar ay again, as we are not responsible if the children are not them again."

The four sent of Mrs. Madons Gratitude was immediately turned upon violet, and her sister.

Violent, and he - sister -
 "May the saints in Heaven bless you for ever, sweet little queen, and may you all never again know the touch of sorrow you - self, and it's P - saying for you we'll all be this night. In another month Pando - a won't have the wicked enemy you, and my husband Pat will be come home, save you've asked me all I can do - I could you, I didn't know such sweet little ladies were the Princesses the news papers talk so much about. I was lied too and some one told me you stole my child. I know now for I hold the truth and I am so sorry I spoiled your happiness after all you've done for them. But I was deceived, and poor little Frankie's so sick I could never get him out of bed however I tried hard."

"There are, the re - that will do" interrupted the re - Vivian who was hard pressed to day in his duties and had made even a heard for an official in waiting time to come here and bring the child - a himself an unusual thing for a monarch to do, and which none had ever did in any country before..

"We haven't time to hear any more -- I'm too busy -- come along my little "And wouldn't you be after stepping inside just to have a look at poor little Frankie He's awfully sick," said Mrs Madon. The other is all out play in the park." said Miss Sullivan "I'm awfully busy and can't stop. Get

"I do," said papa, "and you are responsible for him."

He was starting to go away, but his daughter said "I might please Mrs. [redacted] we might as well go in for a minute "violent" whips and "I might please Mrs. [redacted] and show her how no hand feelings, for having a attitude, and we'd like to see the poor little sick boy."

Very well do if you like, only don't stay long to lunch time. Here M. Madonn he added turning to the lady "My daughter would like to have, they have suffered enough, be careful that like to say a word to you - boy, they have suffered enough, so don't let any one of them don't get injured in the dark hall way of your house."

This information elicited a flood of words from the women this time they were expressions of pity. But Violet and her sisters were accustomed to hear themselves spoken of as poor unfortunate child and were not much affected by these exclamations and they accompanied the Irish woman into the house, and up the steps, into a tiny bed room room bed room, which struck the princesses as being very hot and close.

"Oh my dear Frankie dear!" began Mrs. Madon as she entered the room. "How are the seven beautiful little ladies coming to see you and it's princesses they are, good little creatures, and give a little gold and selfish is they be, but they is coming with good news to us this day, for it's a prince who brought them, and we aim to lose our three little children, for that's the news, Frankie!"

The only answer was a faint moan from the bed and the demand in a weak childish whisper:

"Give me a drink."

"Oh Frankie!" almost stated the mother, "You do be asking for drinks every minute all day, so much cold water and not good for little eyes."

"I'm awfully dry,--oh Mummy!-- do give me a drink."

"Poor little boy warm milk won't hurt him," said Violet pityingly.

"A little cool milk won't hurt him," said Joyce. "It is dreadfully to be so thirsty for a know what it means have been that way often."

Mrs. Madon left Violet and her sisters standing in the middle of the room while she went down to get some cool milk, but Violet and Jennie, guided by the sound of Frankie's sobs, for the sick child had begun to cry--speedily made their way to the bed side, and Jennie laid a soft cool little hand on the boy's burning forehead.

"Why Frankie how hot you head is!" she exclaimed, drawing back a step, and feeling greatly frightened, though she could not have told why. "Does it ache very badly?"

"It hurt a awful," said Frankie and me th-ot too; it hurt a all over."

"I'm sorry," said Jennie, looking with an alarmed face to her sisters as she asked one of the little hot hands which lay outside the sheet, "I guess I'll tell your mother to get a doctor before it's too late. Here comes your mother with a nice drink of cool milk for you."

"Frankie sat up in bed and held out his hands eagerly for the glass his mother carried, but when he had drained its contents with a gulp, he sank back again on the pillow with a moan.

"He's awfully sick," said Jennie anxiously. "Have you had a doctor to see him?"

"Not yet but I'll have one this afternoon if he ain't better, Doctor Andrews will come if he sees one of the children for him. He's a good man and kind to every body."

"Better get him at once" gasped Jennie. "Frankie has Scarlet Fever!"

"Scarlet Fever?"

"Yes yes Scarlet fever. My god woman where was he taken sick?"

"I never did see nothing so sudden in all my life," said Mrs. Madon. "He was as well as could be yesterday mornin' and it was only last night as he was took like this all in a minute."

"You should have got doctor Andrews right then," said Violet. "My Heaven! I'm afraid Doctor Andrews won't be able to see him now."

"And oh what will you father," said her sister the woman. "I exposed you good little girls to him and it's catching if you will every one. Oh oh I'm afraid!"

"Don't be alarmed," said Joyce. "We won't catch it (she said it a bit fully) we are immune from it. We have been exposed to it often and never took it. I guess said better go home and sent Doctor Andrews over. But I'm afraid it's too late. You should have got the doctor last night when he took sick."

"How old is he?" Violet inquired as she led Violet and her sisters down the stairs.

"Nine going on ten, and a fine big boy for his age. He never had a day's sickness since he was born--I didn't understand that a matter until he was at all until you told me, so you know Doctor Andrews!"

"We do. His home is on headquarters. We'll send him over right away."

Empress and Vivian was waiting rather impatiently as impatient as he ought to have felt, and Violet and her sisters hurried into the carriage. He was startled however when Violet told all about the sick boy, whose head felt so hot, and who kept asking for drinks every minute.

"It's a fault if he does," said Empress Vivian. "She should have got Doctor Andrews last night, and giving him so many drinks of that cold water only hastens the progress of the fever. You all exposed to him, but I need not worry for good reasons. Your little girls could never take a fever if you tried. The angels keep you immune."

He was very kind though and had drove them all the way home, and the the doctor was sent over right away to see the sick child. Before leaving, for the afternoon, the school Violet and her sisters each in turn placed their arms around their father's neck and kissing him heartily said to each other:

"Oh you don't kind good papa," can't we tell how happy you often made me despite our trials, and how much we thank you? I really think this is the loveliest day we ever had. I wish we could give you something, more than our love and kisses and good deeds, you've made us so awfully, awfully happy."

The next day great was the excitement in the Third floor grade class when the school room was found to be prettily decorated in honor of the only of the way Procession the coming Sunday, and then also it came out that since the members of the whole school class had been busy putting up many flower decorations and many colored flags, draping also the Abbeysman national flag like bunting, and hanging pictures of the Sacred Heart of Our Lord and also that of Mary in the midst of a beautiful circle of flowers.

"But how did you happen to?" cried Sister Ann, her cheeks as pink as the Carmation flowers. "I saw a had brought her."

"Violet, and her sisters," cried the three proud little voices--Lucas, and No-nahs and Pollys.

"Oh now," said Violet, "indeed we didn't. Sister Ann didn't even come to school until just before the ball. I myself only just said I thought it would be a good plan for the MS to do something special. The other girls bought the things and I, a mother helped, and her sisters, and Pollys mother, and even Father John, and Father Brown."

"It needs somebody always, to think up the lovely things to do Violet," said Sister Mary Ann.

"Pshaw," cried Sister Mary. "This isn't half of what Violet, or her sisters can think up. Now we can think up the other sisters have when they get it started, just you wait until this afternoon. Princess Violet has made up a whole play--words and all, and the M.S.s going to give it."

"My little girl helped me to get it up," said Violet, "and so did my sisters."

"For that good purpose Sister Mary," excused them from school, and told them to hurry home to get ready for the play, and to get into the very best clothes they could find. The M.S. itself stayed, with locked doors, to make a few last important arrangements. Then the boys and girls dropped back into the room the stage was all ready, and on one end was a tiny round table, it was white clothed, lined with bunches of beautiful roses, being set with dainty little cups, silver-spoons, and the dearest little tea pot, the vivian girls loving tea even though they hated coffee. But they liked tea as it is without milk, cream or sugar. They hated sugar in anything.

Now the table under the big Abbeysman flag, was a real little Abbeysman old time wax wheel which belonged to the Great Grandmother of the Vivian and Princesses, when she was a girl. At the other side of the stage, were three large daintily decorated big wooden boxes, one large one small and one middle sized just like the three bears. "Little James" said delightedly. On each box in red, yellow and blue letters were printed the two words "T.E.A." not meaning tea of course but other words in Abbeysman which no one knew of. Before the play began before the audience of parents and others and lots of children Violet herself made some explanation, because a minute not understanding had thought they had to pay to see the show.

"It isn't to make money," said Violet. "School plays are free of charge unless of course it is given in the school hall for the benefit of charity. And then too as we had advertised only relations and parents of the school children and benefactors are permitted to see this show and no one else, whether they did or not. But have a request to make. If you any one of you in the audience see any girl any where that looks like me, a number three, have her held for fine stigmata, give me some into this show. My brother is not at school to day so you won't need to fear that you'll apprehend him by mistake for if he did come to this show which he said he would he would come as his original self. We fear that my double is a spy of the enemy, and so we just doing it for fun. If she is doing it for fun, all right we won't wish it to spoil her fun if she likes to make herself look like me but I'm afraid she is a spy for my brother says she cannot make herself look my attractiveness when though she is my double in other ways. If she once how she happens apprehended until we see and question her then I'll explain the play. We are going to give a play about ourselves, of one incident which we did when we were young. I'll be the one who before this conflict liked to spin yarn for my clothes. Then we are going to have a tea party, and will sing a good number of songs after warms, and also show you how we can do some beautiful graceful dances. Then the show will close with the Band playing 'Abbeysman Princesses' to give a march."

So then the play began and Violet, in a beautifully flowered gown of lawn, and, but few inches longer than to fit her, now took her place back of the epicurean wheel, and humming softly, began to spin just as she had done in her her younger days. He, sister and also Laura, and March and Polly too, and all the other school class girls in a quaint pretty dress appeared, and - and I want to the party, you? One of the children sang so beautifully that the whole audience was enraptured. When the singing was over, Ben - who was in the audience couldn't resist himself and he sang at the top of his voice (he sang a good singer - believe me)

Three choros for the brave little Princesses;
Three choros for the brave little Princesses;
The Daughters--the Daughters of Holy Abbiennia,
Three choros for the brave little Princesses.

Other scenes of the show was so pretty that nobody between selections clapped hands, and before they could get through, the Daughters of Abbiennia had to spin a great deal of flax. After a little they began to talk about spinning and tea. Morah herself said decidedly that she would drink only luscious juice. The real drinks were there so it was no substitute. While they were clinking and drinking and singing, somehow a row of boxes of the big boxes was accidentally turned over and the cure a bumpin' sound inside that chest. Before any one could do more than crane forward and say "Oh-so-my-see out from the chest tumbled the es small red and gray bundles which rolled over and over, coming at last to a side up pop with three times the es nice pop as they will, and turning out to be the small child on. They were Mrs. Monds. The next minute violent and hysterical, flowered gown, cap, tea cup and all had flung themselves among the crying babies.

"Minnie, Harold and the baby were in the world did you come from?" Violet cried. "I thought you were home with your mother." "I took the best effort I, together with Sister Anne, and others to quiet things down enough for explanations, while everybody in the audience laughed. At last one of Violet's friends "where did you come from?" was answered by Harold;

"We cam-ed-" he said, "to find violet."

This place of mine was followed by more soda mixed with jelly, which brought the State back with a box of chocolates. "They these," she said. With the aid of the sweet, much pain, and some little addings, the pain finally died away. It was then found that the three small children had walked the whole distance from home by themselves, had found the school home by its flag and had come in just at noon when every body was out of the classroom. See in the three empty boxes they had gotten into the biggest one, and tired out, they had all fallen asleep. One of them in turning when partly awakened had caused the box to turn over on its side.

"put why did they ~~we~~ do it do you suppose Princess?" asked Polly for a probably the twentieth time on one and other. A hoisted and tied the child child on behind Je le oliviera ho ass back that night after school.

"Violet was in your home in yard and very close woman and Violet her mouth full of chocolate."

"Violet be bad as a very cwen." said "Harold. Violet Penrod and his other relatives exchanged suspicious glances.

On the 1st day of the exchange of religious minutes, on that Sunday afternoon who can describe the beauty of the May P. occasion as it flew past the Schoolhouse and into the Church, and then the night, and prayers, and the sermon by the plaintiff's priest, and on out of the school and back into the school, and thence into the school Hall for the comments for the day had barely begun when Mr. Volzschke, Jennie herself was so sweet and gracious as she acted the "Old Harry" that to one who witnessed it never forgot the scene all their lives. All the little girls were beautifully dressed in white, and the boys in white shirts blue pants and stockings and yellow shoes. The little girls wore beautiful blue veils instead of white. The crowd was the same. In the school hall Jennie's plate was crowded around her and congratulated her for doing the part so well.

* Things would have been all right in some unforeseen incident would not have happened. Unknown by them, a concealed assassin clandestinely spying the procession had gotten into the school hall, and had plot planted a powerful bomb under the first floor of the hall, and the big floor of the school hall collapsed before the force of the blast resulting in injuries and deaths to one hundred and fifty children, and a number of grown-ups. Forty eight were taken to hospitals all of whom may die, more than one hundred were hurt badly enough to require medical treatment before returning to their homes. They had been hurried down in a mass of tumbling furniture and sudden darkness from the second floor to the basement of the St Ann's School Hall, the weight of the debris to a lounge by the explosion crushing the first floor down with it. Fortunately the disaster failed to reach the terrible and fearful proportions feared at one time owing to the presence of mind of one of the caretakers of the school, who rushed to the basement and cut off the gas supply preventing darkness of fire and further explosion. The explosion of the bomb itself was no loud, that it was heard over half of the city, and shook windows out of houses for many blocks and partially wrecked the whole building, and shook windows out of the school building itself and the beautiful church too about half a block away. It was a miracle indeed that the whole School hall didn't fall in and bury and crush all under the debris within, but the fact that the bomb made more noise than shouting voices saved the lives of the remaining thousands.

The once-again hall was on the second floor of the large school hall it was packed solidly with a large crowd of people many of the parents having come to attend a rehearsal and concert celebrating the end of the beautiful May Procession. Suddenly and without warning came a most terrific thunderous crash which shook the windows out of the whole building, the floor instantly sagged with a tearing noise and then with a crash and a roar collapsed at all parts though the center portion seemed to rise. A heavy piano fell through the floor with the rest of the furniture, but it dropped in such a way as to afford easy access to a large window, enabling many to escape by climbing climbing upon it. Most of the people were shot so coming and struggling through the large gap to the floor below. All the chairs and other furniture fell on the people and a part of the wall plates also crashed down and some of the ceiling. Hundreds of injured children and cries of "help" from adults filled the place in a deafening uproar.

To make it worse the place where we were left in complete darkness which in itself contributed to the panic while a great cloud of dust filled the dark room half choking the straggling people. To complicate matters five men and soldiers and even boys and girls were summoned to the scene found their work most difficult until temporary lights were furnished. Ambulances were arriving rapidly and the injured were piled into them and rushed to the nearest hospitals all bleeding badly from their injuries. Nearby accidents also were closed some in their homes. Trams cars and also private carriages were commandeered to hurry others of the injured to hospitals. A great was the anxious crowd that gathered and that a special contingent of soldiers had to be detailed to hold them back, not that they were curious but that they feared they had lost some loved one or one who was injured. Myself and mother and father fought to get past Military cordons thrown around the scene to determine determine whether their children were in the ruins.

Violat and her sister were also caught in the crash and Violat got Jennie was under the very fallen pin piano but got out from under not one of them were hurt, no even scratch, and even like them occupied Polly. Jennie and, so, happily was one of them hurt but not seriously. Violat and sister when they testified recovered themselves from the shock also gave what aid they could in the help of rescue, and here showed themselves the perfect angel they were. Emma, a civilian, the three boys and Dora were rushed to the scene, but found Violat and her sister not only safe but aiding in the work of helping the injured, and helping others out of the wreck.

The cause of the explosion however was not known for quite a while. It was at first believed that something must have gone wrong with a gas pipe which let out a lot of gas until some how it caught a explosion, but as the saying is "Man proposes and God disposes" and when captured through trying to sneak into a hotel a room a day later a man through being grilled confessed that he set the explosive that blasted the school hall and that it had been Manley a common to kill the civilian girls. At the trial that followed he was found guilty of the deaths of the children who had been killed or died after wounds of injury received, and charged with the intention of murdering the whole school full with the purpose of assassination.

the princesses by means of a bomb. The jury consisted of twelve boy scouts who condemned the man to die at the stake by firing a bomb. And so the wicked man went to death, amidst the flames, for an example to those who tried to do ill to Violet and her sisters. Perrod was the judge this time. Perrod at the time of the crash had not been in the school hall, but outside talking to Sister Alice the mother superior of the School. Perrod's army Ann to the sorrow of Violet and her sisters was so badly injured that she died the next day. Poor Polly Question Boxer mother was killed, and her father expected to die, the name with which she was known as a parent was not the fortune teller and did not add to the sorrow though they came first to the school when they heard of the disaster. The presence of the trial was this:

"Accusing Attorney:

"Why did you fool, place the explosive?"

"I received the command from General Manley. He said the Vivian girls are a menace to Glandelinia."

"They ought to be hanged and the Attorney. "Wish to heaven we had him here besides you. 150 died because of your assassin purposes, and the princesses escaped in any way. Well it's up to the jury to decide. This trial does not last long."

Then the jury filed out, was gone only ten minutes, pronounced the man guilty of murder, and the judge that in Perrod passed the justified but dreadful sentence, and he was put to death at sun down.

Because of the disaster there was no school any more for the conclusion had wrecked every window in the main school building; itself and brought the plaster down from ceiling and walls in most of the rooms. So often was Violet and her sisters really exposed to even more danger than the sudden peril than this that they were no used to when this time that they had not known were not even now any more excited than if they had only gone through a thunder storm. Then there was another danger confronting them and that was that all Glandelinians knew where little Nell was kept.

Because of this Argeline and Jennie had made up their minds. Nell should go to the front. Of course she told her sisters of her intention of taking Nell and Argeline to accompany her as her duty was not so very far. So long as the two were two go to Aunt Mary with Nell their sister then had no need to worry about their absence for with Aunt Mary they would be safe. Indeed if they knew what was going to be they would not have let their two sisters go any where. When their sister lived even near West Christians camps, I'll dare say even angels couldn't count the number of enemy scout parties that were wicked as the cause was the Glandelinians were going to win the war they said, in the face of all obstacles. The two wished to tell Argeline about this besides their sisters and no one else. But Argeline's Aunt Mary had been out so long, and though she was not captured by the enemy she was having the hardest time in her whole career so far in making desperate attempt to escape from her as equally tenacious pursuers. They learned of this from a soldier who lived miles further up in the hills whom they questioned who had said that Argeline's Aunt Mary was hard pressed by her enemies that though they knew she was a leader of girl scouts these pursuers were no more afraid of her and her followers with her than a thirty child is of water. So of course there was nothing for Jennie and Argeline to do but to see to it an immense squad of scouts were to hastily go out to her relief, and that the two were to carry out their plans alone as best as they could, go as early as they could get away in a bidding good bye to her sisters and brothers, they went by street car with Nell in the midst. They took the street car that takes the shortest route to the railroad station. However there were so many small accidents on the tracks, with a wagon losing a wheel, and then a horse of some ones falling down that if the morning train to their destination had not been late they would have missed it altogether.

But some how or other the street car conductor got the men on time, and decided to pay the fare on the train and not at the ticket office for fear it would pull out and leave them, the three as to any in large words just there with themselves on the train.

"Oh dear," gasped Argeline. "I do hope that my poor sisters won't get lonely and sad until we get back. And I hope poor Violet won't get too nervous. I wish we knew what to do next."

Jennie only shook her head and said nothing. The three didn't really much either of the little girls could do except to fall into the nearest hands with Nell in the midst. To protect her in case of attack, the two had carried with them their most reliable weapons, but did not wear any uniforms. Then along came the conductor. He looked queerly at the two Vivian girls and then at Nell and he looked at Argeline and was a little shaky.

"He was a bit at about to smilely pose them but violet's fight with Argeline caught him asleep."

"Please," she said "we have no tickets. We had no time to buy any as the train would leave us, it's going general already. Her sister's charge. How much is it?"

"But! Are you two really little girls?" "hy," thought--

"Why? What's the matter with you?" said Argeline. "You look at me as if you saw a ghost."

"Why? I thought two small angels got on the train going the 11:15," gasped the conductor. "You are too pretty to be children. Sure. Are you really little girls?" he asked.

"Argeline smiled at Jennie, an anxious little smile--with almost no dimple. "Well what is said of us I and she might as well be," she said. "at we sure did not come from heaven though we sure we wish we were there. Good times as we have had no matter where we go with this war on. Father can't bear this happening to us little girls--we are getting treated harshly by the enemy too much," he said yesterday. We are two princesses Jennie and Argeline."

"Are you names? Then this little friend of us, little Nell, the enemy want her worst than the thief who wants jewelry and so we are going to take her to Argeline's Aunt Mary where it is safe for her at our Aunt Mary. When my sisters are as no voice he can't hear her for she really could hear that. So she was nothing except to take her to Aunt Mary. Will it cost much to Argeline's Aunt Mary."

The conductor whistled.

"Argeline's Aunt Mary!" he said. "I'll take about two days and a half to get the area as you have not the right through route train you must change cars at Evanston at Evanston Station when we get there to night," he added "as he counted out the fare."

"Oh I thought we could get back before dark," cried Jennie. "Our sisters will be worried."

"It is too bad you didn't think of that before you took the train," said the conductor. "but we can't stop the train now. You can tell your parents when you arrive to change trains to come back from the re if you like. I don't like to charge you anything since you are two princesses but I know you wouldn't allow that as you and your parents won't exempt any one from paying fare not them or yourselves. But nevertheless you handed me too much money. It doesn't do not cost twenty dollars. Here's sixteen and a half back, and some small change."

Then he gave her a round trip ticket in case she decided to change her mind and return by way of Evanston Station. When he was gone the beauty and goodness of the two little girls were an attraction to the other passengers of the train, and in a few minutes the three had plenty of good friends and were treated to everything that came along. It was just the kind of time that the three little girls liked. Yet way down in their hearts the two princesses kept hoping that Argeline's Aunt Mary was not so far and that some how or other they would be able to get back home to Pando that night. But the train flew on, and on, so many many, many miles that at last they began to feel that they should never be able to get back at all. But they must risk anything to prevent disaster over-taking Nell.

Argeline's Aunt Mary was the place, for when Heaven knows no one could get at any one there. Toward evening the train arrived at Evanston Station. The whole route all the way to Argeline's Aunt Mary safe from foes as the millions of federal agents saw to that. Here they had quite a wait for the train they needed now, and when one came, the ticket agent stopped them from taking it, saying that the train doesn't go there. Wait till the one o'clock with the yellow cars," he said.

They had an hour's wait before that one came, and then on this train of and then on this train there were strange faces every where, and a strange conductor who hadn't time to talk. He only looked at their tickets and punched them, nodded and went off to collect other tickets. He was a good man but oh heavens he was up to his elbows in work the more so many new passengers got on. Argeline and Nell went to sleep, but Jennie remained awake as much as possible to keep watch, for enemies may secretly be on a train. But nothing happened and they finally woke up, it being morning again and the train was just rushing and roaring and clanging into a big city station. It was not Argeline's Aunt Mary, but it was a big city, and they had to stay on, and ride for three hours longer. Other times any one of the little girls were simply "crazy" for train rides, but with anxiety to mention them this time, the two were only too glad when the train finally steamed into Argeline's Aunt Mary, a city where they had never before been. So the girls in Evanston it was a New York and Chicago put together in size, and many people lived there. The three left the train with the rest of the people and were swept along into a big bright handsome hall-road station. There in the midst of the biggest busily busily busy they had ever imagined, they stood for a moment little Nell watching every thing curiously, as especially as most of the people looked at her two queerly friends as if they were seeing something most extraordinary, but were too busy with their own thoughts to think of offering to help them or thought rather they were staring there just to watch them pass by.

"Oh, dear," gasped Jennie to Argeline "If I had ever known it would be like this, so far away, and where Aunt Mary lived till the war is over I'd never have decided to come."

"Well we are here, and it can't be helped," said Argeline.

A little news boy shouted something in her ear as he clutched at him with her right hand.

"Oh do wait just a minute--please," she cried. "I'm princess Argeline Vivian. Do you know where my Aunt Mary lives?"

Indeed if that little good newsboy hadn't been new himself to the ways of a big city, probably the two little Princesses would never have found Aunt Mary as they did. As it was he stopped shouting long enough to look at her and something about him that he and Jennie made him think a bit of heaven just at that moment and he looked with gaping mouth for at least a minute before he finally was able to say in a friendly way:

"Get off the wrong station little girls!"

"No," said Jennie herself. Then just as fast as she could she told him all about things, and how and why she must find Aunt Mary Vivian. Every body was in such a hurry every where they had to hurry too, and long before Jennie had finished, the news boy was having them follow him along through the crowds of people, pushing and jostling, all the time shouting:

"Ext-ry, Ext-ry. All about the big battle of Depressionville. Ext-ry."

Electric cars clanged and shot past. All kinds of buggies, carriages and wagons came and went and nothing could be heard in the noise and confusion every where. It was like Pandora's only worse.

"Here you are Angel Princess's," cried the news boy suddenly bringing them around a corner into a clear space where a number of horses and carriages were waiting. "If you Aunt Mary Vivian, the real Angel of this city is the wife of your Uncle Emperor-Hansson of Argeline State, and whose picture is in my paper to day, this is her carriage." And before the three could think what was happening, they found themselves pushed into a big beautiful empty carriage of gorgeous shape and colors and beautiful soft cushions of seats. Two coachmen were sitting in the back, one partly asleep. The other said nothing but looked at Jennie and Argeline as if they were two little angels just dropped from the skies, and after saying "Here" the boy tossed them a news paper free, and then was off in the crowd, still screaming ext-ry, ext-ry, and much more which the three little girls couldn't understand. Vi Argeline and Jennie sat between Nell and waited patiently. It grew lighter and lighter from electric lights while outside it grew darker and darker. The night fell softly over the big and beautiful city like a big filmy blue veil. The city streets all of them were very wide, and lined every where with beautiful trees. Suddenly out of the passing crowd came a tall woman. She paused before the carriage and looked at the sight of the three children.

"My dear Aunt Mary," cried Jennie, "he leaped as far out as she could. "I've brought you a little girl whom I know you will protect for ourselves."

And indeed Aunt Mary stared unbelievably at the three children in the tonneau of her beautiful carriage.

"How in Heaven's name did you get here, from Pandora?" she demanded.

"By rail!" said Argeline.

"Ask travel by train at such perilous times for the sake of that little girl!" repeated Aunt Mary. "My dear good little neices!"

"Jennie and Argeline nodded.

"Where did you come from, the Christian army on the city?"

"From father's headquarters whom we call home," said Anne Argeline.

"To bring little Nell to you for safe keeping. Father doesn't like to keep her there for fear she isn't safe."

"Go I understand," said Aunt Mary grimly. "No good child is a safe where those devil armies are a wound. And who is the dear little girl?"

Aunt Mary opened the carriage door wide and got in, kissing the three of them as she sat down.

"You and you other dear sisters are the bestest little girls on earth."

She said. "You are as like my dear sister Lucy Henry, like your dear mother as any one could be. And that's my letter."

"I wrote it a few days ago to tell you I was sending you something good and they were beautiful Five Dollar gold pieces for a birthday gift."

"Gold pieces?" cried Jennie. "We don't love Gold."

"I know but you could use them for good purposes," said Aunt Mary. "I send them by express."

"But what shall we do to our little Nell?"

"I'll take care of her," said Aunt Mary. "Where is her parents?"

"I haven't got any," the child said. "They were drowned in the Abbeann flood. Last year."

Aunt Mary gave the order to the coachmen to drive ahead and they obeyed. The horses galloped swiftly and away they went up a broad bright street where the lights of different colors looked like flowers, where tall buildings were set close together failed to hide the sky at a distance the street was so wide and where they made their way as best as they could through crowds of carriages, and people. On and on, over a beautiful broad bridge where a half circle of lights laughed at another half circle in the water of the Aronburg River where it ran through the city. On and on up a broad broad dusky street, where there were a double double row of trees and houses far back from the street. Here they continued on and at last at last came to a stand still before a large house showing dimly through trees and dark shrubbery and where on the walk stood a tall man in liveries. Aunt Mary stepped from the car, or carriage and lifted the child out.

"Look the carriage over carefully Johnson," she said, as with them she marched up toward the house. Always afterwards even for the short time to be mentioned here to Argeline and Jennie, and to her sisters at home and also Penrod, and their parents the very few days that followed seemed like a dream. To Argeline and Jennie, except that she missed them, and all her thief friends more than they could tell, the "dream" was beautiful with rich books, fine old pictures, furniture, china, flowers and soft colors every where. In the "dream" too there were numbers of new pretty gowns--also always seven or eight so that her sisters could have some. There were long rides into the country, where the hills, white with apple blossoms made the two little girls happy and home sick both at once. Violet and her mother's sister, along with Penrod and the other two good boys in Pandora, the "dream" was long and unreal, and they were always hoping to wake up and find things just as they were a before the coming of little little Nell. Just at first things happened fast enough. There had been the sudden surprise of the news coming in that general Viviananna could not hold his position and had fallen back. At first it was believed that the two would come back soon as they had promised. But after the third day came and passed, the biggest surprise of all had been father's letter. At first he had thought Argeline Aronburg, driving into the yard, where Jennie and Argeline who had been missed and he did seem glad and relieved until she only came in not knowing of the trouble and worry. Then Emperor-Vivian was so frightened over the long continued absence of the two, that he had walked the floor hour after hour, saying over and over again, that they might have been surprised and captured by the enemy on their trip. And when the old horse called wild had come home whinnying for the supper and then as still Argeline and Jennie, in the midst of their town and Mrs. Jew's sob Violet herself was quite sure she had heard father's sob too, and said "Oh when we are my other little girls! Of course by this time every body in the camp and that part of the city, knew that the little girl called Nell had been in danger from the fact that Glandelinian spies had told her whereabouts, and that now she was gone, and the two Princesses with her and now every body was doing every thing, they could to find the child--on, when after dark a long telegram by wire less was brought to to Emperor-Vivian's headquarters from Aunt Mary. It said that Jennie and Argeline were safe and well with her and also little Nell, that Aunt Mary would keep little Nell for adoption. That same evening then Emperor

Vivian had sent forth a telegram a little longer than Aunt Mary's, telling her what the enemy knew of little Nell. That same evening too (not a few) daughters home on the first opportunity. That same evening too (not a few) Violet herself found time to write a long letter to her two sisters. Of course Violet wrote it in behalf of her sisters, and wrote also what they told her to say and also signed their names. It began with the result of the terrible battle along General Viviananna's lines, and all that came after that, and told how badly they missed them and it went on to say that they found out that Father missed them more than he had ever missed them before. Penrod himself was away to General Evans headquarters also in Pandora, and they all hoped that Jennie and Argeline would come home soon for before Penrod returned. They were intending to go to Penrod that night but hated to tell him that Jennie and Argeline were not home. Then just as long a letter had come from Jennie and Argeline to their sisters

In the best hand writing, it told of their trip, and the news boy and beautiful Aunt Mary and her wonderful home and the new gowns, they were all going to have, and it added that the two couldn't come back home yet, as Aunt Mary wanted their company for a while oh so much, and wished the other five were with her too.

The letter was a perfect script, to this letter almost as long as the letter which said that little Nell had come and stayed and was a very good little girl, and that she had given her lots of things, and oh dearer sister, she has given five dollar gold pieces for all of us to spend on charity as soon as we can.

The next letter that went from their sisters to Angelina and Jennie said:

"I told father about the gold pieces and he said that all the money in the world isn't worth one third of hair on our heads. Oh Jennie and Angelina you would never, never know Father to say indeed you wouldn't. He misses you something dreadful. He says that we should coax you to come home, and that when I said that, I would go to Angelina with my other dear sister, she has news that he couldn't spare me any better than he could you, and oh Jennie dear and Angelina I could really tell you the funniest thing. The person who posed as Violet number three was little Mildred Manning herself who did it for a little joke on Penrod. He caught her in my room, and when he found out the truth, for thinking she was a spy he had handled her not at all like a lady should be handled, my he was embarrassed, and too Polly question Point told mother, and mother told Laura and Laura told me that you Jennie dear had told Polly once that I had a sister Violet which of course was Penrod in disguise, and some one else told her that I had a sister pose, go Polly thinks there are nine of us. Please come home or Papa says he is going to come and get you.

With love.

Your other dear sisters.
Brother and parents."

While all these things happened May was passing away, and June came striding in. It was going to be for them however a very sad June. For sorry to say, it was going to be a long, long time. Every thing was in great bouquet of apple blossoms, blossoms every where in white and rose color, in fact outside of the enemy and Christian lines, there never appeared appeared as if a long and bloody war was raging, that poor Violet and her other sisters with Penrod too and their fathers were going to have many sad and anxious days.

"What's the matter with you this afternoon Violet dear? You don't seem one bit interested in anything today, you are so listless and quiet. Are you sick?"

Angelina A-orbu-g's tone was decidedly unusual as if she was scared that Violet had after all taken the Scarlet Fever since he visited to the sick boy, and Violet who had been lying back in the hammock with closed eyes, he started to assume a more upright position.

"Indeed I'm so sorry I was stupid," she said apologetically, "I didn't mean to be. No I'm not sick exactly, but I guess it's because I've got such a bad worry over Jennie and Angelina. It's nearly four days now, they said they were coming home and they ain't arrived, and it's past the time they should have been here. I'm afraid as travel is so dangerous."

"I believed you have been asleep most of the time," Angelina A-orbu-g went on still astonished, "not feeling right in yourself." "You do look funny as if you were ill, you and your sisters were at the bed side of the sick boy and you know Scarlet Fever is catching. I'm afraid you've got it, and I've been sending you such a lovely story too. I think the life of the Blessed Virgin is one of the most interesting books in the world."

"It's a lovely story," Violet asserted, blushing, "I liked it very much, but I'm afraid I did fall asleep for a few minutes. I've been sleepy all day to day having not slept at all last night when Jennie and Angelina did not come home. But I am not ill, I have no headache or chills or any symptoms of Scarlet Fever. I'm afraid Jennie and Angelina are captured by the enemy far away from our help."

"Don't tell your mother about it, or you'll cause her more worry too than is necessary. Wait until the fact is really so. Maybe they came or are coming by a slow route. I'm so sorry that they didn't come home, the fear of it is also to me like a king, huba-b and soda. You ought to send a wire to Aunt Mary to my mother and see if they are still there."

"I will to night when I get time."

"Maybe you will Violet dear," said Uncle Ge-tude insisted, "and do not want to admit it. It's hot in the sun. Perhaps we stayed out too long with the pony this morning—it was pretty hot in the sun."

"I didn't mind it then," said Violet. "Any way heat doesn't bother me—my sister and I like hot weather. The sun felt so good and warm. I'm not ill, I'm only worried about my poor sisters, and every thing seems to queer up even to me the sky again looks so dark and queer even though the sun is shining."

"I guess the birds on the east being back the forest fire smoke, that was always happens when the wind turns east. I'll go and ask Mrs. Jerry and you sisters to take us down to the Park. I'll be glad she would be ready at three o'clock you know."

Violet hesitated.

"Would you mind very much if I didn't go?" she asked rather diffidently. "There are so many little girls in the park and if I'm there I'll be looking at every one hoping some of them will be Jennie and Angelina and being disappointed will make me feel so bad, and I just feel like staying quiet."

"But we may not have another chance for the park the way things are looking," urged Angelina. "We have got only one or two days more of rest. Do come, I'll get you what, and I know the scenery and the nice cool air off the east will make you forget your worries."

"All right," said Violet, getting out of the hammock, and wondering vaguely why every exertion seemed such an effort today. It was five days since Jennie and Angelina went to Aunt Mary's and in two more days the school vacation would begin, but Violet and her sisters were not at all happy for ever since the morning when Violet and even her sisters had first felt those uncomfortable chills of fear about that two sisters running up and down the tracks, even the thought of pleasant times in store for them should Penrod be safe from the enemy had seemed to make them feel tired all over.

Angelina A-orbu-g ran into the house for that hats. She turning in a few moments with Violet's sisters accompanied by Mrs. Jerry, and they started in the direction of the beautiful park.

"Don't you little girls feel well to day Princesses?" Mrs. Jerry inquired rather suspiciously. She could not help noticing how slowly the little girls were walking, and what a listless apathetic expression had replaced the radiant one on their faces.

"Oh we are all right thank you," said Catherine. "Only I wish that Jennie and Angelina would come home. We're lonesome for them."

Mrs. Jerry said no more, and they had reached the lane (not path in again) when led down to the park which the sound of galloping horses and of wheels caused them all to turn their heads, and Angelina A-orbu-g exclaimed in astonishment in a tone of some interest; 2;2;2;

"It's General Jack Evans in his own carriage with some officers; perhaps he'll ask you dear little princesses to take a drive with him."

In another moment the two black ponies had been brought to a stand still and Evans loud cheery voice was calling; 2;2;2;

"Hello little angels of Heaven, want to come for a drive with me?"

Violet and her four sisters looked doubtful at first, but Angelina A-orbu-g with unusual unselfishness hastened to set her friends fears at rest by whispering;

"Go if you want to, I don't mind. Maybe he'll help you find out what's wrong why your sisters don't come back."

So they smiled, and accepted the invitation, and in less than one minute the little girls one by one had been lifted into the beautiful seats of the carriage, Violet taking her place by Evans on the high seat and soon the two beautiful black horses were carrying them over the ground at a pace which might have frightened some little girls, and boys, too, but which seemed very delightful to Violet, and her four sisters, to whom the sensation of four of anything, but sin, was almost an unknown experience.

"Well what have you been doing with yourselves lately while in school?" General Evans inquired as they turned from the main street into a shady beautiful road, where the air felt cooler and more refreshing on the little girls.

"Oh we have been having a lovely time in school," said Violet herself trying to speak in her usual cheerful tone, but finding it something of an effort. "Angelina A-orbu-g and I went for a long horse back ride this morning when it was, and yesterday we and the school children had a picnic dinner in the park. I my sister and Penrod haven't seen you for ever so long; I was wondering why you were here."

"Did you really tell now that's quite flattering. You always have worried about us when I was away long time, but I always had to be worried about you too. I found out too that the enemy generals don't trouble themselves about me or care what becomes of me either. I had to go to the city of Do-inda on military business, and as I'm not fond of traveling in these difficult times I stayed there until I was finished. I only came home yesterday morning."

"I expected Jennie and Angelina home the day before yesterday, and they didn't come," said Daisy solemnly.

Jack Evans frowned.

"Expected Jennie and Angelina back home did you? Why I didn't know they were not here and though you went out without them and left them home, have they done?"

"Why to Angelina Agathia, with our Aunt. They took little Nell with them as she was safe there."

"They shouldn't have gone to Angelina Agathia even by train in this dreadful time--what's happened to your father--thinking off to let you two sisters do such a thing?"

"Oh but they did go, and Penrod believes they are only making a long visit," said Catherine earnestly. "Besides they wrote they were not going to stay in Angelina Agathia over two days, and were coming back soon. They ought to be home now."

"And when were they coming back here, I should like to know?"

"Oh I don't know," said Catherine trying to smile as they ought to have been back yesterday.

"Look here," said Evans with sudden decision. "This won't do at all. They have got to come back--they've got to come back for they are so good like you and you other good sisters."

However Violet and her other sisters were not flattered, but said;

"Would you really like to have all of us safe and good?"

"I don't really ask little girls unless I want them. I know your father is going to go out in person soon and take charge of the army for a while outside of the city. How would you little girls like to come and live with me for that time, and your two sisters too?"

Jack Evans asked this startling question in just the same tone in which he might have asked them to take a drive with him, but Violet and her sisters did not misunderstand his meaning for he and they of all men next to their father and uncle had been the closest of all friends, and only Heaven knew all he had done for them.

"We would like to be with you a long time with you," she said. "You are very kind, always have been very kind to us, but oh we do wish we had Jennie and Angelina."

"Don't bother about that," said Evans. "They're safe with Aunt Mary. They'll let you know why they didn't come. I've noticed however you couldn't get on very well without them since they were gone. I'll confess I do feel queer about them myself but may be it's only a false fear. Write to your Aunt to night by wire and find out if they stayed."

"Penrod has sent a wire already," said Hetti. "I hoped we should be together again in a week, and when then we've missed them--we have missed them very much since they were gone. The whole world seems empty to us."

There was a quiver in Hetti's voice and a mist of tears in the blue eyes and her sisters also looked sober. They could not have told why they were, but they were missing their two sisters more than morning and afternoon then they had done any time since the two of them went to Angelina Agathia. If they were only back again now they would be so, very, very happy.

Evans said to move on the subject of the return of the two from Angelina Agathia but it was evident that something had disturbed him for he was grave and more silent than after noon than the little girls had ever known him to be before. In fact he was more worried now than he wanted them to believe, because he knew from all past experiences that the enemy would give to destroy these dear little angels, and it was something peculiar to him to him that Jennie and Angelina did not return. If they after all decided to stay at their parents then there was nothing to worry about. Well the answer to the following telegram would tell.

It was a very silent drive altogether for Violet and her sisters were in no talkative mood and preferred sitting quietly in their seats and letting the cool fresh air fan their cheeks and foreheads, to doing anything else. They were driving through a wide street, when a soldier who appeared to be a Gemini Official, and who was standing on the side walk in front of the Henry Gale Headquarters by which they were just then passing, came hastily forward and motioned to General Evans to stop.

"I beg your pardon General," he said apologetically as Evans brought the black horse to a standstill. "I called at your house this afternoon on a very important business. I don't know whether you had of it or not but the situation caused by the enemy in all sections some many miles north of Angelina Agathia, and a battle is raging some where there."

"I didn't know it," said Evans quickly being somewhat roughly because the thought of the importance seemed to be missing, and that it makes an special difference to me that I can see--it certainly isn't my fault. I can't bring an army every place at one time."

"One of our men got but I thought you might wish to know of it. A battery of our army is advancing under General Black Brooks and Convention and I thought you might wish to keep your little daughter safe who was the little girl who was coming to Angelina Agathia."

"Did you think I'd be afraid of a General's army?"

"But for you--well, but I thought that possibly" and the gentleman looked at Evans's little angel like companions.

"Oh I see, well you need not worry, I haven't any intention of going to Angelina Agathia or visiting any one there at present or sending them there--which sections north of Angelina Agathia is in possession of those few armies?"

"All sections north and east of here. One section is advancing on Evangelina St. Claire again."

Jack Evans gave a violent start and some of the color went out of his face. "Evangelina St. Claire in danger again," he repeated in a very different tone.

"Yes, and also the town of Bidget, Mannigania, and several other towns. It is said every thing is going up in flames before their advance and they are attacking and committing massacres every where. One town called St. Thomas was set afire this morning according to the news, and two more are in very grave peril, and all the inhabitants are fleeing, and big forest fires are raging in a score of places. It's a very bad very malignant form of the disease we created by the enemy. I've been getting many phone calls on that situation since yesterday."

"Look here Brown," Evans leaned forward in his seat, and spoke in a rather low voice. "I'm afraid this is a bad business. Two of these little girls, not now with me did go to Angelina Agathia four days ago, and we're according to a telegram these here with me--they ought to have been back yesterday afternoon. St. Thomas was in peril from the enemy and I understand they were to take a train by that route but I never dreamed--good heavens what are we to do?"

Evans was looking fairly frightened, and the kind hearted Gemini member who had known him for years knew that the eccentric General Evans had a heart for the little girls more than ever when he learned they were imperiled. Vivian's little daughter and Evans was the guardian.

"There may not be any cause for alarm," he said speaking cheerfully, though he looked rather grave. "Which route did they take in going to Angelina Agathia, do you happen to know?"

"I don't even know, but any one of them does. Violet--" turning to the little girl on the seat with him. "You remember the route you two sisters took to Angelina Agathia don't you? They went there to take little Nell where spy agents of the enemy couldn't find her."

Violet who had been sitting with closed eyes as if not paying attention to the conversation, raised herself at this question, and the look of interest came back into her face.

"It was the Middle Route and Pando lines to Evangelina St. Claire," she said. "From there to Angelina Agathia, they took the Yellow B. Route. They wrote they were coming by way of St. Thomas on their return which would be a shorter way."

Evans and his companion exchanged startled glances.

"St. Thomas was destroyed by the enemy this morning. The Gemini member said in a voice low for Violet, and he felt four sisters to five sisters to catch the words."

General Jack Evans was actually white.

"What is to be done?" he asked hopelessly. "How can any one help them when I don't know where they went?"

The Gemini said nothing, but walked around to the other side of the carriage, mounted the high step, and looked long and searchingly into the flushed faces of the little girls. Then he went over to Violet.

"I'm James Brown," he said kindly. "Won't you shake hands with me?"

Violet promptly held out her hand.

"Is there anything wrong about the city of St. Thomas?" she asked with a worried expression.

"I've heard bad reports but I'm not sure," he said. "There was a severe battle near there."

"And are the children victorious now?"

"That is something hard to tell," the man said holding Violet's hand in his and still scanning her face with grave interest. "But I'm afraid you are worrying badly about your two other good little sisters are you not?"

"I am and so are my other sisters," Violet admitted. "My heart feels heavy, but I guess it is foolish for us. They may come back to us now or never."

"I hope you,--you and they are not often separated I suppose."

"Oh no, not very often, not any how to any great length of time, Daisy was captured by spies once and we had her back in twenty-four hours. I don't remember being separated from my sisters ever since the time we were captured at Eva's. Evangeline St. Clair's father says."

"Have we separated since the battle of Evangeline St. Clair's, eh? You haven't had any too serious adventures with the enemy that you would regret?"

"Oh yes very often, but we really were never in any extreme danger that we couldn't escape from, and our doings was the most unusual things ever recorded so many say."

"And were captured and held by the enemy as prisoners for a very long period?"

"Oh no we never had been prisoners long. We could always escape. Jennie was a prisoner of a Quakerite St. Clair's once but she was rescued by our friend here Jack Evans."

The man dropped Violet's hand, and turned once more to General Evans who had been listening to the conversation with rapidly increasing anxiety.

These little angels came from Dr. Andrews, did they not?" he asked. General Evans nodded.

"Well I scarcely think it would be right to take them back the way now just now. Of course they're friends of mine, and Jim and Penrod come and must come and keep them company. Emma's Vivian has gone away to the camp this morning and being without their father the little girls ought not to be exposed to danger any more than can be helped. There is danger some where since their sister's flew off with little Nell. There's a f---!"

"You don't mean that you think there is really any danger, that--" General Evans checked himself abruptly at a sign from the Gemini, Violet, and her sisters were leaning forward, wide awake now, and taking in every word that passed.

"I don't say there is anything wrong yet," said the member of the Gemini rather hastily. "But there is bad news about the city of St. Thomas, the enemy are in action all over north of Evangeline St. Clair's, and this little girl tells me she and her sisters are not feeling quite up to the mark to day because two of their sisters didn't come home from Angelina Agathia, and as their two sisters had skipped to Angelina Agathia with little Nell, and the enemy spies know they have something to do with her disappearance, and as once because of the poor princesses the school hall had been bombed, I thought that under the circumstances it might be better with their fathers gone for a time if they could go some where some where else for a week or two just till we are sure what the trouble is. The spies cannot be detected you know."

"They shall stay at my house of course until Emma's Vivian comes back," said Emma's Vivian with decision. "You won't mind coming to stay with me for a while will you little angels?"

"Oh no," said Violet. "We should like it very much, as you have been so good to us--" but does the Gemini really think our two sisters are in danger?"

"No, no," said the Gemini reassuringly. "at you see the fact is, St. Thomas has been fiercely attacked and burned by the enemy, and the two sister villages nearby are in possession of the foe, and as it became a fact that at you two sisters Jennie and Angelina went to Angelina Agathia with little Nell, and the enemy through some cause of it know it, and are bending to get you for it. I thought it might just be well to best for you to keep away from Dr. Andrews home for a few weeks, they too must be main with you, and keep in hiding just until we are quite sure that every thing will come out all right you know..."

Violet's lip was quivering, her sisters looked very anxious, and any one of them had to make a great effort to keep back the bayish tears.

"I don't know that to do," Violet said in a rather treacherous voice. "I shouldn't like to take chances with unseen Glandelinian spies any where, but then what do I care when Jennie and Angelina do not come home and they might be in danger if she and her sisters are far and far away and are captured by the enemy--that--that--that--would be dreadful."

A bear tear splashed down on poor Violet's cheek but before she could wipe it away or even realize what was happening to her, she felt a strong arm around her and Evans was saying in a tone that few people had ever heard in that soft hoarse voice before:

"Don't cry Violet, don't cry my dear. Every thing will be all right; I'm going to take care of you if I can, and until Emma's Vivian comes back to Dr. Andrews, you and your sisters are going to be my own little Guardian angels now."

How it was Violet never understood, but at the sound of that kind voice all her fears suddenly melted away, and with a little sigh of relief and and content she let her stiff hand sink on Evans' shoulder--murmuring softly:

"Thank you so much. You are always so very kind to me and my sisters, and we'd rather have you take care of me more than any one else in the world except our father and mother and three brothers."

Half an hour later Violet herself was sitting lying in a soft cool bed, with her sisters still sitting up, some by the window and the others by Violet's bed. Mrs. Jenny herself with a grave troubled face, was moving about the room, folding up Violet's clothes, and generally setting things in order.

"Mrs. Jenny" said Violet suddenly speaking for the first time, since Violet had gotten into bed. "How long does it take to travel from here to Angelina Agathia?"

"That depends on the train a person takes," said Mrs. Jenny. "Sometimes only thirty-six hours, but the surest way to get here from there is to be careful you don't run through the territory held by the enemy, put you will get ill if you don't stop worrying about things."

Violet stifled a sigh. "I do hope they didn't go through the territory held by the enemy," she said sadly. "But even if they should do you think they'll be able to get through some now and come to us as even by next week?"

"Well I don't know about that," said the housekeeper. "But they ought to be here before long, and if they do stop at Andrews place first Dr. Andrews will send them over here, and in the meantime you'll just stay here until Emma's Vivian either comes to us to Andrews, or advances and we'll have such nice times. I love to take care of little girls like you and it'll seem just like old times to have somebody to look after."

"Did my dear mother you told me you took care of when she was a little girl ever have troubles and sorrows like we have?" inquired Joice herself, looking at Mrs. Jenny from where she was sitting.

"No indeed she didn't thanks be to God, there was no war-torment then but I must say he was in your own very room far away at home when she was sick with colds."

"In my own very room far away at home," repeated Violet herself, raising her eyes to herself on her bed and looking more interested than she had looked before that day. "Why did my dear mother live in our very home?"

"Mrs. Jenny flushed and looked a little embarrassed. "Well yes she did," she said rather reluctantly. "Though I didn't mean to tell you. You won't say anything to your father about it will you?"

"Not if you don't want us to," said Daisy herself.

"But why doesn't Father like to hear about it?" asked Hettie. "Because dear that little girl I used to take care of was adopted by your father's father as you father's step sister, and for some reason or other she looked so much like you, Violet dear, and now when he thinks of all you and your sisters have gone through I almost break his heart. He never mentions anything about it now and it might be making him unhappy to be reminding him of the past."

Violet, and her sisters looked a little troubled.

"Do you think Father would like to have us stay here then?" Joice questioned anxiously. "Perhaps that might make him unhappy too."

"No it wouldn't," said the housekeeper with decision. "I know that for before he left for the army himself his very first words to me were 'See that the Guardian Jack Evans takes good care of them as he always did. If so I should like to have the little girls there.'"

Joice smiled contentedly while Violet laid her head down on the cool pillow once more.

"I'm glad," said Violet, as from a cloud lightning flashed for an instant, and I know General Jack Evans really loves me next to my father and oh does he love Penrod. He sure wishes he had a son like him."

"The war was a short pause while Mrs. Jenny went on quietly with her arrangements, though at times glancing suspiciously at the distant lightning in the west.

"You don't remember really how far Angelina Agathia is I suppose," spoke Hettie herself.

"Well no I don't exactly--it's a good many miles away, you see."

"St. Thomas isn't so very far from Angelina Agathia," said Daisy, with a sudden hopeful collection. "It was only ten days ago that I heard that the enemy was only advancing toward that location, and the Gemini said that he couldn't tell whether the Christian army won the war or not."

"I do hope the Christians did win," said Violet. "And we would be so much at a loss if they didn't return. Oh why does the enemy want to make so many poor people so unhappy and--and--and--"

Violet ended the sentence in a sob, and her sisters also looked as if they wanted to cry.

"Now my dear little angels," said Mrs. Jerry cheerfully, taking one of Violet's little hot hands in her own. "She was very warm because of the weather and for being facing her sisters. This won't do at all. If you fret, and worry and worry, you will be sure to make yourselves much more upset over something probably that didn't happen at all. You must try to be brave, and every thing going to come out all right. I know, why they may have really remained at Auntie's, seeing that the war was dangerous, traveling back so soon, they may not have left Auntie's, and may not be in any danger at all, and even if they do, they are sure to escape, they always do. Would it make you happier if some of your dear highest girls and friends would come and stay with you too?"

"Oh, yes, yes, indeed," they all cried together rapturously. "That is Violet herself aided with a sudden recollection. If you are quite sure they wouldn't run into danger themselves. They often had been in danger, and they might be again, and that would be so dreadful."

"I don't think there would be the very least danger for them," said the housekeeper simply. "Though of course we could ask General Evans. Now I'll tell you what I'll do. What we'll do. General Evans has gone over to Dr. Brown to let him know where your little girls, and his son, and the two boys are, asking him to close up his home and come here too. Just as soon as he comes back we'll ask him what he thinks of our sending a little note to Angelina A. Embury and some of the others telling them how worried you are because you two sisters do not return and asking them if they couldn't spare themselves off duty, and come here to be with you. Then if it turns out that there is no danger for you two sisters and that they have come home at last, why then we can celebrate together and every thing will be the same as it was before. Would n't you like that?"

"I should like it better than anything in the whole world," said Violet, and her sisters echoed her sentiments. And then she dropped off into a doze and did not speak again for some time. Her sisters were glad she did, though they felt too worried to sleep. When Violet next awoke again to consciousness she was aware of the fact that the housekeeper was no longer the only person in the room beside her five sisters. People were talking in low subdued voices, and she was sure she recognized the tones of General Evans and also those of Dr. Anderson, his son, Tim, and Mrs. Penrod.

"Did you ask General Evans about Angelina A. Embury and the rest?" she asked eagerly.

"Yes indeed," said the general, coming forward, and answering for himself. "It's all right and your friends shall come to see you. A great number of the Gemini have gone south to hunt for your two sisters."

With a sudden movement Violet put out her hand.

"Oh thank you so much Evans dear," she murmured. "I think I'd like to kiss you please. You are so good to us."

General Evans bent down his head close to Violet's and as the child kissed him she heard him whisper in a tone so low that no one else in the room could hear.

"God bless you, and your dear sisters—God bless my own dear little human gun-dian angels."

The next morning poor Violet was reading aloud to a wounded soldier in a hospital which she had gone to see. The day was very warm, not because of hot weather, but because of the forest fire heats of the east and south, the wind being on the east, and the air was heavy and damp too for all night long a terrific thunderstorm had raged. The smoke was worse over the country too for it had rained in some sections of the forest fires and instead of putting any out made clouds of smoke to such an intensity that hundreds of miles of country looked like they would be blanketed at once and at Pandora it was very dark, though there was the streak of a red sun shining through a black sky. It was a wonderful and strange phenomena but Violet and her five sisters were too glad and too busy to pay any attention. She was reading by means of an electric light in the patient's room. The book to day was not very interesting to her.

More than once the soldier had nodded in his chair, but the little girl read on patiently, trying to soothe herself once more by a hopeful glance at the telephone. This was Tuesday now and on Thursday the patient would have been recovered and could sufficiently to have returned home. Because of the forest fire heat, and the sun working too, it was promising to become the hottest summer ever recorded in this story in the world's history, and too day poor Violet was hot and tired. The past five days because Angelina and Jennie had not come home had been especially trying, for out side of her other sisters, there had been no bright bright little Jennie or Angelina to make the dull hospital life of Jack Evans look home like to her and her sisters. No Jennie and Angelina to gladden those long hot evenings with their merry chatter and loving caresses. To add to their sorrow when on the fatal night of August 1st, 1918, had happened the court by falling into them and with the help of several spies had affected his escape though he had been badly wounded in doing so. The affectionate ways of her sisters had been a great comfort to it is true, and Penrod had become a little more unusually devoted to them than ever before, as if he and they were only one, and they had spent otherwise many an otherwise lonely hour in making bright plans for the future but even the prospects of possible goodness and righteousness cannot make up for every thing and poor Violet and her five sisters had been lonely. To aggravate matters her mother was ill, her father was far off in camp and sent them news while spending last day in school that Hanson himself at a distance of five miles was violently in action every day for the past five days, and he himself was being attacked fiercely in a desultory way, and Vivianne was still unable to hold his ground, and Angelina's father's general picture was badly wounded.

The battle of Pandora was threatening. Since hoping for the return of the two Violet and her five sisters had believed their anxiety was over now, for it was believed after all that the two sisters had only been delayed by the enemy being across the river, and had taken a longer route and would be home to-morrow. What did it matter that the day was hot, and the sky dark with smoke, and a red sun shining through a black sky, that the book (was book) was dull even that because of the heat and smoky mess of the atmosphere the patient was more restless and harder to please than usual? What did anything in the world matter when she remembered that to-morrow she and her sisters would feel the touch of Jennie's and Angelina's soft arms around their necks and hear their voices saying:

"Are you not glad to see us back sisters dear?"

The nurse was a thing at the hospital's front doorbell, and though it was some time down and they both heard it plainly and the patient started up out of a doze.

"Who in the world can that be?" she murmured in a tone of interest.

"Perhaps it may be your wife and child. I'll come to see you, they said they would; you know," Violet suggested looking up from her book (the book).

"Perhaps, and if so I would be glad to see them. Go and see Mrs. Will you."

The nurse left the room and Violet went on with her reading. In a very short time the nurse returned.

"It's a tall gentleman of some kind to see you Princess Violet."

"To see me? What? Are you sure the man isn't some big mistake? Did he give his name?"

For answer the nurse handed her a card. Violet took it and glanced at it, turned a little pale and tears of fear came to her blue eyes.

"Who is it?" the patient inquired moodily seeing her tears.

"One of the Gemini members from Angelina's father. He knows about my two sisters having gone to visit our Aunt Mary. I'm afraid something is wrong."

"Nonsense. Why should there be any thing wrong. You must want your sisters to make a large visit that is all. They'd be wanted by any body and you and your mother's sisters too, you are all so good."

Violet said nothing but hurriedly left the room, and in another moment she entered the hospital reception room, which from the darkness and the blinds being closed and all the furniture done up in muslin covers looked a rather forlorn place. A tall majestic looking gentleman was standing by one of the windows, from which he had pushed open the blinds, and she saw as she fearfully entered he turned and came quickly forward.

"Poor Princess Violet," he said in a tone of sorrow.

Although she and her sisters had seen him often in the street, and though he had come several times to try and have them quiet their dangerous adventures, she had never had military business relations with him and his followers.

That Violet had spoken to him alone by herself.

He raised his eyes to her and she saw his face as seeing his troubled eyes, and clasping her hands nervously, she said: "Jennie and Angelina my two sisters—they didn't come—they are lost—repeated—say you have come to tell me."

"Oh my poor dear little princess," said the man kindly and he took Violet's hand as he spoke, "I hope there is nothing to be alarmed about. Your Aunt Mary is more alarmed than you are. You sisters may be just now and have engaged the help of all of my members to come back to you, and then left home at Aunt Mary's with the purpose of coming back to you, and then came back saying that the ruins were not running because of the enemy. She then was determined to go and bring your little girls back to you herself on the town private train, which when it reached near St. Thomas was attacked backed by a great force of Indian soldiers and infantry and the main force was killed on board the ship in the creek, and the enemy pursued them all. You must and two little sisters managed to escape from the massacre. You must have been a very brave girl, and having learned so much from Penrod we were able to fight the way through the woods and be safe. And with this great escape into the distant forests, since then they have not been heard from again. They have got a buck, but through a fire we are having lost track of you. Sisters who fought so well to save her from capture. She is a brave girl when she came back to the Indian camp and at once engaged all of us and the soldiers of the mobilization camps to hunt for them and fight the enemy off from the woods if possible. You two sisters are lost in the laby- rinth of the beautiful Mic-Holliste woods, swept in the south by conflagrations--but we hope by God's help--indeed we sincerely hope and trust that they may find their way out, and return to us soon or later and that there may not be any cause for serious anxiety. Won't you sit down and let me tell you all about it in detail?"

Twenty minutes later Violet was again at the soldiers' side. He was very pale, and she looked like she had been crying bitterly, and her lips, which were trembling, but she made a great effort to speak very cheerfully. "Mr. Rogers," she said, "I must go away at once to my five sisters at General Evans headquarters. My father must get the news by telegram from Penrod. My two sisters, Jennie and Angelina, have met with a tragedy on account of the enemy. The third sister they were on with aunt was wrecked and attacked by the enemy and though my sisters escaped the massacre they are lost in the woods of Mic-Holliste and I am afraid they'll never get out. Mr. Da-gu has come to take me to General Evans headquarters to break the news to my sisters. I will be so easy I fear."

At hearing this the patient himself though he had suffered plenty from his own wounds which were to keep him out of the army for good now forgot all his complaints and feelings in an instant. He was doubtful of the nurse to help him, but the little girl's determination as much as he could, and also he tried to encourage her as much as possible. And during the few brief moments that the little girl was putting on her hat.

"Now listen carefully to me my dear little princess," was the patient's words of the soldier, as he held the little girl's hands for a moment. "Remember the good of course are usually the ones to suffer in this world even if the wicked don't seem so, and so be careful and don't worry you. You are into a sickness, don't let your sisters go to so either. Usually being lost in any woods isn't necessarily dangerous, and besides the forests of our country have many paths and roads. My own child ran once when I was a child, and when you get the chance day. The nurse, I won't keep you. Drop me a line when you get the chance just to let me know whether you and two little sisters are safe and home or not." Then Violet, being led by the nurse, went down the steps the pool little girl doing her best to keep from crying. Mr. Da-gu had a cub, and in it he and Violet first drove at night to Dr. Andrews house, while Mr. Da-gu waited outside. While Violet went up to her room to collect a few necessary things which she had left there before. Mrs. Andrews herself opened the door and accompanied the little princess upstairs. She knew all about what had happened, Mr. Da-gu having first called at this place, and had been directed by Mrs. Andrews to St. Joseph's Hospital. The kind hearted woman was so very for her little tenant and she too began to speak very cheerfully and encouragingly. Recalling all the cases she had heard of in which people had been lost in the woods and having often been rescued or rescued with unusual success, and had indeed been occasionally lost long enough to be causing any unnecessary worry.

Of course Violet was very grateful for the kindly meant assurances that there was really nothing to be worried about, but nevertheless she did her best to smile and appear cheerful, even though her heart was very heavy and she was conscious of a foreboding of coming trouble, and the thought of her two sisters having lost themselves in the Mic-Holliste woods made her cold and faint with apprehension, for it is always with the case that any body who got lost in those woods have an it's known never to be found.

Mr. Da-gu was very kind, how kind poor Violet did not realize till after wards. She did not know that he had given up an important business engagement, solely that he might see her, tell her the sad news, and take her home. He was to General Hind-nines headquarters. He was very thoughtful during the short journey and did his best to entertain her and divert her from her thoughts. But Mr. Da-gu was not happy. He too had known very fond of the good little princess and he had had a talk with Mr. Brown and Henry Gule that morning when he arrived at Pandora, when he called at General Evans headquarters on his way to the hospital.

At last they were coming in sight of General Evans headquarters, and Violet with a wildly beating heart, and now a burning hat, followed her companion which she had not before and which she could not help, followed her companion out of the cub, to where she could see him waiting, into which Mr. Da-gu was waiting.

She was perfectly still, trembling so much that she found it rather difficult to help herself, and still had a desperate struggle to keep back the tears.

"Drive to General Hind-nines place on Hind-nines Square," Mr. Da-gu said to the coachman.

"Violet gave a little start."

"General Hind-nines," she repeated, "why you are driving me away from my other sisters at Evans."

"I'm not making any mistake," said the man cheerfully.

"But they are at Evans headquarters and--"

"No, you do not understand what I told you, so in you go right for now. Then it was discovered that somebody had placed two bombs big enough to have blown Evans headquarters to smithereens, and that Jennie and Angelina not only were lost, but that your sisters were being also in danger of being shot at through the windows by mysterious unknown assailants, and once a fire had started in his headquarters this morning, General Jack Evans insisted in taking up his quarters with them, your housekeeper and friends at General Hind-nines. He did not want you and your sisters to be exposed to the danger like that if he could help it. Of course he'd like to lay his hands on those scoundrels who have been trying that. He was so sorry to have to be forced to abandon his own headquarters, but under the desperate circumstances, he felt that he could not object. He won't have anything happen to them."

"No," Violet said Violet sadly, "it would be terrible if we were bombed and killed, and our two lost sisters be left without us. They couldn't stand it. Jennie feels no more more than we do. That is why she lost her reason twice. She came near it when she thought Penrod would never be found. Hind-nines is very kind to us, and so is Evans."

"Good as he is Evans is an excellent General," said Mr. Da-gu. "But he certainly had taken a wonderful fancy to you and your sisters. I never saw a man more utterly devoted and distressed than he was when he came to my house yesterday afternoon when he learned I had come into the city, to tell me about Jennie and Angelina."

"No," Violet said Violet, "it is not right that he should suffer too. How did he know of it?"

"You know it was while you and your five sisters were driving with him yesterday afternoon that you met Mr. Brown, who first had he showed the news. They didn't want you to go to Evans to know of anything, but until Mr. Brown fell asleep of it. And then a woman told me you and your sisters had been complaining of being worried about them for the past three or four days but no one else knew anything about it."

"It is seldom we have a complaint about anything," Violet said. "But oh we can't bear to lose Jennie and Angelina. Oh I hope they'll be home soon. Mr. Da-gu must let me tell them they are hopelessly lost here to let them know if they did go into those terrible Mic-Holliste woods. It is said that no one who gets out again alive, if you don't know the roads and paths and have a compass."

A shade of anxiety crossed Mr. Da-gu's face, but he tried to speak cheerfully.

"Mr. Brown still does not seem to think there is very much danger, as even the forests that are sweeping the Mic-Holliste woods are too far away to reach the spot where they were lost. General Hind-nines has not heard the news yet and we have to break it to him only by your mother who is ill."

"I can't help feeling a little little uncomfortable at the idea of the spies and their plan to bomb our headquarters," said Violet colorfully.

"I don't think you really need worry on that account. A princess, for you'll be safe at Hind-nines, and Evans you'll find and know his business. For I was the General's little daughter and he would know his business too he could not be more devoted to all of you than he is now."

Violet said no more and in a few moments they had turned in at the gates of General Hind-nines own headquarters.

"What a most beautiful house!" exclaimed the little princess struck by the beauty of the mansion in spite of her anxiety and suspense.

"Yes it is quite the show place of this part of the city, and who we owned it before on this good estate. I believe he was born here. I understand General Hind-nines has no non-relatives. He was a very princess, you will excuse me if I don't say which could convert to him and see your mother's sisters once we are safe for they heard the news before you did poor Violet. She has come to her senses and she will be able to give us all the latest news."

Harriet Jones, who had been waiting for them some hours in the down the steps to meet Violet, and in another moment the little girl found both her hands taken in a warm friendly grasp, while the same old kind motherly voice which had often been heard from Mrs. Jones said:

"You know what I think," she cried, "the shock, and though the other girls are all sick, I don't think you can expect the doctor to expect them to get well and then live better than you all day. You must help them and Evans that shall do all I can power to help them and Angeline found in the house the point of the woods they lost in, and the enemy is being driven off by some means."

Violet gave a little gasp of surprise, squeezed the old woman's hand hard, and then sadly turned to go to her room. "I don't know how to thank you," was all she said but the look that accompanied the words said a good deal more, and Mr. Dargard was very quite satisfied. He had already decided all means to be sent forward to have the food reached for the two missing girls. Mrs. Hannah Jerry led the way into the house and up the stairs to a pleasant room on the second floor. Violet wondered a little where Jack Evans could be but did not like to ask.

"Now Violet dear you must first take off your hat, and freshen up a little. A little bit before you take you in to see your little sisters," said the old woman cheerfully. "Here is a good glass of cool milk and some crackers--I thought you might be hungry, after your journey from the hospital."

However Violet was not at all hungry, she couldn't be when worried and in grief, but she did not want to appear ungrateful, so she made no objections when the housekeeper insisted on placing her carefully in a comfortable easy chair by the open window and she forced herself to swallow the milk and to nibble one cracker. The housekeeper watched her keenly all the time she ate and drank and Violet could not help wondering at the kindly almost tender expression in the old woman's face.

"You sure have been kind to us," Violet said trying to smile as Hannah took away the empty glass. "I know I and my sisters have found some very good friends."

"Very good loving friends," repeated the old woman. "Oh my dear Violet, you have no idea what a blessing they are to us. The doctor started to leave us... And the sight of the three sisters Violet in still more grateful anxiety."

"Oh you must tell me the truth, please do," she cried nervously, springing to her feet. "You are surely keeping something from me, I know you are. Joyce is seriously ill and so is Catherine much worse than you want me to know. Maybe they've caught the scarlet fever from the little boy, and--and--and--" "No, my dear Violet no," said the housekeeper soothingly. "You mustn't be so frightened like that. Catherine and Joyce are only prostrated by the news from Mr. Dargard. You two little sisters, Jennie and Angelina, are dangerously lost. I won't deny that but people generally are who go out in that terrible Mic-Hollesste woods, you know. General Evans would insist on having half of the army down there to scout the forests, though, told him nobody could get out of those woods and that he must leave the matter with God and the angels that are passing them just as well as not. The doctor isn't much. I don't know about those terrible Mic-Hollesste woods, I can tell you. Your mother too was once prostrated when little Angelina was sick and dying, and didn't Catherine see how Angelina through all her illnesses which was no more from shock of your being stolen away with the enemy with the worst than from her wounds, and didn't the doctor tell her that she was one of the worst cases of prostration from shock the doctor ever seen. Send for Catherine Lee. She probably can explain something." "Catherine Lee?" repeated Violet, "she thought she must have misheard. Good. Hannah Jerry reddened and looked as if she had said something she had not meant to say."

"Did I say little Miss Catherine Lee? I forgot she was so far away. Whatever was I thinking of. It was Angelina I meant. But never mind why not have little Jennie with you. She was a good little nurse for you sister Angelina--" "I missed her through everything from the time she was wounded--all the day that she was covered."

"Why Jennie is also quite upstairs," said Violet. "I know she took care of poor Angelina and if she didn't she would have been dead. Did she do it secretly?"

"Yes dear she did, she's been the best friend you have had among little girls, and if it had not been for her Angelina could have been dead, but sometimes I think little Jennie is the best thing of what Mildred Maxwell and I have. That's why the child seems so much like a sister to Mildred Maxwell."

"Can't I go to a stay with my sisters now?" Violet asked impatiently.

"Yes of course, it's only across the hall, I thought you would like to have the room. You mustn't be frightened if you see her. You needn't look at her just now they received the news, they were not and were quite a little better. Just now they have been hit by a bullet quite a while. Pen is gone to see the doctor and they have been hit by a bullet quite a while. Pen is gone to see the doctor. I think of the Church to have them offered to the safety of your two little sisters. He came to go and but for when he was but Evans knowing the danger of it put his foot down but that doesn't amount to anything."

As they came out into the hall again, Violet caught sight of a tall figure, and he was standing rigid and very motionless by one of the windows. It was so dark in the hall that she couldn't tell who it was at first.

"Is that our friend Jack Evans?" she asked Mrs. Jerry in a whisper. The housekeeper reddened, and then from some mysterious source produced the figure as she was sitting on a light, the figure turned abruptly and Violet found herself confronting a confronted by the tall handsome friend Evans whom she knew had not only been the kindest men friends but who had gone through all kinds of danger for them and with them. With a sudden impulse, she went up to him and held out her hand.

"Come into our room Evans," she said in a low sweet voice, which caused the general to start and smile slightly. "My sisters need your presence now, and we always appreciate your kindness to us and my other friends. Don't feel so badly, maybe she'll be taken with Angelina yet." Evans did not speak, but he took the outstretched hand, and held it in a warm firm grasp. A clasp, while a wave of some very painful emotion swept over his face.

"I hope nothing will happen to the Violet went on blushing for she was beginning to find the general's silence somewhat disconcerting. "We know how good you have been to us, and next to father your company is as greatly desired. The general slowly followed, and Mrs. Jerry opened a door on the opposite side of the hall and Violet and Evans followed her into a large handsomely furnished bedroom. The blinds were closed to keep out the flash of the light. Lightning in case another storm should come up for night when they tried to sleep the lightning glass indicated their eyes, but even in the dim light Violet could make out the various objects, and lying on the beds as if they had been weeping bitterly. There were five sisters. They had kept for dear bright little Angelina and also for good hearted little Jennie, their two best loved sisters, whose quick eyes had never before failed to catch the sound of their footsteps--whose faces had never failed to brighten with a glad welcoming smile. They had closed themselves to sleep. Little Jennie was sitting up by a window where the shutters were not yet closed looking out but she didn't appear to hear or see them coming. In spite of all her efforts at self control, Violet's knees were shaking so that she could scarcely stand. That made her feel worse was that at the time of the parting when Angelina and Jennie was so start for Angelina Agathia with little Nell, a band had played some slight distance away the sad hymn of "God be with you until we meet again, and even then the song had brought tears to their eyes on parting. Violet felt sick all of a sudden, her heart was heavy and she would have also burst into violent weeping had not Mrs. Jerry thrown up a protecting arm about her, and little Jennie hearing then a sound suddenly turned her head to look, then suddenly rose and hurried to Violet's side.

"Are they all asleep?" faltered Violet with trembling lips. "The poor little dear have closed themselves to sleep, but you mustn't be frightened. It's only the result of the bad news. Please do not awaken them now. You'll only have them cry over again and oh it is so pitifully. Evans was in here and couldn't stand it."

Of course it seemed that by now that any one of Violet or her sisters should have been used to all hard times and sorrow by this time, but of course things can not be. It had seemed now that all good things must come to an end at last, and Violet as she sat up, unable to sleep, and met by the window remembered wistfully how Jennie and Angelina had told her and her sisters how they had decided to take little Nell to Angelina Agathia before any evil would attack in some way and assassinate her as they knew was planned. Of course the two were far from happy over the prospect, and hated like taking poison to go, and their sisters had looked on a graver than usual more grave than any one had ever seen them before, and though they had not felt so good about it either. Violet had hastened to cheer the other sisters by saying:

"Oh we'll come back in a few days as Angelina Agathia isn't so frail had asked papa this morning if we two couldn't go, and he had said certainly if he liked. If we liked, and of course must must under many conditions save poor little Nell. Penrod can take you little sisters of mine often to drive in my nice little pony cart, and you shall feed my little bunnies, and Penrod during your long fun-loving can read lots of nice stories to you."

Violet and her sisters smiled gratefully. Violet remembered having saying "but please come back soon, I'm afraid I couldn't stand the parting very long."

"Then you can come with us too," said Jennie. Violet's face had then shone with pleasure but she remembered having said that father would only take two of them go, and then Jennie had answered that they need not worry, they'll be back.

that they need not worry they'll be back in a day or so. Violet and her sister and her mother, and Jennie had shared their hearts about the plans of the show-trip in a way that they both and of the good feeling of the show-trip the enemy of the intended victim. The day to come for the going came and all too fast and Violet's members had not all too soon came the morning when Jennie and Angeline were in for the last time to say good bye. The express wagon was at the door. Of course as Violet recalled Jennie and Angeline were in very dramatic spirit too, and yet kissed their sisters with more real affect ion than can ever be known on any road. As for Violet who still clung tight to Jennie she said very little, and tried hard to choke down the big lump in her throat.

"Angeline Aronburg also was there whom the two kissed good bye, and she had said "I shall never forget how good you have been to all of us, and we shall keep thinking about you all the time, and when after a long time you come back--"

"But we shall see each other before the ten days" interrupted Jennie (for Angeline did not feel like speaking) "We'll come back and give our regards from Aunt Mary. But we can't stay any longer we have only time to say good bye, the spies are pressing on Wall hard, we're going in a little while.
Good bye my dear precious sisters, and don't forget to write soon, back very soon."

Then Violet's members had how in another moment she and her five sisters were alone. Now it was four days since the parting and the news of the two being lost had upset her and her sisters greatly. She couldn't help it. She had a feeling she had never before with her sorrow, a coming burning hatred of the enemy. She wondered whether she was wrong in it, and it seemed at times whipsaws in her right about her angelic like said she ought to have hated the enemy long ago, because the enemy was unrepentant, and never will repent.

Violet had members just before the parting in saying to Jennie:
"But we have never been away from each other for long since our separations before the battle of Manogue at Poughkeepsie. We shall give a new life to all our lives and it'll be hard parting now."

"I know that my dear sister" she had said and Jennie having said and "I and and I know any it would almost break on these to part with our darling sisters when the time does come, but little Nell must be refused at our Aunt and we need only be separated for a little while you know. We should feel safe too and Angeline Aronburg you know as she is so dumb. She is, the enemy would have to first capture the moon to even plan to capture Angeline Aronburg, and our Aunt Mary is a good conscientious woman and we should have no fear in trusting ourselves to her care."

The said memory almost upset Violet enough to start her to crying, and little Jennie said:
"Don't cry Violet dear. It's maybe our Good God is only allowing this as a trial to see whether you'll hold firm to Him even in the face of this sorrow."

"What need is there for such a trial to him when He knows I won't fail Him any way" sobbed Violet. "Oh I can't tell you Jennie, how I'm getting to hate
His enemies. I know they only do that to us to throw insults into His face. Instead.
I don't care what anybody says. The war is terrible day coming for Glendalville.
I know it. Now in history was a nation as wicked as this, and they went to destruction so that they're only in history now. It is hard to bear that He knows we won't fail Him. He only will stick to him close no matter what the trial He allows us."

And Heaven knows she told more than that with her little girls to Nell for a month just for a trial, despite how good they were, and they'd only be the more sanctified for it.

It was six o'clock on a very warm evening at the end of May. Throughout the whole month of May because of the awful forest fire the weather had been been almost unbearably hot, unless the time the wind had blown west or south-east, including no threat, the heat at night to say more intolerable in the open country than in the big cities, though there too it was not enough. Then because of the steadily wild advance of the forest fire, the average fury of the advancing foe and other dreadful disturbances of the surrounding forest war in many cities and towns every body was hurrying away from towns, seek seclusion and other places to which they were not so strongly possessed by Christian animosity.
Mary feeling that Pando was too much harassed by the foe and then to the captured and would only be a refuge was the next day house Christian mission. A woman by the name of Mrs. Scott was the next day house keeper of General Hindes' headquarters and she was talking of Christian mission coming forward to aid General Vivanna who was retreating toward Pando. All stories and the like in Pando were being closed, and the battle was near Pando sounded like a steady distant thumping of muffled drums.

When Mrs. Pando was in action much was these days--still remained in whose lines were in action much was these days--still remained in his position, though the enemy "made a mistake and though they were a fatal way" against him." and that he was a breakfast man. There was some where else too pointed that Mrs. Pando was a fight was raging along a hundred mile front with all the fury of the world war itself. But its location could not be determined though it was feared it was at El Paso. Angeline Aronburg had sat patiently reading some good who like to Violet and some of her sisters who had remained with her who were more sturdy in constitution to bear that while than the others were, while upstairs in the hot room Catherine sat alone, through this long soot-choking hot day, with the same black sky overhead, and a red sun trying to shine through it, trying vainly to be cheerful and brave and forget that the sorrow and worry which was not possible, trying vainly to find the old amusement in reading. She and her sisters had stayed nearly half a day in church that morning praying and weeping in turn, however, the hot weather did not do good with the little girls who were sisters, they bore it patiently and Angeline Aronburg had notched with an almost unbearable patience, as she saw the little faces she loved so dearly, growing pale and thin day by day since the loss was not known, refusing hardly to eat anything, and noted the weary illiquid notes in their sweet voices, that still despite their cruel unjust trial caused by the enemy still never had one word of complaint to utter.

Pando, Mrs. Pando himself was out trying to find means to have his two sisters located. He never said a word, about it, didn't seem to be worried about them, was at his ease, and laughed as gaily as before it happened, but his sisters could see it by his face at times that there was a more aching heart within him than probably within them.

On this particular evening May the 23rd Aunt Mary was feeling more tired and anxious than usual. The day at Angeline Aronburg had been extremely hot with a south easterly wind, the atmosphere smoky, and the sky so heavy that the sun didn't even show itself, and the wind temperature of the swiftest when it was off the southeast, made every body suffer in sequence. It was not dark but the sky was a strange yellow greenish gray in tone, and the atmosphere was almost smothering in heat. Aunt Mary's head ached because of the heat, and she was very very tired, but she walked fast in spite of the heat for Jennie and Angeline were expecting her and they must not be kept waiting.
Her housekeeper opened the front door to their aunt.

"Well this certainly has been a awful hot day, hasn't it?" she exclaimed as Mrs. Aronburg Aronburg stepped into the hall which did feel delightfully cool after the heat and smoky atmosphere of the street. "You look just about ready to drop too you poor good woman."

"I'm exhausted" she answered admitted with a smile. "But I suppose I ought not to mind the heat, as I am a southerner, but then this is heat that never was felt in the hottest summer. It's terrible I'll admit and such smoky air, and no sunshine. The sun is certainly not creating this heat I'll say."

"Well those poor little neices of yours minds it whether you mind or not."
said the housekeeper a little sadly. "Even that poor child they brought to you-- she doesn't look a bit well; she hardly tasted her lunch to day, and neither did you neices. I brought them a nice glass of lemonade and some cookies this dreadful afternoon, thinking they might like something, but when I went to take away the glasses and plates a few minutes ago, I found the one little Nell had eaten only one cookie, though she did drink the lemonade. Your two neices only drank half a glass apiece, letting Nell have another from their division before they drank. I never saw two little girls so generous. Can't you manage to take the two back to Pando and get them out of this terrific heat and bring little Nell back so that it would do them all the good in the world if you could."

Mrs. Vivian shook her head sadly.
"I'm afraid, couldn't take little Nell any where at present" she said. "My neices won't chance so far a trip in these dreadful times I know, and they'll be going back to Pando as soon as they said they must join their sisters and brothers--they'll be very busy. I could have Mrs. Vivian take her but she is afraid to leave town because she is afraid of the Glendalvillians--and even then I scarcely know--do you really think little Nell is ill Mrs.
Scott?"

"Well I don't say she's exactly ill" said the housekeeper, touched by the anxious expression on the Mrs. Pando's face. "But I can't change and far from the anxious expression of the Mrs. Pando's face. "But I can't change and far from the would be a splendid thing for the half my sister would not have such a big family of her own that she never has room for any one outside. I daresay I'd take little Nell to Abyssinville with me for you know, and that's all I daresay not so away from Angeline Aronburg myself."

"You are very kind" said Aunt Mary, impulsively holding out her hand and "a second saw that her hand was trembling" was trying and managing to give "You little Nell, a change this year if possible though I can't see just how it can be done."

Then Aunt Mary hurried away up to her room, and the house-keeper went off to see about dinner. A supper what ever you call it. Jennie and Angeline were sitting in that cold place by the window, Jennie in a low rocker, with some sort of a big book on her lap, but no story was being read. It was now being read for the third time, it was only natural that a little of the original interest should have worn off, especially when it was so silly, and at the moment when Aunt Mary entered the room Jennie's busy fingers were scripping idly on the page before her, and she was leaning back in her chair with a listless tired expression on the pale little beautiful face, that it was not her fault that she was asleep in her chair, and little Nell was in the wash room bathing her head in cool water to give herself some relief from the heat. But when she was aroused by her aunt's voice she started up from the heat. But when she was of old, and when Aunt Mary had taken off her hat, she threw herself down on the big lounge.

"Have my little nieces, and this friend be very uncomfortable to do to day?" Then Aunt Mary asked anxiously, laying her hand on Jennie's beautiful little head. "Oh no, not very. It was pretty warm with the hot wind blowing against this side of the house, but I kept those windows shut, and what do you think I really fell asleep and had quite a long nap. I had such a lovely dream too. I thought you, and my dear mother and sister and father and mother, were all in some beautiful country for the day, that it was long ago after this way, that there was no more war, and you were all driving my little pony and our traps were full of flowers. Penrod had put a flower wreath around our heads and said they made us look prettier than when we were just as nice dream, and then Angeline called me and, woke up and found such pleasant things happened. We were feeling so this way, and wishing we could have a nice drink of something cold when in came Miss Scout with three lovely glasses of lemonade and some cookies—wasn't it kind of her?"

"Mary," said her Aunt wondering why Jennie didn't tell of that good deed to little Nell. "Jennie," she added after a moment's pause. "Do you know I have made up my mind to go with you to see your mother and father."

Jennie gave a violent start. "It's nearly two weeks since I've been there," she said. "I have never heard one word from any body not even your father at first. I tried to hope it was because your father and the others may have been busy, but now I'm afraid all correspondence would have been cut off by the enemy as I see your last letter to you sister has brought no answer."

"Oh no," said Angeline herself, earnestly. "I'm quite sure that hasn't happened. Our route from Pandora to here was perfectly clear and our trains were never interrupted. Oh Aunt dear please don't write yet—not for any more. Let's go ourselves there and surprise them."

Aunt Mary started in astonishment at the little flushed excited face that only the moment before had been so pale and languid. "What don't you want me to write Jennie dear and Angeline too?" she questioned wonderingly.

"Because, because the correspondence might get into enemy hands." "I suppose you think that just as long as we don't hear anything from your sisters and father, there is also danger that the correspondence might have fallen into enemy hands," he Aunt said, softly stroking Jennie's cheek, and putting Angeline on the head. "Well we'll go to Pandora, the three of us, and the house-keeper will take care of little Nell but, know it's only postponing the evil day."

"It would be the most beautiful country in the world if there was no war," thought Angeline to herself. "Oh Aunt dear," she then said. "We can start as soon as possible?"

"Yes, but I'm afraid it might make a hazardous trip. My dear don't you think it is better since you came here that you have never heard a word from your mother and father?"

"He did," she said four times," said Angeline, rather apologetically. "Violet wrote he did, but for some reason or other his letters never came. Violet told me he was good loving letters too. That is why I did not want you to write to him. I'm afraid Penrod's letters got into a trap, and you might write to him and be told we are a hardy lot."

"Did you tell your sister you were coming here?" "Yes, and oh how they hated to see us go. I tried to go to and so did Angeline but we had to it seemed to save little Nell."

Then Aunt Mary looked a little troubled. "They don't look like my dear ones?" "I wish you little girls had not done that my dear ones?" "Why not?" inquired Angeline in a tone of astonishment. "Even they did not want to see anything happen to little Nell and you wouldn't want to see it happen would you?"

He Aunt Mary's frightened over the little hand but she answered with forced cheerfulness:

"No of course not, but the going back may not be so easy you know. I don't suppose anything happened on that point. You dear mother and sister couldn't possibly stand it without you for even a week if they knew something happened to you. They are more sensitive than many children you know. They are now and worry quick you know."

"I know they would miss me but I told them it would not be for long," said Jennie simply. "We could start on the return to them to night if you wish."

"They would miss you more than I can tell. They would not need to worry if this awful war wasn't going on. I guess you would like to go back as soon as possible wouldn't you. You miss them too I know?"

"Oh yes we should like it very much and we would like you to come with us too. I love my dear brother and sister but, could enjoy most things better if, knew they were very happy."

"And they should be happy," said Aunt Mary quickly. "I don't know of anything that would make them any happier just now than to see you little girls return to them, and with me too. A long I can't myself afford to have anything happen to you or them under any conditions and if it should and you now under my care you father would hold me justly responsible. Gene and Uncle Hanson's army isn't going to advance until his lines are more firm he's been in action for three weeks now so he wrote me, and if I should attempt to go to him I might not get you there at all as to travel in that direction is awfully difficult and dangerous. Perhaps Penrod has stopped writing because he got no answers but I believe you had better go back to them before it is too late. We'll start at ten o'clock to night."

"We might as well as we have seldom been away from each other," said Jennie with a little quiver in her voice.

"I know that my dear, and I dare say it would break their hearts to you if they had to part too long from you when there is no telling what will happen, and it will make me and them happy to see them again. I'll see to it that you'll be expected for only a little while, though I wish you had not done this as traveling back isn't so easy."

Before Jennie and Angeline could answer, little Nell just came out of the wash room drying her hair, and then there was a knock at the door.

Little Nell threw the towel on the back of a chair. "Let me open it," she cried eagerly. "You three seem so comfortable, I don't want you to move."

She flew to the door returning in a moment with two envelopes in her hand.

"Two letters Aunt," said Jennie as Nell handed them to the princess. "We're do you suppose they are from?" she said handing them to her aunt.

"One is for you," said Aunt Mary taking it from Jennie's outstretched hand—and yes, I'm sure it's from Penrod, this one got through, for it's got the Pandora city post mark on it."

"Oh do read it please," cried the two girls together to whom the receipt of a receipt of a letter was an event of considerable importance. Aunt Mary cut open the envelope, and read:

"Pandora city.
May the 26th 1913. O-1914

Dear sisters both, I and your dear sister at home want you to come back now for we believe you have stayed with Aunt Mary just as long as you possibly could. We wouldn't do any if times were good but you are in danger of your return trip and the sooner you can come the easier it will be. Jennie's little pony is well and all our other pets and we will again have lovely times together before our fur-lough is up. I and your sister are very lonely and father says he'll be glad when you are with us he too is lonely and worried. Haven't much time writing letters so I can't say any more so please write as soon as you can and tell me what day you will come. Good bye till you come. From your loving brother Penrod Pete, Alvin."

Aunt Mary looked up from the letter with a smile. "How odd that it should have come just now while we were talking about it," she said. "though I can tell by the date this is one of the letters which was delayed. You would really like to go back for you know it would make your sister a happy again wouldn't you darling?"

"You really believe it would be safe for us to go back to Pandora?" both questioned still a little anxiously.

"Quite sure" was her answer prompt reply. "Then" said Jennie herself slowly and with a little sigh of intense satisfaction. "I should think we'd like to return better than anything else as they must be very busy about us and we are lonely for them as well. I really feel now as if we wished we had't come after all. For some reason I dread the home and trip. Somethings wrong some where I can feel it."

"You funny little girls" said Aunt Mary kissing them both. "We will consider it settled then, and I will write a letter for you to Pandora after dinner tooning it by telegram saying that we are coming and will be there within a two days you say. I don't think we could reach Pandora before that, you must remember it took you nearly two days to get here when you came. Also you'll need some different clothes to put on, and I must manage to somehow get you some fitting disguises."

Jennie's bright face clouded.

"I wish you didn't have to go to the bother to have to do that just for us," she said regretfully. "Do you think the three of us really need to disguise?"

"Yes I really do," said Aunt Mary with decision. "I can't really let any thing happen to you two as you are so much more precious than any thing I work for." Jennie sighed. When Aunt Mary spoke in that tone there was never the least use in arguing with her.

"But here's the other letter," Angelina exclaimed with a sudden recollection. "I was forgetting all about giving it to you. It's for you, Aunt Mary."

Aunt Mary held out her hand rather indifferently for her correspondence for some reason or other was never very interesting these days. Next moment her hands changed and she exclaimed in astonishment:

"Why it's from Henry Gale at Pandora!" Perhaps she was a civilian had written him to ask my consent to your going back with me—however nice of him isn't it."

Jennie and Angelina made no answer. At the words "Henry Gale at Pandora," their cheeks gave one great bound, and then almost seemed to stand still. Aunt Mary tore open the letter, read the first first line, then uttered a low alarm-alarm and astonished cry, and sank back in her chair trembling from head to foot.

"What is it?—Oh Aunt Mary what does it say?" gasped both little girls, as Jennie seized the paper which her aunt in her surprise had let fall in her lap.

"It's about the city of St Thomas the direction I planned to go, why Nicodemus how can it tell me I knew that city was in danger?"

Read "Read it, read it," cried both girls again almost besides themselves with impatience, with an effort Aunt Mary recovered her self possession, took up the letter again, and read in a shaking voice:

"Dear Misses Hanson and Vivian

In reference to your inquiry of the situation near St Thomas city which you placed with us some days ago, we would say that our members have given the matter considerable investigation and are so surprised by the situation that we warn that any passage in that direction is impossible as a huge Glandelinian army is in that location under one of the Hanley's. Do not attempt a trip in that direction as a battle is raging along a hundred mile front with the enemy pressing. Take the Evangeline St Clair to that city, and transfer on the Mc-Hollister and Pandora lines. That is the only open road that is known. Awaiting your reply we remain

Very truly yours

Henry Gale Gemini Branch.

Pandora. Calvevil Calvevil.

"On the enemy are in possession of it" said Jennie. "Then we'll have to go the longer route but it is safe."

So it was settled and late that evening they were ready, and little Nell clung about the necks of each princess in turn, and cried a little, and Aunt Mary cried too although she pretended she was only laughing and was very careful to dash away the tears before Nell could see them. Then came a last parting kiss, an anxious "You'll take good care of little Nell Sarah until I get back" from Aunt Mary, a hearty promise from Sarah, and then almost before the two little girls realized it they were in the train being whirled rapidly away from the great city, toward Evangeline St Clair city. At the start it was a most pleasant ride, and the train stopped at two big towns without any mishap. Then on it went again, telegraph and the telegraph. Angelina and Jennie trying to get a little sleep. The train had been running very fast by now, when the coach on which Aunt Mary and the two little girls were on with other passenger came to a sudden violent stop that shook them from their seats. The sudden stopping was followed by a crash and every window went out apart of the roof crashed in and a piercing chorus of shrieks came from a number of passengers, but though the coach was dreadfully crushed, Jennie, Angelina and their aunt escaped without injury and in their excitement scrambled from the wreckage when they heard loud yells, and the sound of firing all of a sudden. They realized the train was attacked by Glandelinians and that now they were coming on to attack and capture the passengers.

"Quick! Aunt Mary! Get ready!" cried Jennie drawing her pistol. "I'll fight the Glandelinians, and so will Angelina."

They left the coach by a window and though some shots came close they were not hit. They could see many flashes from Glandelinians in the distance, but looking carefully they saw that the train was not surrounded, so they crawled under one of the still standing coaches and got to the other side of the coach just as the Glandelinians came rushing forward firing as they ran and shouting their defiance and defiance as no answering shots came from the coaches. Any of the passengers had been killed in the wreck including women and children, and those who were not were not soldiers, neither were they armed and had no means of which to defend themselves. Finally seeing there was no shooting shooting in answer the Glandelinians came up some lightning lanterns.

"Confound it!" cried one of the leaders. "We wrecked a passenger train. No soldiers here."

"Well take the survivors as prisoners any way," Jennie heard the others say.

However there were not many passengers to be taken prisoners for the great number were killed or injured and some still the wreckage was catching fire. The engine and fireman had leaped when the engine ran into the det rail, and were killed in that fall.

"Stop, stop!" cried one of the Glandelinian officers. "They you fall one three goes three fugitives running to the woods. They'll tell what we did. Get them."

A number of soldiers seeing one large figure and two small ones running some slight distance off mounted their horses and gave chase all being cavalry who had attacked the train. Six were on horse back and were rapidly overtaking the three fugitives.

There was a two sudden bursts of flame from the fugitives, the loud reports of revolvers and that many Glandelinians tripped from their horses. The other four were in consternation, and before this clatter gave the order to fire, two more toppled off, but at that time about thirty rode up to help them and answered with clattering fire. Jennie and Angelina by that time had gained the shade of the trees, and opened such a steady fire that the Glandelinians were really afraid to charge. Finally the firing stopped, and calling for help, the whole attacking force got ready and made a sudden and fierce charge for the woods, but when they got there saw no one, but in the confusion of the fight Aunt Mary had been separated from the two girls, and being unable to find them the next morning, had gone to a neighboring town and had at once sent in a report of the disaster to Hendrick Dargard of the Main Gemini headquarters at Angelina Agathia. Christian cavalry had come up but the attackers were gone, and the sound of the train wreck had died a horrible death by fire.

Despite all that might have been said or worried about, Jennie and Angelina could not be lost in the deepest recesses of the Mc-Hollister woods if they tried. They knew all woods, all roads, and places like their own name. But they had to seek the recesses as Heaven knows how tenaciously they were pursued by the pursuing enemy. If they could make the enemy lose themselves in the labyrinth of these woods they would easily have retailed. But the blow to them was their separation from their aunt and they feared she was captured.

After feeling sure they had escaped their enemies for the time being Jennie and Angelina decided that was called the main road, but here they paused for a moment under uncertainty in which direction to turn. If they saw the road any they would surely encounter their pursuers.

"We can't in a hurry go down this road," Jennie decided to Angelina. "A party of the pursuing cavalry would be sure to come at night down here looking for us. I guess we'll have to go far into the woods, and go as far as we can in order to make the enemy get lost. When we are safe we are safe from pursuit we can escape from this forest for ever. The way is pretty well. Only those who don't go will be helplessly lost."

For ten minutes they walked on steadily, without stopping, keeping their heads and eyes both active; then as they heard no pursuing coming they became more hopeful and though they began to feel very warm and tired, and also sleepy. But to leave to stop now would be fatal. The weather was just as hot as if the Sun was beating down on you in an August day in no other Africa, and not a breeze stirred the leaves of the forest. Jennie herself paused for a moment believing she heard creeping foot steps, feeling half inclined to turn back and away, but Angelina opposed her idea. Both wanted to rest and which they could have done if there was only a hiding place, for though it was night, for some reason or other it seemed as if the woods were not as dark as night, it usually should be. Several night animals had passed the two little girls, but men in and they felt that they couldn't stand it.

"You three boys leave the room," said Penrod. "He added decidedly to the members of the Gemini. 'I can't I must stay by them. They want me and I must not leave. What you need to try and say to them goes to me too as I'm their brother.' Tim bowed and he and the others left the room."

"You look worse than you poor sister," said Dargan. "You don't even cry. It would do you all the good in the world to cry if you could."

"It's impossible," said Penrod in a hoarse whisper. "It seems to some that I've given gold and haven't less about my sister, for it has been over a week now since they were gone and I have not shed a single tear and yet they were not back yet. I've tried hard to cry but I can't. The Glandelinians are responsible for this, and if anything has happened to them I'll go into the enemy lines and kill Manley if I get killed for it."

The sleep of the housekeeper's arms came about him. "My dear Prince," she said tenderly. "Have you asked our dear blessed Lord to help you bear this trouble, and to intercede for your sister and bring back Jennie and Angeline to you?"

"You are asking me a foolish question," said Penrod almost hotly. "Of course I have asked the Lord for them. I turn and a novena begins in their behalf to night and continues for nine days. It better be answered too if those confounded Glandelinians know what's good for them. I can't bear it because the way they treat my sister and friends and won't. It seems unjust that all the good people have sufferings and terrible sorrows in this world, even many that go in means to it, and my sister and I are unusually good. I don't know why but I dreamed last night that I saw my sister angels weeping. I always feel sure that God does hear when we all pray to Him for things, but probably no matter how good we are it isn't always best for us that our prayers should be granted. But I know He always hears. And now Mrs. Jerry I'm going only when my Father comes. Until then I must stay with them, but when he comes I will have to go. I got things to say to him."

"Why don't you try and have your sister found?" said Mrs. Jerry. "I'm doing every thing I can," said Penrod raising his head with sudden energy. "My sister has been so good I can't bear to have them suffer all this desperate."

"Well you certainly are a good boy," said Mrs. Jerry, and even his sister despite their sorrow couldn't keep from smiling lovingly at Penrod. "You only think of your dear sister and not for yourself. Why don't you go down stairs while you are waiting for your father and try to comfort poor General Evans."

"Oh dear," wailed little Daisy. "He is so good to us, and he's about as sad as we are. He is not selfish. Penrod dear, we need you so bad we'll send for you. Go and comfort the poor man."

"All right," said sister. "I know he's gruff and short in his manners but he's got the kindest heart of any one I ever knew and he just about loves you little sister of mine as if you were his own."

Penrod then left the room slowly and going down found the great General and friend standing before a window with his hands behind his back. But his face was miserable and sad too. He was afraid too that Jennie and Angeline might have surely perished in the fires sweeping those dreadful woods and would never come back and if they didn't perish yet the very next hour then would decide the fate of the two he loved so well. There was a slight sound behind him and he turned around to meet the gaze of Prince Penrod whose own manly eyes were filled with unmeasured grief and misery. He at once came forward.

"Can I do anything special for you Prince?" he asked in a tone that Penrod scarcely recognized. It was so low and gentle.

"No," said Penrod in a rather unsteady voice. "It isn't that I and my sister are very lonely for you, and little Daisy, and I can see you are very unhappy and lonely too. For I know you are very loving toward my dear sister."

"Love your dear sister?" the General repeated slowly and there indeed was a strange ring in his voice, and a strange gleam in his eyes. "I think I am fonder than I have ever been of any human being even than of myself."

"And that surely is my sister?" he asked softly. "I know you know a lot about my sister more than I do."

Evans gave a violent start. "Where and how do you know about that information?" he demanded sharply. "Not much, only from what I have heard, and that my little sister loves you about as equally as they do. Father and mother Mrs. Jerry told you that and I thought perhaps that is the reason why you cared for them so much."

"Mrs. Jerry told you that, did she? What else did she tell you?" "There was no evading the steady gaze of those keen blue eyes, but Penrod met the gaze without flinching; he had nothing to fear of the good General who was thus excited.

"That is all," he said quite quietly.

"He didn't tell you what I know of Manley, that of all Glandelinians he is the most heartless brute, who mainly caused all the sorrows and troubles of your dear sister, caused them that dreadful sorrow and separation and Jennie to be sold to that beast Antonia St. Louis, and a all other dreadful nameless things, because not for any really, but because they are such unusually good little girls, and that he did it too with the purpose to blaspheme God in action? He didn't tell you how I found out how when once Jennie herself was alone, and her sister far away at Angelina Agatha, and that Manley strove to do all in his power to kill her and prevent all their letters to reach her, and made it appear as if she returned all their letters unopened?"

"No," said Penrod. "She never told me that."

"Well if she had it would have been nothing but the simple truth. There are a thousand things written down in your Father's Sacred Record book he wouldn't let you see under any conditions because you couldn't bear reading of it, and that you or the whole nation of Abbiounia, I and your Father and Uncle, mother and Aunt and all your brothers and relatives can and never and would never forgive Glandelinia for."

Penrod stepped back aghast.

"Sit down my dear Prince," said Evans, abruptly waving him toward a chair. "I'm very sorry to shock you so but it is my duty to inform you so you'll know what to plan in defense of your sister in the future. Now then suppose you tell me something about yourself. Tell me your experiences over in the United States, and all you learned there."

Penrod did, it being a lengthy detail.

"And you say you are afraid if within a month Jennie and Angeline didn't return we turn your sister will not be able to bear it."

Penrod nodded, he dared not trust himself to speak.

"You must have some plans surely to have them located."

"I have done all I could. I have a few known cousins in the south, and have notified them by wireless, but there is no one who can penetrate those woods, unless they are acquainted with all the roads and passages. I never knew the little girls were my sister until the day it was revealed to me, though when I came back to this country I always swore that paper-woman did look like my father but wasn't sure. I thought I was all alone in the world, an orphan."

"Jennie once told me that she always was sure that she and her sister had seen you once living with father," he told me that before it was known," said Evans, now about your two big brothers—did they know you were lost at the time?"

"I didn't know much about them," said Penrod with a slightly heightened color.

"But I found out my mother was an only child of some very holy family; I believe she as I heard quite a while ago had quite a generation of Saints, and even now has few but good near relatives."

"Grand mother and Grand father both dead I suppose?"

"My Grand father died when my mother was at the age of sixteen. I am not sure about my Grand mother she may be dead too."

"Hm, murdered by the enemy, I suppose."

"No, no oh no, I don't think so. Father said that he couldn't tell whether she was alive or not but the enemy never injured her. There was some trouble however between Glandelinians and our Holy Family at the time of Father's Holy marriage to my mother and we have heard that her sister married my uncle Hanson Vivian and that Angelina Aronburg is our cousin, but General Conscientian Aronburg's daughter as both my mother and aunt was Conscientian Aronburg's sister."

"There was a short pause Evans looked out the window and then began to draw rather nervously with his fingers on the table where he had seated himself. He was the first to speak.

"What was your good Mother's name before she married your good Father the King?" he asked abruptly.

Penrod hesitated.

"I suppose you will think it very strange," he said, "but really I do not know. I forgot to ask my sister that, and they have never mentioned the maiden name for fear it'll leak out to the enemy. Because of that too for fear it will be a I never had liked to ask my father about it."

"Don't know your mother's maiden name? Well that sure is a queer state of things. She didn't often mention her family then?"

"He often spoke of her father—she loved him very dearly, but she never spoke of him or also for fear of the enemy when doing things."

A wave of some strong emotion swept over Jack Evans face and for a moment the hand resting on the table trembled visibly, but Penrod was too much occupied with his own sad thoughts to notice it. Then he spoke, and his voice shook in spite of all his greatest efforts at self control.

"and your sisters, they love me so much too you say--love me dearly to the last, in spite of everything!"

Penrod gave a start. Something in Jack Evans' strange manner suddenly struck the prince as decidedly odd. He also quickly glanced into the general's white set face and then the next instant started impulsively to his feet.

"General, believe you are ill. If you are I can do something for you. Oh and I am sorry if I have made a mistake and said anything to hurt you. I forgot that my sisters always loved you so much. Let me do something to help you please."

"You have not hurt me, and I'm far from being ill too a strong will like me ought not to start talking about being ill, unless I'm ill at heart, so you need not worry about that. I got down again my good prince and told me some more about your good mother--I've got an idea I used to know her long ago when I was a little child slave ten years old."

"You know our mother when you was a child slave? I didn't even know you was a child slave or knew our mother then."

"I knew a little girl who answers pretty well to her description. I was at the wedding as best man when she married your father Emperor Robert Peter-Vivian."

"Yes, yes, that is my father's name. Oh how strange it seems that you should have known them; why did you not tell me before?"

"Because, because I thought your sisters told you all that."

"What made you enter the Army General when you got away from being a child slave and grew to be a man?"

"Because--because," said Evans slowly and his brow darkened fiercely and his eyes gleamed savagely many years ago when I was still a child, at eleven years of age I made a vow. I vowed to myself that as long as I might live, I would never forget and give Glandelinia, because one of your mother's youngest sisters was also a slave and because she was so good a little girl the Glandelinians burned her at the stake. I was a friend of hers even to love young as I was and she loved me. If she lived you and your sisters would have had two aunts: he was the stolen daughter of your father's sister of general Aronburg who was a young boy at the time. I at first vowed I would never forgive Glandelinia, never to have anything to do with her or her sons. I never resented my own sufferings, I bore them meekly."

"You made that vow," said Penrod turning pale at the horrible tale of the death of his other aunt when she was a little girl--"you must have known my mother and her two sisters then, very well,--oh Evans tell me what does it mean?"

"It means that Glandelinia is a brute on the face of the earth--a hard hearted selfish brutal nation. Her wicked pride caused all this disaster now happening and the memory of that righteous vow might have kept me from revealing it now if it were not for your own good little sisters and you too. I have known who even you are from the first day I saw you, but never dared reveal it yet. The likeness to your sister that is your likeness was and is without mistake, and then there was the name. There was only one Penrod name in the whole of Abbeinnia at this time, and you were it, and that had been of a little boy who had been a little son stolen from Emperor Vivian. Your sister Violet if dressed like a boy as you are would have passed for her living brother and that is you, Penrod. That is why when going to school though you disguised as Violet, you never Heaven knows fooled me, though you fooled others. There is now a million proofs that you are their brother without mistake. Joice herself and also Angelina and three of your sisters Daisy, Catherine and Violet, and you too could pass for the living image of your mother if you mother was their age."

"Their age," repeated Penrod, in growing bewilderment. "My mother was a Saint and was a child slave. You know her and her two sisters long ago--was there to you any recollection of her name?"

"Your mother's name was Joice St. Claire Aronburg, your mother's dead sister was Aggie Gertrude Aronburg, and your aunt name was Mildred Ann Aronburg. Your traitor atrocious son had a good deal to do too with the sad fate of you--dead sisters all these months of the war that also broke their hearts and broke your father's and mother's at the same time. They drove him justly and justly from their duties, they justly refused to see him unless he repented and came back to God and Country, they returned his letter unopened. He now or has broken their hearts more yet by becoming a Glandelinian general. Glandelinia was responsible. There for can any one ever forgive the wrong all Glandelinia did to your whole family including you too and not only your sisters but father, mother, and brothers. If I had been able to have married your Aunt's sister I also would have been your uncle. I often see her in my dreams and she seems often to say as she appears 'Don't weep for me, for my sake avenge the wrongs done to my elder sisters little daughters.'"

"And have you ever planned to avenge them."

"Your own little sisters will tell you I have avenged them, and will continue to avenge them."

There was a sound outside the door, and Henry Gale entered the room followed by a soldier without noticing the agitation on the faces of the boy and man, he talked up straight to them both, and took Penrod's hand in his.

"Prince," he said very gently "I want you to prepare yourself for a great shock. All investigations seem to prove that no trace of your sisters can be found in the Glandelinian woods, and the fires are sweeping now St. Thomas. Your little sisters are more grief stricken than ever for rumors have it that Jennie and Angelina have perished, but don't lose hope for we do not believe it can be possible. I have consulted with your sisters, the permission to go out ourselves with all our members of the Gemini, and try find traces of them within Glandelinian encampments in disguise. They may have been captured. We'll go there to night, and provided no unforeseen complications arise, we see every reason to believe we'll find them if the rumors are not true, that they have perished. You'll have to go to your sisters now and cheer them. Your father is home and going to do something desperate, but he said to me you must remain with your sisters until you can bring them a little more to themselves. Then he says you must scout with your remnant division of child scouts to see if any trace of them is found. He knows you'll rescue them at any risk."

"I surely will," said Penrod, and he rose to go politely saying good night to Evans and leaving him with the Gemini leader.

Penrod went up the stairs indeed with a slow melancholy step but he did not cry. He couldn't cry. He was only choked up and his heart felt as heavy as lead. As he neared the door he heard weeping and quickly pushed it open. His youngest sisters were crying bitterly, but the eldest lay on their beds in a sort of apathy. Penrod was now terribly distressed indeed he had one little girl in each arm in a moment and was kissing and soothing them as best as he could.

"Don't cry so my sisters dear, please don't the rumors may not be true," he pleaded. "Why you don't even know yet that it is really true. Your father is so good, and so fond of you, and so powerful he'll do all he can, and your two sisters are angel possessed, I don't believe they'd let any harm come to them."

"The angels I am afraid couldn't help it, oh they couldn't help it," wailed Violet. "Then dear blessed Lord was in his agony in the Garden, the Angels had to let him go to his cruel death too, they never could do anything unless he let them strike his enemies. Mary the Waitress we had lost her child the same way, and she told us all about it. He never saw her little boy since. Oh it is terrible. Oh Penrod we don't want to lose our sisters,--we don't--we don't."

"But I'm sure our dear blessed Lord would defend his loved ones more than himself as He usually does," urged Penrod. "I don't believe we have lost our dear Jennie and Angelina for good, that does not seem possible."

"I don't believe they'll ever come back," said Joice mournfully from the bed. The Gemini told us all about it. It was dreadful. If they are in the forest they must have really perished, the woods are being all aflame in the St. Thomas Section and St. Thomas is burning and the Glandelinian camps and all the soldiers are driven before it while fighting it. My Mary wired it was in the St. Thomas section of the forest they fled and that is aflame. Of if it is true we can't stand it any longer. It is better for us to go with them."

"Oh Joy dear don't lose hope please don't," pleaded Penrod. "I don't believe they have perished, because there was a saying I heard once 'If an angel possessed child perishes the angel perishes with him, and an angel cannot perish.'"

"Up at the angel would leave if he was in danger like that," sobbed Catherine. "Then the angel would disobey God," said Penrod, "and with angels that is impossible. Once an angel possessed child that angel possesses you for all eternity. No that cannot be. I don't believe the rumors. I never heard of a sister's."

But poor Daisy had broke down once more and burying her pretty little face on Penrod's shoulder began to cry wildly as heart broken as she was until Penrod hugged her closely to him as she sobbed;

"The Gemini said it was impossible to rescue any one from those woods and if they did not perish in flames they'll die of starvation. Oh we don't want to lose Jennie and Angelina."

There was a pause. The bright color had gone out of Penrod's face but his arms had tightened about the quivering child and when he spoke his voice, though low was not steady, yet was very kind.

"Are you really beginning to lose hope that some day they will never return, even if the news did seem so true?"

"Of course it would," said Daisy. "For forest fires are dreadful things, we have nearly perished in them on many occasions, and I know of many who did too. Ch Pen-rod don't you think you could find means to see whether they can come back or not?"

"I'll do anything, go through hell and all to get them back" said Pen-rod bitterly. "But perhaps it wouldn't be of any use. I do not know the location of that section of the woods."

"Oh yes it would I'm sure it would" said Violet eagerly. "That is if you could do you - India n Tricks. We would come with you and help you, and a lot of boy and girls too. Oh dear Pen-rod we do oh love you so very much, but I know Jennie and Angeline loved you oh much better. You could do something."

"I'll do anything," said Pen-rod. "I can for Father has a plan but just now he said I must remain with you for a while. While I'm to stay go out with all your the boy and girl scout regiments and see what we can do, but we can't do anything until he says so. I have to wait. But I'm going to get them back, oh cheer up little sisters dear. This seems our worse cross and indeed I feel as if there'll be not much more following after this. Father is angry, he suspects Manley and he'll try to give Manley all the trouble he can for it."

It was now Sunday the First Sunday in June, and Pen-rod had been the first one sleeping with his sisters to get up. In fact no one slept that Saturday night because of the distress and sorrow which kept them awake. Joy was marked sadly before they came down stairs to wash themselves themselves that she had a headache, and Pen-rod looking suspiciously at her head remarked that he hoped it would not be very bad and had her bathe her forehead in cold water to appease it.

The Walk to Church was a very silent one with their Father and Mother and Evans and the three boys who accompanied them, and unhappy Violet and her sisters always had a strict idea respecting Sunday behaviour and they walked in front of each other, hand in hand, Pen-rod having Violet's. They thought sadly of their happy Sundays with Jennie and Angeline, and suddenly felt more sad and lonely than ever before since they missed their two sisters. The feeling of loneliness and sadness increased rather than diminished when they had reached the Church, and they found themselves seated in the front pew after having first knelt to say their prayer. The sound of the Organ made them sad some how, though it had never done so before, and before they realized what was happening, they were again tearful. Of course they dashed them away as quickly as they could, but almost before they were dry, there were more tears in their place and some of them were forced to make a hasty search for their handkerchief for under any conditions they didn't want to be seen crying. At Mass for progress of the services seemed to comfort them a little and they were able to resist it, and by the time the Sermon had begun they had managed to fight it off. They stayed at every Mass and then were loath to leave the Church, though slightly a sense of peace and comfort had stolen over them.

The service from Church was a melancholy one, and they all had hoped to see Jennie and Angeline either coming off a passing street car or coming down the street arm in arm. What had made them feel sad and yet more alighted was that at the ending of the sermon the Priest had spoken of the distress of the Princesses, and had asked the Congregation at every Mass to come at the Novena novena and pray for their return. That first Sunday night, the Vivian Royal family attended, and if they had not had their own special pews I don't believe they could have got in. Not just to say a word, but that Church was a "Bardine Can" that night, and a long army of people crowded the streets outside the Church so that Cars had to stop to wait until the first Night Novena was over. And now they were on their return home. They ate very little supper, and stayed up dreadfully late that night, ardently hoping against hope that the two little girls would return. But it was in vain. No Jennie or Angeline showed up. Also Emperor Vivians army was in action even though the enemy didn't press as fierce as the battle was. It was a foolish hope to win it, but the enemy was desperately striving just the same and it was threatening to be one of the bloodiest battles of the raging day and night.

Though Emperor Vivian, Pen-rod, and the others, the whole Christian army soon knew of the loss of two of the Vivian girl Princesses, and that probably was the reason for the Christian armies fighting so savagely that day. The whole of Emperor Vivians army had been at death grips with the Glandelinian armies. Other armies also had thrown in their forces into the balance in defense of all portions of the Christian lines. All day long the battle had raged, and louder than usual in any battle before had been the clash of all kinds of fire arms and the thunders of cannon and fierce was the impact of fighting dust. Sometimes the Glandelinian hosts were in possession of the works, and the Christian flags had seemed to be in the dust. Indeed all day long the victory trembled in the balance or oscillated back and forth apparently awaiting the side that could muster a final and decisive blow. Along

At eventide a long Hansom long battle line itself the enemy dreadful continued a terribly storm the fiercest ever witnessed and heard before a disconcerted many divisions, to a to pieces whole columns of men by the enemy had mowed down many whole lines of soldiers and blown up long lines of works and set encampments and many towns on fire. The Glandelinians yelling their dreadful blasphemous battle cries had charged in like a vigorous powerful tidal wave, closed with immense portions of the Christian line and drove them back pell-mell. They went on gallantly victorious, but General Hindenrune's army had already put itself into position and met the victorious assailants like a breakwater, ripping apart a gigantic wave, with fierce and fearless abandon the Concentric soldier fighting now like man men hurled themselves into the waves of the Glandelinians. The Glandelinians loathe to lose the victory so easy within their grasp fought tenaciously beyond description, throwing immeasurable fury in their opposition, and would not be beaten under any conditions and showed it by their uncomprehensible uncomprehensible fury, but back, and back, and back they were driven nevertheless, until soon the Glandelinians were driven in from the field and the Christian waves charging after them, over fields, lanes meadows and the like in the face of a tremendous wind with the rig of fire.

The crisis then had turned, for Hansons line victory rested that evening upon the proud banners of the vast Christian line. All the fury of the Christians was brought up because every one hoped to rescue the two Vivian girls that every one loved and also he resisted.

Emperor Vivians left wing for a long time was not quite so fortunate. It was during one of the bloodiest conflicts of the battle. For many consecutive hours and with an unprecident fury the enemy had tried to break through the main Christian lines at a most strategic point. The toll of human lives taken by death in that battle along Emperor Vivians lines, in the few columns had been seemingly as heavy as souls go to Hell every day, countless thousands of battle maddened Glandelinians having fallen under an unabated hurricane of steel and fire a hundred times fiercer than ever seen in the whole world war itself. Three hundred men were all that remained of the Christian forces of 1,000,000 men under General Mortimer with and most of those men were nothing but maimed and agonizing bodies lying on the fields and amidst the works in a ghastly tangle with their death comrades, but that was a mere nothing compared to the unspeakable murderous horror amongst the Glandelinian fallen.

In bold defiance of death a young colonel fell as he led on his regiment. By evening the enemy horrified at the dreadful massacre of so many of their comrades recoiled in dreadful panic the Christians rushing at them and won the day. Terrible as was the late world war, and even though you add to it the horrors of all previous wars it stands no comparison with the gigantic conflict which had been going on for four days all along Hansons, Hindenrune's, Vivian's, and Emperor Vivians lines. In this mighty struggle which began from Depressionville up to Pandora and never ceased day and night since the horrible experience of Violet and her sisters and James and drew the enemy had never desisted and had been winning all the way on day by day, but now was beginning to suffer reverses and bloody reverses. Even during these so awful and anxious days, Violet and her five sisters had continually heard the awful sounds of the battle, and immense crowds of people on the city of Pandora and immense crowds of people in the city of Pandora had gone on the high roofs of tall buildings and else where to obtain a glimpse of the battle that was shaking and rattling every window in the city, but the conflict was too far off to be seen. No one was scared, but only curious and excited, for they felt sure that no portion of the Christian lines could be broken through. In fact they were wrong, but the conflict was to rage on for days yet. General Glandelinia had taken main charge of Emperor Vivians army, and showed the man he was. To lick Glandelinia had always proved to be impossible.

However no news of how the battle was turning in yet came into the city, for no generals would yet allow it to circulate for fear of the spies hiding within the city itself. Because of this so few of the little girls, Emperor Vivian forbade any bands to come near Hindenrune's headquarters unless they played cheery and not sob music. Emperor Vivian suspected Manley for the loss of his two out of seven daughters, and though he had the five remaining, he felt as if he had lost them all, his grief was combined with black rage and rage, but he also blamed himself for being so foolish as to allow the two little girls to go to Angeline's, without giving them commands to stay there until further notice. Emperor Vivian had consulted with Evans too on the matter, but neither could reach a decision because from the fact that it was impossible to find any definite location to discover where Jennie and Angeline could have been lost. Emperor Hansons himself feared for the condition of his wife, who also blamed herself for the disaster, declaring over and over again, it was her fault for going out at such a dangerous time. Little Nell in Angeline's room never ceased praying for them. All of Angeline's Agathia prayed, and every priest in every Church where offering Masses for their return to Emperor Vivian and his grief stricken little diagnosis feeling sure that in God's good time He would answer the prayers if the two had not perished in the forest fires which had been kindled by the enemy per se. Even other towns mourned. Pando had died because no one there yet except those in the Parish knew and Empress Vivian had forbade the news being spread for good reasons. All the school children who had known and loved the Vivian Girl Princesses also offered their prayers, and made sacrifices for the safe return of Angeline and Jennie, and made up Novenas of their own with the good sisters.

But all that didn't bring even the slightest news of them, and then they wondered how the little girls could get into Pando in any way if they did escape from the woods because of the battle raging even at night, and it would be a long run from the region of St Thomas as it was only thirty miles north east of Angeline's Agathia, and nearly three hundred and sixty five miles south of Pando. It is hard to tell who suffered the most, Violet and her sisters, Penrod and the others, but that is considered among children, unless children of their age could feel as worried and sad and as anxious as parents could. On the following day Empress Vivian herself was on the verge of hysterical prostration and Empress Vivian had to call a doctor to help her. Knowing that unless they had her some sleep his sisters would go down in prostration too, Penrod at supper-time knowing how to measure it put a sleep potion in their milk which they always only drank, especially in supper-time, taking only tea in the white suit was his own and only hope that something would not happen to them and add to the sorrow of his parents and himself for Jack Evans at the command and certainty of his Father had to take personal command of the armies while Empress Vivian remained in the city for the sake of his poor children.

Penrod ardently wished to go to the woods down the river with the belief that he could pick up trails, but his Father had said it was impossible, and that if he got lost in the woods he knew nothing about he would add to the dreadful and alarming situation, and besides the fires had erased all trails, of where they might have gone. The sorrow of them all was as great as if Jennie and Angeline had really died, and they had attended their funeral, and buried them in a grave yard. But nothing nevertheless could shake their faith in God. The knowledge of his suffering when he was on the Earth strengthened them immensely so they could bear it, and they were more sanctified every day. They remembered often the sorrow of the Blessed Virgin when she stood beneath the Cross when Her son was hanging there and bleeding and dying, and of Her sorrows when He was dead and in Her arms. Many who came to see them in their sorrow and to comfort them often said that they didn't deserve to suffer this way, but then they only said that. Our blessed God didn't suffer-deserve it either.

Penrod didn't however show how he really suffered. The way he usually acted, if his remaining sisters had not known him now they would have thought he didn't care, didn't miss his two darling sisters. He went about his duties like ordinary times, as if they still remained, but once a voice had said to him when he told them that they must take rest or they'll go into prostration. You are worse than we are. I don't see how you stand it. You suffer more than we do. I can see it in your face and eyes. Penrods so was worse and they knew it. They could cry, and cry again, and weep bitterly and piteously for hours, which they did, but he couldn't shed a tear at the second night of the Novena they had to watch him, more than pay any attention to their own unspeakable grief for fear that he would break down in Church and accidentally cause a scene. Empress Vivian and his wife also attended the novena which even for an hour service seemed much too short to them.

All the boys and girls scouts themselves felt the same distress as Violet and her five sisters did for to them Jennie and Angeline was as much as any of the other sisters. It was expected too by many persons that if finally the days would pass in number the remaining little girls would soon wear off their unusual sorrow, like some times many do, for when loved ones or friends are missing and even though dead, or to know where to turn the sorrow is heavy on the heart at the start, and finally begins to let up. If they had this idea then they were absolutely badly mistaken, for the grief and anxiety of the little girls did not at all let up. Their mother was prostrated by the suspense and Empress Vivian also was not himself. His two other sons had got word of the loss and they had sent soldiers to comb the forest for them impossible and the rangers of the vic-holliste Woods had drafted from towns and villages a numerous number of persons to fight the fires in an effort to check them from going in the direction that Jennie and Angeline might have gone.

All this dreadful lonely day passed and there was no news of the two little girls. It seemed this time that this was the most dreadful situation ever known to Violet and her sisters, and Penrod likened them to the Good Good Evangeline off on fellow Poona which he had read once, and which story had even made his heart ache and made him feel glad that late on the American Colonies had rebelled against England for Freedom and that many of the Exiled Acadians were also in that revolution. He stood by the open window looking out, hoping was first hope that he would see Jennie and Angeline coming among those passing by, but no one came. Violet and her sisters did not cry much any more, but they felt just as distressed as before, that is if not more, and they sat by the biggest window with such a sad longing expression on their faces that Penrod couldn't dare to look. If only his Father the Emperor would let him go and make a hunt in that territory, but then as Empress Vivian had said it was impossible. He had said, that if his two daughters knew the woods as well as it was said about them, they might sooner or later find a way out, providing that the fires did not overtake them, or the Glandelinians capture them. But many disguised boys and girls scouts, the Gemini, the private military detectives, agents and the like within the forest were able to prove that Angeline and Jennie were not prisoners for if they were they would have been found, and no Glandelinian armies anywhere, within sight of Pando, or those down there at St Thomas and elsewhere else where in the same district had no children prisoners, and only few Glandelinian boys and girls scouts, and they were not good looking either. The more humane Glandelinian officials had stated even to war correspondents that were the two missing Princesses found by any of them, they would really turn them over to the Christian authorities or give them plenty of means to find their way back to Pando and cheat money of his property, for there were a good number of Glandelinian generals, even vicious ones who "loved money" and his confederates as a frightened crowd loves a "mad dog". But it was evident so far any way that Jennie and Angeline were not prisoners in any Glandelinian army, not even within My Letzes army which was at times in slight desultory actions at Do Linda and elsewhere.

11-39

Other investigations were able to prove that Jennie and Angeline were positively lost, or had perished in the forest fires, and if that was not the case, then they were still in the woods, and that if they did know how to get out of it despite of the seeming impossibility of it, they were afraid to make the attempt because of the fact that they were still hard pressed either by the forest fires, or by the Glandelinian per se. Many believed that they could escape the fires but that they then would be cut off from escaping out of the forests because of the fires, and that if they didn't face death by starvation and thirst, or forest bogs and pitfall pitfalls and avines unseen in the dark, then the possession angels were surely taking good care of them.

To some of even the best of the child scouts, there was no little faith in the "possession angels" because they argued, that if they were possessed, why does the angels allow unjustly this affliction to come upon the two lost ones, and still more so now upon those who are so distressed at home and whose hearts were longing for their return more and more as every day passed by. Angeline's Archbishop argued that possession angels cannot do anything without permission by God, and if God willed that the little princesses must bear the trial, the Angels who are so obedient to His laws the angels have to suffer with the little girls, though of course if necessary they would work a miracle to save the two from death or destruction if a miracle had to be put through. But that didn't seem necessary, and as the little girls had often escaped dreadful dangers before they will this time also. That the enemy was fully to blame was evidenced by the deliberate traitor attack and the attack on the train, which by the Abbe's military laws is punishable by burning at the stake if any of the attacks were captured. For even in war-time an attack especially on a defenseless passenger train, mostly loaded with women and children is not considered as inhuman and unfair in war-time, but as the most heinous crime on record of all crimes and will be punished accordingly.

That evening was the third of the sad and solemn novena for the return of Jennie and Angeline. This time the crowd at the Church and other Churches too that also gave the novenas for the same purposes were crowded more than ever before showing the sincere devotion of those who were for attending. During this evening of the novena Violet and her sisters silently wept to their content and Penrod let them have their way. The poor little girls were too overcome and distressed to walk home and from a drug store across the street the carriage was called for and they slowly rode home while many of the people followed, trying to console them and give them courage to bear up in the twilight. The school children who had been the constant companions of Violet and her sisters came to see them and tried to comfort them and comfort them.

"If you were one of them" said Polly Question Box when she was returning home with her two friends "I wouldn't stand this."

"You are right, I don't care what it is the enemy had no right to cause these good little Princesses all this sorrow and trouble." Sister Ann Mary Ann said so so the little hate plane Glandelinians.

"Aw the Glandelinians make me sick" said Billy Broughton Brown. "The very devils themselves are good in comparison to them. If I was Pen-rod I would make one of those -aids I read he did once, and not give any quarter to any of the Glandelinians in his path."

"That would be just -right," said Padditah. Law-a "that Glandelinians have done to so many boys and girls make me wish there was no Glandelinia row. Fire and b-lime stone ought to rain down upon the whole country of Glandelinia as it did in places which the Bible histo-ries mention, though I don't know how you pronounce those cities..."

"Good people like the p-incesses and us don't deserve to suffer and ought not to," said Polly. "I wouldn't stand for anything from those Glandelinians. If they did things to me like that and ran away with my little sisters I'd get even. If I could I'd shoot a Glandelinian officer every day that my sisters doesn't return. Glandelinians are mere nothing to me they are way beneath my notice. I was I was a girl-scout in one of those christian armies but papa won't let me. He's afraid I'll get killed."

And so it went on Violet and her five sisters slept good that night, despite the sorrow, Pen-rod saw to it that they did. He tried his best to sleep too and though he succeeded he had a troubled sleep, and then he had a dream. He saw his sisters coming out of a dense forest with a forest fire pursuing them, and standing in a clearing hoping to save themselves, and then to his horrified eyes, while their arms were out stretched to him to save them he saw them engulfed in the flames and perished amid awful agonizing screams. It was a shocking horrible night mare and he awoke in a awful fright, and couldn't dare go to sleep again. That trouble troubled him now was, that he feared that after all it might be true even though he did not believe in dreams, and early that morning, he went away before Mass time to consult one of the priests about that dream he was so scared and worried.

The priest told him that the dream was not anything to worry about, that it could not possibly mean that such a thing had actually happened, and that the dream was only a reaction because of his and his sisters' sorrows. However no matter what the priest said, it couldn't convince Pen-rod any. Comforting comfort him and the priest finally said "don't tell you red-ream to your sisters until you are positively sure that they have perished, which I do not believe has happened. I've never heard of a seen a angel possessed child die of anything, angels have even rescued them miraculously, and I believe Our Dear Blessed God is allowing you and your sisters this sore trial only to try your faith in him. Why don't you who are so experienced in it organize a close search for them. you have never failed in anything you ever did before."

"I do not know where they have been lost," said Pen-rod, "and also my father doesn't want me to go as I must not leave my sisters. Father said what others cannot do in this case neither can I. Any trails they might have left has been erased by the forest fires, and besides I'd run into great peril, and probably get lost myself and cause my sisters more sorrow and distress than now. So my father will not let me go."

Pen-rod went home then to bring his sisters to Mass, however to tell the truth they came near sleeping the time for the first Mass because he had by a mistake put a little more sleep potion in their milk than usual and he resolved to be more careful the next night. But after Mass they felt they had an idea why they slept so good despite their sorrow, and determinedly decided to fast water him this time and protested about it as soon as they were home though they admonished him of course privately.

"You shouldn't surely think so much of us when you too suffer," said Violet. "You haven't hardly slept at nights at all yourself. Please don't do it again Pen-rod. You are just as good as we are any time."

"But you suffer too much and I can't bear it," said Pen-rod in a shaky voice. "I don't care about myself but I can't bear it, tell you. If they don't come back soon I'll do something desperate."

"But listen to me Pen-rod dear," sobbed Violet. "You have done more good for us than we can ever repay you for, and it is we who should be doing something for you. You feel so bad, you can't cry and we can."

"No matter how much distress you and your sisters are in," said Pen-rod "you only think of others and not of yourselves too. What did you do yesterday afternoon heart broken as you are. You little girls had gathered all your old but yet very good dresses hats and other clothing, that you believed you wouldn't need any more and gave them to the poor little refugees girls whom you had called over to our home. Then some of the kids acted bashful you told them not to be scared that you were giving them away free. When finally the last two children came and Joice finally had to say there was nothing for them you even despite the slight remonstrances of your sisters gave away two of your brand new dresses and hats to those two little girls who were your sisters even though I even had said why Violet those are your two new dresses and she even answered "Oh they ain't so hot--besides those poor kids ain't got a no address at all. You even gave those last little girls your best box of Candy chocolates and your new hair ribbon. And then you try to tell me I am not a good thing to you. I have made many sacrifices for poor people I'll admit, but never went to that extent. And you had just bought those two dresses only before Joice went away. You and my other sisters should resent all this being done to you, because the Glandelinians only do it with the intention to strike at Our Blessed God himself through you. So now and sufferings and mine too, and if not for our selves then for his sake we should strike back, and we would be justified. But you never complain. Oh if Father Father would only allow me to go and make a hunt for them, but he's afraid I'll get lost in those woods."

"You would too," said Joice decidedly with tears in her wet eyes. "We can't even bear the loss of our sisters, we feel sure we'll die of misery if they never return, but we cannot afford to lose you too. It may be true some of us may be able to get lost in any forest around here especially the Mc-Hollister Woods for we have been through them often in our lives we can probably pick out a road blind folded, but I'm sure you don't know the woods Pen-rod, and you'd be in their life if you ever tried to go in there. We ourselves wouldn't let you go alone under any conditions. No loss you is too much and Father is perfectly right. If you went with us it's different but who can do anything when the woods are on fire. Oh My God I hope they are not in the path of the fires" and she hid her face in her hands and wept bitterly.

"Oh come come Joice dear please don't," said Pen-rod as he folded the little girl into his arms. "It can't be so hopeless as that. Wait until the Nova finishes and then they may return. Don't cry so please don't."

"Oh I want Jannie and Angelina," she wailed piteously piteously "Oh Please Dear God if you will do not take them away from us."

"Listen please Joice don't be so sad," cried Pen-rod as he tightened his arm around her. "I don't believe they are really gone for good."

You and your dear sisters have become other trials just as great as this and came out with colors flying and what you grieved over and dreaded didn't occur after all. Please don't cry so Joice dear you only make your dear sisters more distressed, and makes me feel worse. If you keep on Joice dear you'll make me lose hope. Please don't cry so. Poor Mother is ill from the shock and if she hears you like this you'll only make her more worried."

But it was a long time before he could get her quieted down. To tell the truth neither of the little girls opened down to breakfast, even though they were were called for about four times by the house keeper and in despair she gave it up. And asked Angelina A-n-n-u-b-u-g to get them to come down, which she finally did after much coaxing.

After that little breakfast they had a-e, Pen-rod's sisters had lain weeping on their beds while he sat by the open window alone. He now was grinning, but it seemed a sort of fiendish grin, a menace of some sort.

"Go the Glandelinians were the cause of this," he thought within himself. Well the train was attacked by soldiers of Hanley's army. I just wish I had been there when it happened. I remember the day when I acted as a dead end so steadily. How often I tried to get my dagger into Hanley's back, the big darn snake.

He is responsible for this, as he often persecuted my sisters for my known most of it. I wonder if they are not prisoners in his army and that he has either killed them or hid them away wherever the secret searchers could not find them. If Father would only let me go and try to find them but he knows best. But the Glandelinia soldiers will pay. I may be only a boy but they'll find when they rifle with me they t-rifle with fire. And I believe I'm all fire myself just now. I feel as if I was burning up. I wonder how many Glandelinian prisoners Father's army has. I have a plan, a plan to rifle I suppose but if they don't return soon and my sisters goes down to perdition I'll-----

"Pen-rod, Pen-rod," he turned his head with a start and saw Angelina Riches standing by his side.

"What is it?" he asked in a husky voice.

"Father sent me to tell you that there is danger of the enemy making successful advances to day. Do you think that the women and children of the city should move to safer quarters?"

"Why bother me with that now in our distress," said Pen-rod fretfully. "That is up to the city authorities. I'm sorry for them all but my sisters comes first."

"But the danger may be great danger," said Angelina Riches and "and--"

"Well then I'll give you permission to have the authorities notified," said Pen-rod. "Can any news as to the whereabouts of Jannie and Angelina?"

"Yes," said Angelina Riches. "They are in the Mc-Hollister woods all right. They were seen as some Glandelinians testified before a spy fleeing before a big forest fire. Whether they escape or not I don't only know and we hope for the best. But it sure does seem discouraging. Catherine Lee is banding her best effort to have them found. I hope my brave Prince you are not losing hope?"

"Not I, but I'm afraid some of my poor sisters as are especially especially Joice." He answered. "It was Hanley's claudelime who attacked the train. I'm almost afraid myself that they may never be seen again, but yet I am not losing hope. I appreciate the way the people attend our orphans and the number of children that also make their own for us. That will I'm sure touch the heart of our pleased Lord, and cause him to send them in his own good time." Angelina picked up and then Angelina Aronburg and the three other boys came to keep them company. The three other good boys were good and quiet and took care that the little girls would not feel too lonely. Tim himself missed Jennie quite equally as Penrod did, and Angelina too, and to James and Walter every thing seemed to be an empty void. They looked silently at the poor little girls lying there on the beds looking so forlorn, and so suspiciously quiet, and wondered why it was that such good little persons should have to suffer like that and so undeserving. Tim almost felt as if it was better they were dead than to have to suffer like this. If something didn't turn for the good soon their constant grief would make them become ill. They wouldn't hardly eat or drink any thing, and were so silent at the meal table. Empress's girl was very silent too, he hardly saw any visitors and was constantly at the telephone making inquiries but could get no good information. Jack Evans was busy too trying to get word about Angelina and Jennie but to no avail. Finally Penrod got very nervous about his sisters and asked his Father to have them attended and watched by the doctor who attended their mother.

He felt scared about their health and did not want to take any chances. The doctor was very kind hearted, and examined them closely while they were lying there before he could give any verdict. "As much as they suffer and will have to suffer I do not believe they'll have any illness or break down," he finally said. "I don't refer to it just because a child possesses them but the more would be no danger of that if they didn't because your sisters are too strong of constitution and of courage to have such a set back. But," the doctor continued, "something for their sakes should be done to relieve them of this misery. You promise me a good trial, why don't you go forth and try to find your sisters?"

"I know nothing about those forests," answered Penrod. "That is the reason my Father won't let me do it. I'd go if my sisters would make the search but they are in no condition to do so for they told me several times so when I spoke of it to them. In fact I do not even know where the confounded Mic-Hollister Woods are, except what is shown on maps. There are many that really testify that they are positively sure that Jennie and Angelina will be turned no more and that is why my sisters are in such a dreadful condition. I was determined to go into Hanley's lines disguised as Adaldefob, and my sisters agreed to go with me in their customary disguises, but Schloeder one of the head gemini leaders wired me a code proving that Jennie and Angelina positively are not within Hanley's lines, and that if I didn't believe him Schloeder and a thousand others could positively prove it. Therefore they are either dead by now or are within those forests cut off by the fire or are afraid to come out because they are hard pressed by persecutions. I've never seen my sisters in such a sad situation yet, and I won't wait to bear it."

"But then what can you do?" persisted the doctor. "It is terribly unjust to let them suffer so. If you could do something with and for them that would distract them from all this sorrow maybe you could accomplish wonders."

"I have tried," said Penrod. "I offered to have a June Party made up for them and lots of children and the school children but they have declined."

"Well then there is nothing that can be done," said the doctor. "But he said hitting up another ride. You could get them to make up a party for the children especially the children of the poor refugees and others. Surely they would not refuse that."

"I'll try," said Penrod. "And----- the Father calling for you doctor. Go to him. Maybe he's worried about mother. I'll go and speak to my sisters."

Penrod bid the doctor good morning, and then he turned to the room. When he entered Penrod found his sisters sitting by the window again. He conferred with them with the problem of the Doctor's plans, and found out that no matter how terrible and great their sorrows was they were sure as unselfish as the creatures of heaven but of some suggestions of their Penrod declined decidedly.

"No, no. You'll not this time give any of your best belongings to them. You can with me buy what ever things may be necessary for the party and for the goodies and things, but you must not sacrifice always your best things for it wouldn't be right, and especially some of Jennie's and Angelina's for they wouldn't give up under any conditions in this situation. If they're turned then I wouldn't say no. I put my foot down on that. We'll arrange the things to get and then we'll have the party. That may bring blessings on us too and cause their return. I'm sure it will be regardless of what others say that they are gone."

For we all'd like to slap those down who says it as I cannot be true. So to me now we'll have the party. As you agreed. But I'm going to watch you every one of you and see what you give." "Oh yeah," said Violet soberly. "And if that is so we are going to watch you too my dear martyr brother. You do the same as we do with for we saw you. You had three boxes of Marshmallows yesterday which a little girl friend gave you, and you gave them to a little refugee and only ate one." Penrod blushed and then laughed and hugged her saying "You are a foxy little girl. The angels told on my I'll bet. If every body in the whole world were like we are dearest sisters and like our nation too War Historians would not need to be written."

The party was quite a good success at that, and there had been no need of urging the poor children to attend it either. Every body got every thing as was expected, and to tell the truth, Penrod, and his sisters too secretly spied on each other to see what and how much they would give. Penrod had taken away from Violet, the last box of Candy she was going to give out of her own proper property to prevent her from doing so, and she in turn had stopped him from giving his best suit to a boy and got him to give another suit in their corner. Violet and her five sisters had forgotten that today was their birthday. Angelina Aronburg had come in when the party was over, and the grateful children had departed, and said to the princesses--

"Go hurry up stairs please before the time comes for us to go to the Novena. I want to show you presents, and they're all up stairs in your room." "Presents exclaimed Violet in a low melancholy tone. "You don't mean that we are really going to have presents, do you?" "Of course I do--doesn't every one have presents on birth days? It was awfully hard not to tell you about them last night when your Father brought them home, and the school children sent them to you--they are such nice ones, I know you'll like them. To days your birth day Violet, but every one of you get presents in honor of it."

"Whose birthday is it?" did you say? asked Violet unable to grasp the situation. "Why Violet it's your s have you forgotten what day it is?"

"Oh how could I think of it," said Violet. "With Jennie and Angelina lost so long birthday parties do not mean any thing to me now."

The last words cut poor Angelina Aronburg deeply, a sad and a feeling a black hatred came into her heart for the claudelime and she thought bombs and daggers about them. They had a lot of work to do to even urge Violet and her sisters to come up stairs, they were not at all eager to see occur about the presents, and wondered indeed how it was Angelina Aronburg was so anxious to show them, even Penrod was worse, he did not care care at all to see any of his either and went into his room as if he had not received anything. Finally Violet and her sisters were in their room.

"Here they are," cried Angelina Aronburg as they entered the beautiful room. "All on your big dressing table as it is called. May I open them or do you want to do it yourselves?"

Violet thought that Angelina should do it herself, and Violet and her sisters stood by, as Angelina Aronburg combining her impatience as best as she could and with trembling fingers untied the parcels.

"Oh cried Angelina Aronburg as she unfolded the soft tissue paper from around the largest of the many packages. "It's seven dolls--such beautiful ones with long hair, and silk dresses, just like my own that I used to have when I was small. Ain't you rapturous now. They are from me" she added triumphantly. "I described my beautiful doll to your Father, and he tried to get them just as much like he as he could but I paid for them out of my own wages. You said she was your favorite, you know and I thought you would like to have others like her. The one for Jennie has got a pink silk dress on, and her clothes all come off and on. Oh Princesses do not look so please don't. Jennie and Angelina will come soon I believe. You don't seem to seem to take an interest anything in any thing."

"Oh we thank you so much," said Violet as she looked with great gratitude on her cousin but it sure would be much more fun to have them to play with on our leisure hours as if they were only back. But how can we take an interest in anything when they are gone. And" and it looked like Violet was going to cry again, but she checked her self as Angelina said;

"But wait, I haven't opened your other presents; this one is from your Father."

"Why what is it?" exclaimed Joice in a rather puzzled tone. "It feels like a round box, a big one with a queer arm of some sort on top" said Angelina. "Oh I know it is a Victrola for here is the key or crack to wind it. Yes of course it is," she added as she finally unwrapped it. I knew you and your sisters would love it. I'll show you how to wind it but let me do it the first time, I can so much quicker. The we can't it pretty that music on the record. record pretty. It'd it is a called Normandy. you father and he picked out the sweetest toned records they had in the store. There are sixty records, and you can get more any time you like. And here is a beautiful tin sheet music box too with tune sheet records."

At these things she had expected that the little girls would clasp their hands in rapture but Violet only begged her to shut off that song called No-mandy as it sounded sad to them and made them feel like crying.

"Well then I will," said Angelina Armstrong affected greatly by the looks in their faces. "And here's something from our great little friend Catherine Lee. I know what it is for," saw her making it. One for each of you too. It's a bag for you little girls to keep your knitting in and it they have exactly the colors colors each of you little girls like, and they are awfully pretty too."

After many other things had been shown Angelina finally said, "aw here's a the last, and it came by city wagon express--it must be from Mildred Manning. I'm sure it's handkerchiefs and a half dozen nice new beautiful handkerchiefs for each of you" she added touching the most precious gifts of all, with loving fingers. "Good Mildred must have made the case herself in the evenings--wasn't it good of her? she does get so tired and it is such hard work for her to do anything these hot nights. Oh dear Mildred Manning, how I wish we all could give her a great big hug."

That certainly would have been a delightful birthday, for Violet, if Jennie and Agnelle, to whom presents also had been sent, but in fact to her and her sisters it was that the saddest they had ever had, but no matter how uninteresting they might have felt at this time despite the lovely presents they received they were gratified nevertheless, and their benefactors were more than satisfied with the thanks they received, and every one was so kind that it was hoped the little girls would partly forget their sorrows. For that was not to be.

"Violet dear-est" said Anelina Aronburg coming out onto the piazza about an hour after supper, two hours before the "ovena Novena time" Did you tell Jack Jack Evans about to day being your birth day?"

"Yes indeed" said violet soberly "He asked me how old I was and I said I would be nine to day."

"I wonder if he'll send you a present," remarked Angelina sitting beside Violet and throwing her arm around her. "Tim who gave you the beautiful dresses thinks perhaps he will, he's so fond of you."

"Oh no" said Violet "I am sure he can't be so upset about Jennie and Argeline and may have forgotten that I told him about it."

"Well he is a wuffy fond of you and your good sisters in any way," he said. Argentina "He asks you all to dinner last Sunday after Mass, and Tuesday and Wednesday he took you for a long drive, and yesterday he sent you over all these lovely flowers though when he bought them I do not know, and they make your room look so pretty in the colored flower pots. Your Dear Father - and even Father and your best boy friends were talking about it, and your Cook Lizzie said she was sure Jack Evans loved you best of all next to your Father but that the poor man was losing his mind over Jennie and Argentine."

"Oh dear - I hope he isn't" said Joice herself beginning to look more distressed "what makes J. Lizzie think so?"

"Why because his milita-ry re-taine-s say the re must be something queer the matter with him. J He never receives company now you know, and he is very ill natured and not like himself any more. You re-membe-r when Daisy accidentally sat down on a tack yeste-rday and a fo-rigner laughed about it in front of Evans. Well that fellow ibi is in the hospital now though I don't know what Evans did to him and also--- oh here comes the exp-ense wagon---pe-rh-as pe-rh-as its another p-resent fo-r you."

"I guess not" said Violet trying bravely to smile in spite of herself
"There isn't any one else to send me anything. If all send me something when we will we put it all."

"It's a very big package, any how," announced Angelina Aronburg Aronburg, with interest, "I'm just going to see who it is for."

She darted off but was back again in less than a minute crying excitedly;
"It's for you Violet--it really is, your name is on the paper. Oh do come quick and let's see what it is."

Violet however was very slow in coming, she had lost as it seemed all interest in every thing but they came to where Mrs Jerry was already untying the cord from around the mysterious parcel.

the word "from a woman like me" and she said "why it's big books" cried Angelina. A-onbu "E-G Great big books the kind you and your dear sisters like to read. Violet dearest...Yes they are that kind. I'm glad they didn't get wet its raining so hard out side. It's been raining for days now, let's see, the books are why it's a brand new Bible, A book called the lives of The Blessed Mother and the Apostles . Little Women, the books you have been reading, for so long and that Penrod himself was going to get for you as soon as he could. On you should be so happy. Do you suppose Penrod had them sent to you."

"Yes he did" said Catherine. "His name is signed to it. He knows how to love to read these kind of books and Penrod had asked me where books like these were. Oh how good he is to us,iolet--how awfully awfully good. He did this to try and make us feel less sad. We all love books so, and to have this one violet dear you have been wanting so long--it's all just like a dream. But we would be all right if Jennie and Angeline came home-----"

"I'm so sorry I was a little late in coming to your birthday Party Violet dear, said a loud voice" and looking up there was Jack Evans standing before them but empty handed. "I didn't know you were down here or the wise I would have brought you your presents and those for your sisters. But they're in the dining room."

Violat and her sisters were in the room shortly, and they thanked him most gratefully but nevertheless their eyes were full of tears, and the little girls did keep their lips drawn to keep them from quivering, for they knew that if all things it hurt Evans to see them cry. But Evans saw the tears and he stepped his feet on the carpet impatiently. He did not like it at all that all the bright look of happiness had gone suddenly out of her face. Thinking to soothe them he seized the phonograph took down a record without looking to see what it was and started the song again "Now, ready." But to tell the truth they did not need to ask him to take it off for the feelings it made them, it made him feel queer too and he stopped it, immediately and looked for a more lively cheerful march and then put that one. But nothing seemed to do any good.

"Not satisfied yet eh?" he said. "Well what would you like to have me do?"
"Anything that I know of," said Violet. "If only you and Argeline were back."
Evans said nothing to this and asked them to tell him all about these wonderful birthday presents for you and your sisters. Violet sat down and as best as she could began an account of the days good time, but the r was no glad sound in her voice and more than once she had to pause in her story in order to steady that troublesome little catch in her voice. Jack Evans looked at her and also her sisters, and there was a greater pang in his heart than before when Violet had finished describing the birthday presents.

to keep back on the rebellious tars, which every moment threatened to overflow. Suddenly Brane as he always had done enfolded her in his arms and trying to soothe her said:

"I'm glad you liked the books Pen told and I gave you" and there was actually a note of embarrassment in his voice. I'm not accustomed to making birthday presents to young angels sent down from Heaven, and especially when they are in so sorrow and I I don't always know what would be most acceptable. I got those books you see here because you and your sisters are liked to have them-but--well the fact is I want to give you and your sisters something else besides."

"Something else besides," repeated Violet in a tone of bewilderment. "Oh no Franz fear indeed I shouldn't like to have you give me anything more. The books are beautiful, and after awhile when we feel better I should love reading it-- and--"

"Never mind about the the butt I've made up my mind to give you something else besides, and I'd like to have you or even your sisters tell me what it shall be."

Violet hesitated for a moment, looked at the sad faces of her sisters, then her cheeks flushed and a light of sudden hope came into her face.

"Do you really --- really mean you would like to have me tell you what I'd rather have than anything else?" she asked.

"I generally mean what I say."

Violet clasped her hands

"Then she said slowly "I would like better than anything else--y s better than anything you could possibly buy for me, that you would if the priest will allow it" speak to the congregation of The church to night during the novena in our behalf so that they will pray harder for the return of our two sisters."

"I sure will" he said. I shall do anything, you can but please do me a favor and try to cheer up."

"Jannie" whispered a girl scout called Gladys to the little friend and companion of the Princesses as they walked down the Church aisle together after the Evening Service. There's the famous Guardian of the Princesses right in front of you front of us. He was looking at you, I saw him, while you were almost crying."

"I've never seen him before but once. I'd like to say good evening to him." said Jannie ^{supremely} ~~supremely~~ ^{supremely}.

"Would you really dare?" inquired Gladys in a tone that was half frightened and half admiringly.

"Why yes of course why shouldn't I? Why are you afraid of him. He's a good loving friend of little children. He was very kind to me once when I got caught out in the woods yesterday and sheltered me and he is good to the poor Vivian Princesses and I like him very much."

They had spoken in whispers but at that moment Jack Evans who had been walking rapidly down the aisle, having delivered the speech recently as Violet had asked, and looking neither to right or left, suddenly stopped short as he reached the door and faced about, almost as if he had heard what Jannie was saying.

"Gladys gave a little gasp."

"Oh dear," she said, feeling rather frightened. "You'll have to speak to him now. I do believe he is waiting for you."

"I'm glad," said Jannie simply. "I wanted to speak to him."

Little Jannie if she had any idea of the sensation she was causing in the Vestibule of the big church that evening when she paused suddenly and held out her hand to the terrible Jack Evans, paid no attention. The eccentric general was known at least by sight now to nearly every one present, and were they knew him to be a terrible foe to the Glandelinian generals.

"Good evening," she said, quite as pleasantly and naturally as if she had been addressing her own father. Gladys told me you were here and I wanted to speak to you and thank you for the speech you made at the Glandelinian this evening in behalf of poor violet and her sisters."

Gladys gasped, even Lizzie who had of course heard the story of the tender story and a very ugly bad one it was, one of the worst of the year so far gave a slight start, but knew that Jannie was in good hands. But Evans although he had not uttered a word had taken the child's hand and was holding it fast.

"This is Gladys a good girl," said Jannie went on innocently. "I have told her all about you, and what a nice time I had at your house yesterday. I hope their housekeeper is well."

"Would you like to come and see her again and the princesses too?" Evans inquired brusquely. His eyes rested on Jannie's little upturned face and had nothing stern or terrible in their expression.

"Yes indeed General I should like very much indeed," said Jannie without the least sign of hesitation.

"Very well come home and dine with us then—I'll see that you get back to your friends all right this afternoon."

"Yes," said Jannie.

So indeed the matter was settled and the Congregation were wondering almost paralyzed with stupefaction by the sight of the eccentric general—the terror of every Glandelinian general—calmly walking down the street from the church with the little girl clinging to his hand. So serenely unconscious of the sensation she was causing, Jannie chatted away happily to her companion, telling him about the pleasant time she was having until just as they were turning into the street that led into Hildan's headquarters, the General suddenly interrupted her with a question.

"What were you crying for in church?"

Jannie gave a little start, and the color deepened in her cheeks.

"I am so sorry you saw me," she said. "It was very silly but your speech affected me. Violet and her sisters are oh so good, and very kind, and I love them and their brothers love so much, but you see I have hardly ever been to church before and even then look so sad and forlorn and I couldn't help it."

"You seem to be very fond of the dear princesses," observed Evans. "They have also been very good to you, I suppose."

"Good to me," echoed Jannie. "They to me are the very best little girls in the world and don't deserve this so much that has come upon them. When after after Angelina Armstrong rescued me from the slave hold they have taken good care of me. They shouldn't have to have this sorrow when they are so good. Besides their their parents and aunt and uncle and brothers they've only got each other."

"Are you sure that you hear it right, that Jannie and Angelina are both dead, gone forever?"

"I don't believe so," said Jannie. "A priest told me to kill those little girls, you've got to kill the angels. That's impossible."

Evans asked no more questions, and Jannie feeling suddenly a little shy and uncomfortable, he slipped into silence. Arrived at the house Jack Evans led his little guest into the parlor and he called loudly for Mrs. Jerry. The housekeeper happily made her appearance, and greeted Jannie very warmly. He seemed rather nervous and flustered, and his voice sounded so odd and unsteady that Jannie was puzzled, and wondered if the old old woman might not also be unhappy about the loss of Jannie and Angelina, and was only making an effort to appear

1375
756 cheerful. In compliance with a request from Jack Evans the housekeeper took Jannie upstairs to take off her shoes. She led the child into a large cool room on the second floor and handed out her long curls and smoothed her hair. Jannie was a girl without you must know. "I want you to look just as nice as possible," she said. "Evans likes to have people look pretty when they are going to visit with him and the sad princesses." "You are very kind," said Jannie gratefully. "I hope you haven't got a bad headache."

"A bad headache no indeed; what makes you think I had?"

"I thought your voice sounded a little in a way. Mildred Mannings do as when she has a headache that's all, but I suppose I made a mistake. How very nicely you behaved. My hair—do you like it like little girl's?"

"Indeed I do very much—especially little girls like the Princesses and like you too."

Did you ever know any one else that was like any one of the Vivian girls? "Jannie inquired with deep interest.

"How do you mean like you? One of the Vivian girls?"

"Why who was lost like two of them were and never come back."

The housekeeper laid down her brush but her hand still rested lovingly on Jannie's soft curls.

"No," she said and Jannie was quite sure there was a tremble in her voice now. "I never knew any one who couldn't ever be found again. But it does seem that way about Jannie and Angelina."

"Do you like the Vivian girls very much?" Jannie asked softly. Something in the housekeeper's tone made her feel sure now despite her doubts before that those two little girls must be either dead or lost for good now.

"I think I love them better than I have ever loved any one else in this world except their mother. I was her nurse and took care of her always from the time she was a little girl until she married Prince Robert Vivian. Now I'm housekeeper and take charge of her beautiful little darlings."

With a sudden impulse the old woman stopped and drew Jannie into her arms.

"You are very dear dear to us too very good for what you have done for those little girls and especially poor little Angelina," she said. "The child could feel the not tears on her forehead. I thought of that the first time I heard of you, and so did Jack Evans then. I think that is why he asked you to come home with him to day, for he loves those little girls too."

Jannie would have very much liked to ask where Angelina and Jennie might be now if they were not dead as many feared they were but something in the housekeeper's manner made her sure the subject must be a sad one than she thought, and being a very tactful child, she wisely decided not to ask any more questions but she kissed old Mrs. Jerry, and stroked her wrinkled face, and then the housekeeper laid her eyes, and they both went down stairs again. They found Jack Evans waiting for them in the Hall, and as supper was already on the table he gave him a ceremonious welcome to Jannie, and led her to the dining room.

Nobody was in the dining room and it was because again it was hard to get the five Vivian girls down and Fenrod too but finally they came, and Jannie never in her life saw any where such sorrow as she saw in the faces of the Princesses and it immediately started the tears to her own eyes. That dinner was a very solemn meal indeed. Jannie seeing the faces of the Vivian girls felt a little less hungry too and felt very small and just a little bit out of place and uncomfortable when she found herself seated in the big leather arm chair opposite her host but she made a great effort to appear at her ease, and neither Evans—who watched her so keenly nor Violet and her sisters and the solemn aide de camp noticed anything beyond the fact that the visit was a perfect little lady indeed. The dinner itself was very good and as served in much more style than Jannie was accustomed to even within the Glandelin household.

Evans did not talk very much himself but he seemed to like to hear little Jannie talk, and the little girl mindful of her duties as a visitor really did her best to entertain the grim silent General, whose eyes seldom left her face. Once or twice she stopped, thinking her host might prefer silence but he surely drew her out again by some adroit question so that before supper was over he had learned a good many things about Jannie, and her life as a child slave. It was raining awfully hard out side with accompaniments of lightning and thunder and Evans it seemed it had hardly ever stopped raining since this sorrow came upon the little girls and he wondered exceedingly.

A little after supper he said:

"Now I suppose you'll be wanting to get back to your regiment."

"I suppose I'd better," said Jannie regretfully. "I'd like to stay all night but my commands will be waiting may be wondering why I don't return."

"Like to stay longer, would you?" Jannie was sure there was a note of real pleasure in the general's voice. "Perhaps you won't mind coming again to see the Vivian girls."

"Adelafob he was good to me, and it was in the sword he found when he was owned by that old snake Manley when I was sold to him, for the sword was given over to me by him. I saw it when I was a Christian and I saw it and could double as Manley. I know Manley has caused something to happen to Jannie and Angelina. I hate the Mandelins and I have a right. If you know what I know about Manley and his intentions to you you would be surprised. I won't tell you though, you couldn't stand it. I hate all Mandelins. They have no right to make you suffer even if you spy on them. The devils are good angels in disguise. I am a companion to the Mandelins."--

"Jannie, Jannie, don't talk so," cried Violet getting up from the chair. "I don't do you no good. They don't deserve no body's love but then you mustn't give devils good reputations. They are responsible for Mandelins' existence, for they have all the fault for it. The Devils planned Mandelins and formed he against us. If not for the Mandelins we are their equals in wickedness, but the devils are not good, you mustn't say that." At that moment there was a sound at the back door and it opened. Penrod came in.

"I've got some news here," he said. "Some of those Mandelins who had attacked the train have been captured and brought to Pandora and are here with us now. One girl and a man. They deny that you released us were on the train that was attacked, but I know it a false for just Mary wrote of her experience and they were with her on that train." The little girls were quickly in the room led by Penrod, and there under heavy guard were three Mandelins. One was a girl named bound behind their backs with steel wires. They had been questioned by Judge Christian, his brother and Jack Evans but they had stoutly declared that if the prisoners and the man on the train, they didn't know any thing about it, or whom the command was. He was a woman and two little girls. Violet reading the minds of the prisoners finally sobbed out:

"They are telling the truth Father. They don't know who they were, but they were my sisters and I am." Ask them where they escaped to?"

"They escaped into the Micopolite Woods, ten miles south of St. Thomas near St. Charles City. They crossed Gladys Creek."

"My God," said Hanson. "They are in the path of the forest fire then." "But there is some chance of their saving themselves in time," declared Evans hopefully. "That is if they reached Joy's Creek in time for it widens out into a sort of lake in a large clearing not a far off. If they want down the stream during the fire they could have reached the lake. But they can't be able to get out of the woods for days and will face starvation."

"They can't starve in those woods," sneered one of the prisoners. "The way they shot is down they ought to be able to get some easily. You Christian dogs are so very long over the heads too much."

"Don't call my sisters brats. I'll have you burned at the stake," cried Penrod loudly. "You are responsible for their predicament yet you promised if you reveal news to the white man about us we won't impose the death penalty for the attack on the train. If you get insulting I'll withdraw the promise."

You and your comrades are deserving of death and should pay. Yet for information set off your off with only imprisonment. My sisters are a lot brats and I won't stand for it either."

"How far is St. Charles from here?" asked Evans.

"I don't know by miles," said another of the prisoners. "But it would take a foot train eighteen hours to get here. It's north I believe of St. Thomas. It is there we attacked the train."

"And we didn't know it was a passenger train," said the other prisoners.

"That is no excuse," said Hanson. "The train was loaded with passengers. Running on those lines as they are passenger lines. The papers claim within this city and many others that the train attacked was not a passenger train but a freight train. That is no excuse yet. But at least you three have saved your lives by telling us as much as possible. Possibly they did you chase them through the woods."

"We didn't. If we had we'd been in the woods and not captured. I'll bet they got it from the fire no more than those two Christian girls did."

"If they did," sneered Penrod. "I'm heartily glad of it. I'll bet they set the fire through to run my sisters down to destruction."

"No I'll say again they didn't. The fire came up from the south of the forests. It's a branch of the main conflagration. But if you're kind to the prisoners are in those woods they are lost for good. They'll never get out for my comrades who went in after them will see to that."

"Yes and I'll give twelve days for them to come back," sneered Penrod. "O-I'll need a note to Manley he will make my pleasures is exhausted. I'll not stand anything done to my sisters I'll tell you that."

"But they said on our armies."

"I don't care what they did, they'll be left alone. I'll keep the reason why. I don't care if they killed Manley or all of your generals, and then you the King Police places you Mandelins will leave them alone. I'll keep the reason why. You are silent to things they were did. They play flag your spies play so crooked. If my sisters state we do not come back within a month from now you are having a hard time in that disorganized camp. We will not die of course but will go to the island prisoners for life. The other is if captured in the state for the attack on the train, and for causing their disappearance also. I won't have my sisters suffer and I mean it."

"Mandelins can't state your intentions," said one of the prisoners.

"Oh yes, and the white man is the real Mandelins," demanded Penrod with a scornful smile. "What do you know about Mandelins?"

"He is a great child," said one of the boys. "He used to work so much for General Manley but now he's a slave to the white man."

"Well so he'll live for a while now," sneered Penrod. "Well I know who and what he is, but you can take some day to find out. I'm sure he is a slave. You are talking about something you fellows don't know anything about. He turned to one of the officers. "Bring in a big map here will you. I want to find the location of the Micopolite Woods and these prisoners will have to show me the place my sisters are held. If they refuse they'll get a good beating."

"Can we do it?" asked one of them.

"Facts be lies," sneered Penrod. "I don't know a bit about you fellows."

The map was brought in and placed on the table, and Hanson, who was in the room, also came in. Penrod by looking over it carefully was able to finally find the location of the extensive Micopolite Woods.

"It seems hopeless though," said Hanson with a catch in his voice after the prisoners showed the exact location of St. Charles. "This is the section, from these woods, called the Red Riding Hood Woods. The fire has now spread to this portion of the Micopolite Forest. The little girls might have known how to save themselves from the fire, but now they're in the path to be run over. I'll have some men going to the fire for days and cut them off from escape. But they will be facing starvation when they don't starve to death. But I'll try to do something if it is possible. You may take the prisoners to any fire at night and then I'll telephone to Angelina, Cynthia and the mobilization camp. I'll call up the head of the forest rangers and explain matters. They must be rescued if possible."

The prisoners were taken out, some shot roughly and then after the door closed Hanson sat down by the table and lifted the covers off the book.

"Give me the city of Angelina, Cynthia on the river," he said to the Operator. He listened for some minutes and then he hung up the receiver with a discouraged look on his face.

"The Operator told me the fire had burned down all telephone lines in that direction," he said. "We are stumped and no mistake. Even telling me won't go to telephone offices are destroyed."

"Oh that can be done, on what can we do?" asked Violet. "Oh they must be found if they are not already dead."

"It's impossible to do anything in this situation," said Jack Evans and it was the first time they had overheard him say anything. "We can only trust the whole situation to God. I've have planned with the prisoners this evening after the speech that this is not to be a kind time for anyone but one that will go on until we at least have heard good word from them. I'll bet he has a feeling that they may come back some time but I doubt it. If you can do it I'll make a search of those forests with a lot of men. But I cannot leave my charges. Could you get Angelina, Cynthia to Radio Vienna?"

"No," said Hanson. "We have no radio in the station here."

"What was your intention?" asked him brother.

"By seeing the location on this map I had intended to have the whole army of the mobilization camp led by the rangers search the forest. The search of the woods, though that had no part in it they could be in any way and try and find the little girls."

"That's impossible," said Evans. "That gosh damned fire even there it is a great spread over it's mad. I don't know but for days, the fire had been so many times and such thick smoke by woods and could be seen, and only a light could live through it. The rangers would claim it is suicide to try it. Unless the girls follow the stream north and get out of its path. We can only let the matter rest in the hands of God. We cannot and must not lose faith. Violet and her sisters have often been separated longer than this and have each other again."

"Yes but not lost in such a dreadful woods in fire," said Violet. "We were separated only a few hours and always had hopes of seeing each other again. I've hardly did not even give over it as we could only get away in the end. But this is so bad, and terrible. Oh I'm afraid they'll never come back."

"You must not feel that way," said Pen-od placing his arm around her. "Do you. I'll only make you feel as if it's an awful trial. You have to suffer, but I believe it is foolishly brought it on you, and as I learn by experience." "What do you mean by that?" asked his mother. "He shouldn't have let them go with little girl in the first place, or if he let them go, we should have sent them notice not to go to school, or could come and bring them. I could have brought them safely through, but no one thought." "I didn't think there was the least danger in that direction," said Papa. "I mean, the nurse and the doctor enough to prevent the capture of him." "And still," said Hanson hopefully, "I'm sure they'll be back. Remember they are angel possessed and cannot die. Even the angels may provide them with food, and plenty of drink. Don't any of us lose hope yet."

"Oh so much," said Pen-od and thunder and lightning. "Oh dear, I'm so tired looking at him, with his hair and hair. I guess God has punished us for what has happened to the Vivian girl. Princesses were we have so much about."

"Rosemary's voice indeed sounded very faint and the little face flattened against the window pane was a very discolored one indeed. He had been told that Gloria looked up from her seat."

"It's very wrong to speak in that way about things in the Bible. Miss Rosemary. God is not punishing us because that happened. It isn't our fault. Gloria spoke so provokingly indeed, but nevertheless the discontented expression on her face deepened and appeared defiant a little. "I don't care if it is wrong. I shall say it if I want" as a big crash of thunder shook the house. "I know there is going to be plenty of floods this summer," Papa said to himself the other day. They say God is Good. Why does he allow those princesses to suffer like that for them. They don't deserve it. I'm bad. I'll admit as you say, and deserve it."

Gloria made no remark but stitched away in silence. Rosemary hummed with her fingers on the window glass and looked out at the steadily pouring rain, and then at a big flash of lightning from which she came a deafening sky splitting like a crash. After a minute or so she began again.

"I don't see why I've got to stay in the house any more, even if it does rain. Then I've got a good rain coat to put on. My body is out and there is so many soldiers passing up and down the side walks with rain coats on and children out too. I just saw two very beautiful little girls not bigger than me on the opposite side of the street in uniform rain coat, and they looked as if they were having an awfully nice time, and they're not afraid of lightening either. No more than was as a deafening crash filled their ears. If Papa were home I know he would let me go out. There's some other cloud barg of the union."

"Tell you, Papa, isn't it out of the house, and while he's away it's my business to take care of you and see that you don't get sick, confound that thunder!" she added as a veritable shock of a crash tore the sky in two. "You will not go out in this pour rain. I can tell you, not if it last a three weeks or a full month, so there is no use in your talking about it, and lightning might strike you whether you are afraid of it or not. I should think you'd be ashamed to be so discontented. Think of what the Vivian girl princesses are suffering. They have lost their two sisters and have not like you do just because it is raining. Even despite the anger of this awful big war, I don't believe there's another little girl in the whole of Persia who has as many beautiful things to amuse you, and herself as you have, and yet you are never satisfied. And remember we are foreigners here, not Abissinians; and how you got to behave if you want to stay in this beautiful country."

Rosemary's eyes wandered from the window round the pretty, luxurious room, the baby's house, the cooking stove, the big phonograph, the toy theatre and the book case filled with many delightful story books. Her conscience gave her a little uncomfortable twinge. It was quite true as Gloria had said there were no more little girls who had such nice things, not even the famous Vivian girl herself. But in a moment the discontented expression crept back into her face again. After all Gloria did not seem to understand.

"I can't see much use in having toys and things if, have not got any one to play with," she said in the same faint tone as before as the windows again rattled and trembled before an immense thunder roll, and it was getting darker as if the storm was to go on for ever just to spite her. "I wish Papa would let me go to school."

Gloria smiled at the provoking little smile, and bit off her thread with a snap.

"I wonder how long you'd like to go to school with all these Abissinian kids, and even though you speak it now you cannot read a word of their language. Even though school teachers here are all good and kind and easy going, you'd make yourself the laughing stock of the school room, and remember Abissinians are not crazy about foreigners, and like us unless we prove ourselves to be that they are. And you are far from being as good as they believe me far from it." Rosemary blushed, and her eyes dropped. Her conscience gave her another and at once uncomfortable twinge, and in a sudden change the subject she said rather hurriedly: "Well, if I want to school I'd know other little girls and boys and they could come and play with me, and we could have nice times together, and then too I might meet one of the princesses and get her to come and play with me."

Gloria sniffed. "Not unless you treat them more politely than you did the little Vivian girl child when they came to play with you."

Rosemary's lip began to quiver and the tears came into her eyes. "Now Gloria," she began in a voice that was not quite steady, "you know very well that they accused me it wasn't my fault. How could I be responsible for the faults of other people? I know they said it was the cause of the sorrow and suffering of the princesses. I didn't mean to be rude, Gloria, you know, I didn't, but I thought I was not far from being as good as any of these old Abissinians, and I couldn't be insulted. These girls came over to play, and yet say it is the fault of all us foreigners that the Vivian girl suffered."

Gloria rose, and began folding up her work. "Well," she said indifferently, "You really are without exception the queerest child I ever heard of. They didn't insult you, they spoke of foreigners who had done these princesses a world of wrong and were punished for it, and you misunderrstood them. Any how the situation is more than I can understand. You slapped one of them and that was very wrong a sin too. Now I'm going down to the land laundry to press out my new dress. Mind you don't get into any mischief while I'm gone. I don't belong."

Gloria left the room, but Rosemary did not move from the low chair by the window despite the fierce glare of the lightning and roar of thunder, only she no longer looked out at the falling rain which was coming down so hard as to make the same sort of blinding appearance as a big blizzard does. There was a big lump in her throat, and she had to wink hard to keep back the tears. She felt very lonely, and very unhappy, but her unhappiness was not for herself, for as selfish as she seemed to be she really had sympathy for the princesses she had heard about. Gloria did not mean to be really unkind, in fact she wasn't, but Rosemary was so high spirited, and willful that she aggravated the cause, who on one occasion had almost been tempted to quit her job. But Rosemary was this way because she was lonesome, and she would do no wrong things would have been if her mamma had not stayed away so far in exile and with her brothers and sisters, and now couldn't get back again because of the destruction of all communications because of the war. It got many letters from her mamma and brothers and sisters but that didn't ease her loneliness. Oh dear if it would only stop raining! If some thing interesting would only happen! If that roar of the battle too near Pandora would only stop. That noise at times gave her a good deal. It was a whole night days of steady rainy weather and it was very unpleasant, but she was beginning to find life indoors decidedly monotonous.

But it wasn't because of the rain merely that she had to stay indoors. Gloria one day had heard some marks that some secret glandulian spies believed that Rosemary was the cause of the two Vivian girls splitting with her. Well away she knew something about it, and she was afraid these spies might kidnap her charge. If she was left to play alone out in the street.

Rosemary got up and wandered aimlessly about the room, now looking at one toy, now at another, she paused before the book case with the idea of finding some thing to read, but she had found that until her eyes had hunted and besides she was sure she had read every book in that book case at least four times over. She must ask Papa to buy her some new ones. She wandered away listlessly and went on into the back room, which was also hers, and where she and Gloria slept. This room too was furnished with every comfort and luxury that heart could wish. Rosemary looked to the back window, pushed aside the lace curtains and stood looking out with a faint hope of finding something to interest her. The view from the back window however was less interesting than that from the front. There was nothing to be seen but flood yards, dripping fences, piling up, pouring rain and other people back windows. The thunder was not so loud any more now, but the rain was not letting up much. She was just turning away again, when a sudden dim light shone, when suddenly her attention was attracted by something which she was sure she had not noticed before. The house next door though a most magnificent structure had a large extension, one of the windows a big one of which was exactly on a line with the one at which Rosemary was standing. And she was standing by that very window looking straight at her but with a very pale brown face. Rosemary saw a little girl of about her own age. Rosemary had in her hand a picture and face to face in reality had been very pretty, little girl. She had been very pretty when any person could imagine, when Abbiannian had seen her, but they were all very much in comparison to the one she now saw standing by the window. He had big blue eyes and long, straight, golden curls that for a moment flash of lightning made the threads of light about him like, and she was standing in a sort of sort of posture with one arm holding against the wall. He was dressed as it appeared in a sort of mourning gown, and his eyes looked as if she had been crying. Rosemary was sure she had never seen the little girl before, and she didn't have Abbiannian features either, but that was not surprising for the house next door was a head-parters and boarding house for all sorts of Christians and office men and so on, and so on, constantly coming and going. Gloria had once said, it was only because of the goodness of all Abbiannians that the people of that house were not apt to look down on those lower than themselves, but these remarks had never made any impression on Rosemary. She wondered too why the little girl looked so sad and as if she had been crying. For she now was not that of having been punished for her face had a way of being long in it as if she had lost some one dear to her. Indeed it was not often that she thought about all those people in that house at all and as she very seldom looked out of the back window, she was not likely to know much about the man now she found he was suddenly interested in this strange beautiful little girl and she found he was thinking how very pleasant it would be if they could get acquainted and if the strange child could come in and play with her. Gloria would probably object, Gloria always did make a fuss about her playing with any child, and whose parents lived in such big houses and kept so many servants, saying she was not bred for that kind of play mates, but then papa and Gloria did not always agree, and wasn't he papa very rich, and Gloria was wealthy too and used to the poor. The little girl certainly had a sweet angelic eternal like face, but she looked so sad and so lonely that Rosemary's heart was touched in spite of her selfishness.

Almost involuntarily Rosemary smiled at her, and nodded her head but to her surprise the beautiful little girl did not appear to notice the friendly gesture. Evidently she was looking at night at Rosemary and yet somehow she did not act as if she saw her at all. Slightly however that appearance on her face only increased and then she had up her eyes, as the thunder roared again.

"What can she be thinking about that is so sad to make her cry?" said Rosemary, speaking aloud. In her surprise and sympathy she looks as if she was a little angel brought from heaven to do something very bad, and she won't even notice me."

Rosemary nodded and smiled again in an even more friendly manner than before, but with no better result--the little girl in that window not only still appeared quite unconscious of her existence but had seated herself in a rocking chair and had held her face in her hands now as if she was weeping.

"There must be something queer in the matter with her," Rosemary said to herself and moved beside her. "The child she mamma she mamma she mamma have told her that she mustn't go out in the rain and maybe that is why she is crying, it feels more sad and fearful about it than I do. She does look so full of pleasure and beautiful though, I don't even believe she is a bad girl, for none so beautiful cannot be bad."

Oh I wonder if she isn't one of those beautiful Vivian girls who is crying for her lost sister. I've got the picture in the paper. I'll go and look."

She got the paper, looked at the pictures of the little girl.

"Why that's that one called Violet," she cried to herself. "he is she is. That is why she is sad. Her poor sister didn't come back. I'll open the window and see if I can make her speak to me for I don't believe even if she did see me she meant to be impolite unless she had been told by her mother not to smile at people she doesn't know."

No sooner said than done. Rosemary threw up the window sash, and leaning out over the sill as far as she could--the goodness of the still blinding light, that almost dazzled her eyes, and the rain that splashed on her face, she waited until the crashing thunder had died out, and then called at the top of her voice--

"Beautiful little girl in the window, beautiful little girl, I want to speak to you. The little girl who is crying."

She had cried out in English for the little girl didn't look Abbiannian, and any now if she was an Abbiannian princess, she knew they could speak and understand English. If the strange beautiful child did not really see her, she certainly heard, for Rosemary saw her lean forward in a listening attitude, having taken away her hands from her face, which though and yet had also a puzzled expression on it. Rosemary's heart began to beat fast with excitement.

"Princess Violet," she cried this time so the little girl could understand. "Little princess, open your window, I want to speak to you."

This time there was no doubt that the beautiful little girl next door had called Violet--for she was quickly from her chair, and had her eyes on her, and had her hand which she held tightly, and she had her hand on her face, and she had up to the little window.

"Did any one hear me?" she asked in a clear musical voice, the sort of voice that the blue eyes had changed their expression of dissection and were staring straight into Rosemary's flushed, eager face.

"Yes, I did," said Rosemary promptly. "I want to ask you why you feel so sad and as if you wouldn't smile at me. I've been smiling at you, and nodding my head and you have been looking at me all the time but you wouldn't smile back."

The color rose slightly in the other child's pale and little face. "You are in a very dark section of the house and I couldn't see you, you can't see me yet," she said. "I can't see you at all. I really didn't know there was any one looking at me."

"Oh," said Rosemary, "I have been looking big and round with surprise--" "po, you do you mean that you're blind?"

The princess shook her head. "No, no I don't mean that," she said. "It's dark over there where you are and not over here. I'm sorry I didn't know you were looking at me. You must have thought I was very rude."

"Oh, no, no," said Rosemary again. "I didn't mind a bit, but now you're all right, and it's so good. You don't seem a bit in features like all the Abbiannians I've seen of the street--and that makes you look so unusually beautiful like you came from Heaven--you've got such nice eyes, it doesn't seem as if that you should be blind now."

The little girl in the opposite window flushed again and it was unmistakably a flush of dissection, but through it all she tried to smile.

"I ought to be glad to be so pretty," she said. "but it is some times a handicap when I want to do things. Many do say I and my sisters should never have had to know that so soon, and so many people know me and my sisters often think we are not good but suppose all of us didn't though--not one single bit. Our two sisters never came back and on you are so lonely for them."

Rosemary's tender little heart was touched. The last remark showed her there was something especially sad about the pretty child. To lose two good sisters--to have to be so lonely for them, to be looking for them--Rosemary could not help a big shudder at the thought.

"I wish you'd come over here and play with me and it'll make you forget your loneliness," she said impulsively. "I've got lot of nice things to play with and I'm really lonely all by myself. The only next door you know--it isn't almost so bad for you--you couldn't get out going such a little way."

The beautiful little princess shook her head absolutely, though Rosemary felt sure she looked as if she would like to say yes.

"I'd like to come," she said in a wistful way, but I couldn't. I've got to watch over my other sisters, my brothers and parents are not home, and the father I cannot go out. I cannot leave them alone, they need me."

"Couldn't you make use of going to your sisters over?" Rosemary suggested. "I'd ask my mother to go in for you and your sisters over and I'll be sure, I'm afraid she wouldn't do it."

"I have to go but I have a house-keeper. I'm almost nine."

"Well I shall be ten next month," said Rosemary, and I have a nurse. I have known lots of people older than I am and have a nurse. But if you haven't got any nurse couldn't you mother and father bring you?"

"No they are not home either."

"Where are your sisters called Jennie?"

A shadow flitted across the princess's bright face. "We believe we haven't any sister Jennie any more," she said so sadly;

"She died in a fire in the far away Nic-Holliste woods."

"Why so did mine," exclaimed Rosemary quite struck by the coincidence. "but I put I've got a papa," she added. "where is your sister Angelina, you have her name?"

The princess shook her head. "My sister Angelina is dead too," she said in a beginning to quiver. "she died in the fire too and they and my sisters still living are the last sister a sister in the world. Our brother Ponce took care of us and before this happened we did have lovely times together."

Rosemary felt her heart fast in this new acquaintance deepening every moment though she felt as if she was not over the wall. It was so fun to lose somebody you love who other people do not care for. She had her elbow on the window sill and her head pressed for a comfortable rest. Fortunately the rain had for the moment ceased, though it was still thundering, and it was very warm.

"I'll can't go with you, but you and your sister can come to play with me then and myself too!" she protested. "I know you'd like to have a playmate, and see all the things in the baby house. I have no one to play with me - no boy and I'm lonely too."

"I could go over if I choose but my sister and I are just asleep," said the little prince. Princess and Prince Penrod is out with father. He won't be home before six."

"And who takes care of you and your sister when he isn't there - your father and mother?" Rosemary inquired with growing curiosity.

"Nobody," she took care of ourselves."

"But how can you when you are such little girls?"

"We know how to do it," she answered.

"But don't you ever go out to talk to a friend?"

"Oh yes, we often go with our brother and Jack Evans our guardian. In the day every morning we go to Mass and Holy Communion, and in the afternoon we have beautiful long walks. Some times we go for rides in the stable cars too. Oh before our sister and I were born we had beautiful times."

"And all the other days since your sister and I were born you and your sister are alone just stay in the house all by yourselves?"

The princess smiled.

Rosemary pshawed, thought of her discontent just because Miss Gloria had kept her in the house all on these dark rainy days and her conscience gave a sharp pain more than it had given before that afternoon. She had no more time to ask any more questions, however, for at that very moment the sound of rapid, approaching foot steps fell upon her ears, and Gloria's voice came up with indignation, exclaiming:

"Miss Dawson, what in the world are you doing? Standing by an open window in all this dampness? I do declare it does something I could not turn my back for five minutes without you were getting into mischief of some kind," and before Rosemary could utter a word of protest or explanation, Gloria had pointed upon her, swept her away from the open window, and pulled down the shutters with a bang, afterwards scolding a second to the little Gloria to close the door.

"It's your fault for letting my charge do that. A girl, girl of your kind being an Abbeinnian ought to know better."

"Wait just one minute Gloria, please I'm speaking to a good little girl, my next door neighbor, and I want to say good bye," and Gloria at a sign wildly to open the window again, but Gloria was both strong and most determined.

"You really ought to be ashamed of yourself, Miss Dawson," she grumbled, jerking the child back into the bigger room, with no very gentle hands. "We think of a big girl like you screaming out of the window, talking to a strange common child, that you know nothing about. I heard voices when I was in the yard, but I thought it was only some children playing in one of the yards. No you need not try to open that window again, for I shant let you do it."

"But she wasn't a common child," protested Rosemary beginning to cry. "She was a very nice little girl, and she's a princess too, she is one of the Vivian girls, whose name is Violet, she told me so herself and that her sister and she are so handsome for their little ones. Their father and mother are the King and Queen and are in that house she told me so. Oh Gloria, please let me just say good bye to her."

"It is too late now," said Gloria firmly. "Why didn't you tell me before I didn't know they were princesses that kept just the same you are not the kind fit to associate with them, you are a common to them. I wish that her father would have said if that Princess Violet or her sister Daisy was caught doing what you did, if you had not called to her she could not have thought of such a thing."

Rosemary gave an impatient sigh, and submitted to the inevitable. When Gloria began on the subject of the Vivian girls' perfections there was never the least use in arguing any point with her. Violet and Daisy Vivian were spoken off much by Gloria she said that she was sure they knew them and their sister's from Gloria's descriptions and if there was one thing above all others that Rosemary felt very painful for was that she wasn't born a Vivian girl.

Rosemary walked to the west of the dark afternoon and closed a little. When Gloria was looking. When she was having finished her sewing proposed to play a game of hide with her. She was relieved that she was quiet in silence, she was Gloria. Lost her temper again, and the afternoon was an altogether disagreeable one. A pleasant surprise came however just as Rosemary was finishing her solitary supper. There was a telegram from Miss Dawson - she had been away on some unknown business for several days stating that she was coming home that evening, and expected to arrive about six o'clock.

Rosemary was delighted, but Gloria sighed.

"I suppose you'll have to stay up till he comes," she said disapprovingly. "but these late hours are terribly bad for children. Before the troubles or not busy with their Country duties the Vivian Girls were always in bed and asleep by eight o'clock."

"Sit up," said Rosemary reproachfully. "Of course I shall sit up and I shall keep papa the very first thing when he comes in if I can't go to the house next door to see that little princess to - tomorrow and her sister too."

At that moment there was a call from the cook below.

"Are you up there Miss Gloria?"

"Yes," said the nurse going out and showing herself at the head of the stairs.

"What do you want?"

"The Abbeinnian Prince is here. He wants to see you."

"The Abbeinnian Prince. See now Rosemary. You got your foot into it," said the nurse. "You should have not spoken to the Princess. You are not of their kind and a foreigner too. Turning to the cook," she said, "send him up."

In a few minutes the boy came up and he was quite a handsome looking boy to Rosemary though he seemed pretty angry over something just now. He was not in uniform but he wore a princely garb nevertheless and carried a prince's cane. He looked first at Rosemary and then at the nurse.

"You are the nurse here?" he asked.

"Yes, am," she said proudly.

"Who was the little girl who was talking to my sister Violet across the window?"

"I was," said Rosemary.

"Then you were the one who said pretty severe and rough remarks to my sister Violet," said Penrod turning angrily on the woman. "Now don't look like that, may only be a boy but got a nation at my back and can order you around if I wish to. The idea of talking like that to my sister, telling her it was her fault that your charge talked across the window to her. Well your charge here (pointing to Rosemary) had a perfect right to, and won't have my sister sister or any of my other sisters shown disrespect to a boy any one let alone you. I'll let you off this time, but won't forgive it again. They're all even all because of the news that my two sisters are dead, and you insult them. That's like you foreigners. My Father the King sent me over to tell you so. If this ever happens again woman you'll me the day. I won't have my sisters slighted."

"But I didn't know she was a princess, your sister. Rosemary didn't tell me then."

"You wouldn't let me," put in Rosemary apitfully, glad in her heart that the prince came over over to scold her nurse.

"That is no excuse," said Penrod. "You have no right to say anything to children not under your charge. If it was not for me she'd have come over that moment you spoke to her like that and placed you under arrest. They're good little girls, none good than any saint, ever heard off but it is step from under if you get on the wrong side of them. I had a hard time to get her to forgive you, don't do it again I warn I won't be trifled with."

"But my charge had the window open, and was leaning out in all the dampness."

"A little rain won't hurt her," answered Penrod, and besides it isn't cold. Violet told me how you shouted at this little girl, and that is forbidden in this court. If I warn you you cannot scold her either or you'll be under arrest. That is what makes children so fearful. I can see she'd be a good girl if you were not so bossy. Take her over to tomorrow and see my sister. I demand it and don't object."

"But - but"

"I won't hear no more. I'm going. Remember I warned you. I won't have it again."

When Gloria had appeared so suddenly on the scene, and except Rosemary away from the open window, the little princess had remained standing for a moment her head still turned in a listening attitude, but at the sound of the maid's sharp voice, and then of her bawling out the window to her too. "It's your fault for letting my charge do that. A girl of your own kind being an Abbeinnian ought to know better," she had dashed back hastily, and having closed her own window had snatched out of her room down stairs, her face flushed and excited where she met Penrod who asked her where she was going and why she looked so excited. Violet indignantly explained and her intention but Penrod said:

"Let me speak to her this evening. Don't place the foolish woman under arrest maybe she didn't know any better. I have heard often of that one across the way and she's always fighting with her little charge. I'll make her let the little girl come over and see us to-morrow despite her objections. I'll know the reason why. Be wise, forgive the woman and stay by our sister. They need us badly to day since the reports came in that the two of them are dead," and he said the last words in a very shaky voice indeed. Violet then went back upstairs but leaving her window open now and once more seated herself in her low rocker, where None Mary Dawson had first seen her. The bright color was still in her cheek and for a few moments her face was still clouded with righteous anger. "I hope that poor little girl won't be scolded by that cross maid," she said to her sister, who had overheard every thing. "She was so kind and I did like talking to her so much. I'd make her come to time if she was my nurse that woman if that was her nurse who came to the window. I'll have Penrod instruct her that she can't allow ed to scold children in this court my unless the child absolutely does a sin. And she'll be careful after this not to make unpleasant remarks about Ablesianians, these foreigners are terrible. I'm glad father is disappointed in all who cannot show a good account of themselves."

She sat quite still for the next few minutes. Her hands folded in her lap but so happy contented look came into her face. The little clock on the mantle stood at a tick four, and with a tired listless expression on her face, Violet rose to her feet.

"Four o'clock," she said listlessly "now Evans will soon come home and I hope he has good news for us."

She walked quickly across the big room to a big book case and talking from the shelf a large clumsy looking volume, she turned with it to her seat by a window and opened it on her lap. It was a very odd looking book indeed for instead of having printed letters on it the book was filled with only paper clear except with lines showing it was only a big writing book. She took a pen dipped in into an ink bottle which she had opened and she wrote something on the lines and it was this:

"Jennie and Argeline missing since the 21th of May. Now it is June the 7th." Jennie and Argeline. Again reported dead, having perished in a forest fire. For some time the little girl wrote on in sad oblivion to all around her. Sometimes she paused for a moment to wipe the tears away from her eyes and one or twice she had to give way and cry bitterly. He was roused at last by the sudden opening of a room door, and the sound of a sweet clear voice saying cheerily "trying to be cheerful but it wasn't--"

"And what have my dear little princesses cousins and little Jennie been doing all this wet day by themselves. Jennie he said sprang up with a cry of delight but Violet though she looked up with a forced smile did not rise. Next moment Jennie's arms were around the new comers neck, and she was kissing her affectionately.

"Oh, Miss Argeline! Arounburg what a lovely surprise. Why it's only a little after four, none of us have begun even to expect you yet," and pressing her hand over her forehead water-proof military raincoat-- you were not a bit wet--has it stopped raining?"

"No indeed it is raining harder than ever. Perfect cloud burst like now, but I have had a good deal of luck this afternoon--listen to that awful loud thunder will you--Mildred Manning's brother came to take her out for an outing in the city, and when she was leaving, she said she would drive me here in his own military car--washed it good of her it was very early, but I said I would go on as for the princesses needed me."

"And you really had a drive all the way home,," said Jennie clapping her hands. "And all day we have been thinking of you coming home in one of those horrible cars full of wet people. That just shows how silly it is to worry about things before they happen doesn't it. Now take off your things and come and sit down. Princess Violet has got something real strange to tell you, or I have if she will let me tell it."

Argeline Arounburg smiled, but it was only a forced smile; then glanced anxiously very anxiously around the room.

A "my letter of parcel come for the princesses to day Jennie dear"

Jennie shook her head listlessly.

"No indeed, I know what you are thinking about but it won't come this time, I know it won't. It is terrible but we can't do a thing. The Aunt Mary can't get any communication with us or we with them. Violet wrote a letter yesterday but it came back with the words, on the back 'cant get through communications cut off'."

Argeline Arounburg looked worried as she kissed the little Vivian girls and Jennie, and they all stifled a sigh.

"We mustn't despair no matter what happens will we dear?" she said, though she almost felt like it herself. "but the communications have been so long cut off by now that it seems it could make any one lose hope almost."

Then she turned away to take off the military water-proof raincoat, and the hat which was more in form of that of a sailor's than an army hat.

"And now my dear old pet cousin Violet, tell me all about that interesting thing."

Argeline Arounburg had drawn up a chair to her little cousins side and to her Violet's hands in hers. They were very much alike, those two, although Argeline Arounburg was two years older and Violet really was not yet nine. Violet only looked so wistful that Argeline Arounburg felt distressed and gave Violet's hand a loving squeeze. Violet however assumed all her courage and said:

"Yes I will though it doesn't do us any good, but at first I must start at the beginning, and tell you all about this new and dreadful day. Then you first left this morning with Father and Penrod, I alone made the beds, and dusted the room, helping Mrs. Jerry out as much as possible, I believe it would relieve me and make me forget my loss. My sister didn't get up till late, in fact, wouldn't let them, and then we went to all the Morning Masses. When we came back, we entered my dear little garden. There are two new buds on it and they made me think oh so sadly as if they were Jennie and Argeline. I was so disturbed that I cried for a while. Then I tried to study my history, but I seem to have lost interest in it, though oh it used to be so interesting, all about how Ablesiania formed, and how long she had been such a holy righteous nation. Well then it was pretty near lunch time, and though I didn't feel like eating a bite, I washed my hands and brushed my hair, and as soon as the clock struck twelve I went downstairs. I couldn't get my sister to come, so I brought up their lunch for them, but poor dear's they didn't hardly touch much. Lunch was very good to day--there was nice roast chicken, and preserved plums and good mashed potatoes and coldiced tea. I didn't eat much. How could I, but I drank a little of the tea. Mrs. Smith you know who is a foreigner--but who works as housekeeper for General Hind--she scolded about the enemy, and said that I and my sisters were getting all the sorrows and troubles that the enemy only deserve and a hundred fold. There was quite a heated yet mournful conversation about us. They were all very kind to me, they tried to coax me to eat, but I couldn't much. Every thing feels so sick and heavy in side of me, and Mrs. Porter asked me questions about my two lost sisters, and said she would talk to me for a nice drive in Central Park some day when it wasn't raining so much. Mrs. Smith wanted to know why we didn't stay home and out of the war in the first place and I told her it was because really we were safe within the army then without, and that even if we were safe without it it is our duty to help our father and country all we can at what ever the cost. After lunch I came back here and did a little knitting. Then to try and comfort us some of the school children, a Quaker and Polly and a boy came to call on us and they too, what of course Polly came, you remember, told you about her. She is a very pretty little girl--and then the other two, and then Polly, and I gave them afternoon tea and little cream cakes with chocolate icing on them, and they told me all about the nice things they would soon have for us. After they left, they stayed nearly five hours, I could couldn't help remember our loss and was standing by the window brooding, and then sat down in my chair to have the cry out, I couldn't resist, and had my hands covering my face when the surprising and interesting thing happened. At once I was startled by hearing some one calling out quite loud:

"Little princess, little prince, open your window; want to speak to you."

I felt sure it must mean me so I rose up, and opened my window and sure enough about enough it was that I'll used little girl who lives next door. Her father is good but she's got a housekeeper I don't approve of. She's cross and scolds the child all the time, and Penrod this evening will go over and command her to stop abusing the little girl. Don't you remember you told me about her last Sunday, when at noon time we were coming from Mass, and she was on her front steps with a tall gentleman? You said she had such nice soft brown hair you were sure I would like to feel it. She had been nodding and smiling at me and when I accused it was dark over the sea and I didn't see her, in fact I wasn't looking that way any way though she said I seemed to, she wanted to find out the reason why, so she opened her window and called out. Of course I explained things, she really was so very foolish for you to lose for I could tell it in her voice, and then she asked me to come over and play with her. I told her my sisters were ill from their sorrow and couldn't leave them alone, and she wanted to know why my father and mother and brother couldn't bring me. I told her they were not home, and how old I was. He is older than I am I believe about ten, but she has no mother here she's far away and her father I know now is a man by the name of Henry Dawson and he's one of the high members of the General I know him well. He's a real Ablesianian. Her mother married him in this court my a little after they came over and they're good people too. I was telling her about my brother and others and was much was just going to ask her name, when some one came to the window--I know it was her half-sister and scolded her for standing in the doorway, and then blamed me for it. Then they both went away and shut the window, and I was so indignant that I went downstairs with the purpose to have that maid arrested and live! I started when Penrod pointed to I promised to take a hand and per- and "I don't doubt that it is true, but he said he would never forgive the enemy and would not let his revenge in time. He loves us still more, says we look like little children who have lost heaven for not believing, as he calls it, and will strike for us when he sees the time when we will Pen-rod. I have sent some letters to Aunt Mary but they came back unanswered with the statement the mail cannot go because of destroyed communications."

"The Glandelinians are certainly very cruel and wicked," said Angelina A-onbu-g in a tone of great conviction "to treat you and your sisters like they do at the time but this is the worst."

"I know," whimpered Violet, but "but what was wrong that the Glandelinians should attack, attack, and which was loaded only with refugees. It wasn't dark enough to be fooled when they attacked it. They knew it was a passage to safety."

Angelina A-onbu-g hesitated. "No one could tell exactly, but, think,--I almost assure--that you and two sisters were known to be on the train. That excuse that they didn't know it was a refugee train is only an alibi."

"Knew that my two sisters were on the train with Aunt Mary--oh Angelina how could that be? One had any right to be mean to my sisters just because they brought little hell to Aunt Mary. Jennie and Angelina were so good, everybody loved them."

"Well you see that isn't the point. Your sisters are different from Glandelinians, and all Glandelinians of the wicked order order that the good. The deed of securing them from these my friends must have been considered as the greatest offense committed by you and sisters against wicked Glandelinians. I don't know how some cause knowing the truth they might take on their own to which I said for it. That is the result, it is now reported the y died in the forest fire. If it is true it is the saddest thing on the coast, but it'll bring back luck for Glandelinians."

Jennie herself suddenly said, seeing Violet's face; "it is all very dreadful, but if Jennie and Angelina had only lived, I'm sure every thing would be all right. I wonder where poor Emperor-Vivian went. He has not been here since this morning."

"I don't know I'm sure," said Angelina A-onbu-g wistfully. "He must have went back to his battling armies now for the battle has not even ceased yet you know."

"I wish we could find him," said Jennie thoughtfully.

"Why my pet?"

"Because I know he must be very lonely. You know everybody says no man in the world has such good children as he has, and perhaps most of his old friends are dead by this time. I know he must be dreadfully unhappy, when this cruel thing has happened to him."

"You dear kind tender-hearted little girl!" said Violet as she was kissing her. "I believe indeed you would make the whole world happy if you could, but there is the clock striking half past six and we must hurry and dress ourselves shall be late for supper and--"

"Oh oh I'm my sisters back. Oh Jennie and Angelina don't tell me you are dead. Oh, Oh, Oh. I want them back."

Angelina A-onbu-g and Violet jumped, Jennie paled, and was at the bedside of voice at once. "Oh oh everything is all right," she screamed.

Oh to see Jennie and Angelina, in the first moment, saw them save them."

"Get the doctor," cried Violet to Jennie. "He's upstairs with mother and my--"

"What's the matter?" asked Angelina A-onbu-g as Jennie ran to do Violet's bidding.

"Oh I'm so scared scared," said Violet with flying hands nervously.

"She's delirious," and again the plaintive cry came again this time more petulant and louder. "They're gone, they're gone. Buried to death. I saw them I saw them. Oh I'm going to go with me up but I'm up."

Jennie soon returned and the doctor was with her. He hastened by the bed side and examined her.

"No, she's not delirious," said the doctor. "She is still in a swoon and in that condition she seems to see the fate of your two sisters. I must bring her two at all costs or she'll go into a full swoon."

"Oh and where is Pen-rod?" asked Violet. "I'm sure he could do something for her."

"Why he's down stairs telephoning to General Viviananna," said the doctor. "At least he was."

"Jennie begged Violet, "go down and send him up, hurry please. Oh I'm so scared that some thing will happen to voice."

Jennie was off as quickly as possible and a few minutes later she returned with Pen-rod. Joy was to her self by this time but she was weeping wildly and piteously. It was a good thing for if she had come to and had only been in a sort of hard upathy where you couldn't say, something bad might have happened.

Piteous as it was to Pen-rod to see her weeping so, it was nevertheless a relief and he thanked the doctor heartily for bringing her to.

Pen-rod took his seat by the bed and soon hand Joices had hand in his though he let her weep to her heart's content. Jennie felt a little scared at seeing all this grief, and Angelina A-onbu-g took the other side of the bed kneeling down and lifting Joices' face and sustained face on her arm tried to soothe her. "telling her again and again that maybe it wasn't so, that it may be a probably that two other children may have perished in the flames and were mistaken for Jennie and Angelina. But it was of no avail for the papers said so and the had been no other children in the place. Without being seen Violet slipped out of the room and went where Pen-rod had last looked at the papers but could not find it. Pen-rod though heart broken too over the loss was furious over the distress of his sisters. To him it was going too far. He decided to speak with the Glandelinians when the opportunity presented itself.

He and even the doctor and Angelina A-onbu-g stayed with her for a long time that is the doctor did, until she quieted down, and then he left but Pen-rod and Angelina stayed. Finally Pen-rod seeing that his other sisters had been aroused and had been also weeping suggested that they should attend the service even though it seemed useless since it was reported that the little girls were dead, but despite that they believed the papers, their faith in God was as strong in proportion as their goodness and so they prepared themselves. Joices alone was not in a condition to go so the doctor said, but she was determined to go nevertheless and no one could shake her intention, and so off they went. Jennie and Angelina also attending. When it commenced, the priest indeed was surprised to see them after what the news papers had said. He was really dumbfounded, for he had not expected such faith not even in them, and he then thought that they might either did not see the papers or when the extract was read did not believe it.

To be sure that faith he rather prolonged the service, by giving an extra twenty minutes or half an hour to his instructions or sermon, though he also fiercely denounced the Glandelinians as vile murderers and the like and named people who may be foreigners in the country going to the church of the horrible sin they would commit who would side with Glandelinians in any way. He then spoke beseechingly in behalf of the little girls, asking them to pray much harder on the following day, asking God to please to make it turn out sure that the news papers made a mistake as to the children's found buried in the fire.

Violet and her sisters kept their faces hid in their hands all the time praying and weeping piteously and the congregation was so moved with pity that it was not necessary for the priest to beg them to increase their efforts. By the way, Jennie herself didn't believe the news to be true, but she had the children and the children's news to increase their own devotion, and asked them to double their efforts by making and sacrifices and to say other extra prayers. Little Emma Mary Dawson was also at the service with her and Joices and she felt strange and fearful in that mournful church.

Jennie was usually thoughtful and sad that evening after the return from the solemn service. She had very little to say at supper, and when she alone only ate, and when later they had gone back to the princesses room, and she had found Violet and her four sisters lying on the bed quiet but gloomy she still had very little to say. She sat with Angelina A-onbu-g by an open window, watching with intense interest distant lightning flashes in a distant thunder cloud, though overhead the stars were now shining. The full moon illusion however was made to the subject of the afternoon until Jennie was in bed, and then just as Angelina A-onbu-g was sitting down besides Joices bed to watch, little Jennie, having gone to bed, the child suddenly lifted her head from the pillow and seeing Violet and her sisters had apparently died themselves to sleep asleep inquired;

"Angelina what was that mammae name before she was married to Emperor Vivian?"

"Angelina A-onbu-g looked up with a start of surprise.

"I'll think about that," said Angelina looking cautiously toward the little sleeper. "It seems a very strange thing to say I suppose, but really Jennie I do not know and neither do they. You see they were not born yet long after she was married and because of the dreadful war and of all sorts of getting in to the army she had never happened to mention it to them or me, and because of the enemy spies it also was something that they good father did not like to talk about, and I never took the news to ask him though he is my father. Sometimes I wish I had thought for it seems so queer when people ask me not to be able to tell them my sister's name."

Jennie gave a little sigh and looked mournfully toward the other beds.

"I don't suppose you could dare ask him now then," she said.

Angelina's eyes flashed, and her sweet face was quite hard as she answered;

"I don't believe, would try it. Hanley is one of those who would give anything to know, and, once told my Uncle never to say anything about it until the war was over. All his Highlandian genes always treated my good little cousins very cruelly and hate them all."

"Yes Angelina, I hate them too. This has I know made Empress Vivian very unhappy for she loved his daughters so dearly and to lose two of them at once was a terrible blow. But oh we hope that the news paper didn't tell the truth."

The news was a pause and then she continued. "I'll bet he might be a good deal glad if some one finally could prove that the news made a mistake, and I'm just wondering if he wouldn't be proud of you when he sees how you too take care of his little daughter. And also----" she looked cautiously toward the beds, and saw that the little girls were lying in the same posture. "I bought a news paper too when the extras came out, so if Penrod hid the one he bought I've got another I didn't read it though for I haven't got the heart."

"Let me see it," said Angelina Aronburg.

"Not in here," said Jannie. "Penrod will be mad at me if his sisters gets a glimpse of it in here. He says they couldn't stand it."

She motioned Angelina Aronburg to follow her, and they went out into the hall. Jannie had not kept the whole paper but had cut out the piece stating about the deaths of Jennie and Angelina. She this with-drew it from her waist and handed it to her. It was the front page of the news paper and in big black headlines the paper gave forth the dreadful words "THE TWO VIVIAN GIRLS PERISH IN FOREST FIRES." Then it went on to state:

"The bodies of Jennie and Angelina were found so badly changed that only what remained of them could be salvaged for anything as a funeral. They had been caught in the midst of the blazing forest on the other side of a lake which they had crossed, the forest fire having combined into two sections the other they escaped from by going down stream as is supposed having failed to get them, but the other came up unexpectedly as they were going through the forest on the other side of the lake catching them a mile away. They failed to leave anything for identification such as trinkets, and a pair of easy Rosemary bands was the only thing found under a bush that bodies. There was a letter hidden under the body of one of them but no means to identify the letter as it was scorched by the hot ground. The one known as Angelina was some what smaller than Jennie and the heat had burst her body open to that all the entrails lay out ward. They had met a horrible death in the path of the forest fire. There will be mourning for the whole nation. What has remained of their cremated bodies will be if possible shipped to Empress Vivian in caskets for burial."

It went on with other details telling of the circumstances which led to their deaths and of the consequences to follow, and that the finders of the bodies the Ranger gave them heart felt sympathies for their remaining sisters.

Angelina Aronburg however smiled to herself at the news. She hid the paper inside her waist, and telling Jannie not to say anything, went back to where Penrod was sitting by Joice's bed watching over her.

"Penrod," said Angelina in a whisper, "can you come out side for a few moments. Jannie will watch her until you come back. I want to ask you something. Please. It won't be long."

Penrod looked queerly at Angelina but he rose in obedience to her wish and Jennie took his place while he went out with her.

When they were outside in the hall Penrod asked:

"Penrod, did you read the paper about the deaths of your two dear little sisters?"

"No I only saw the headlines," said Penrod heartily.

"I thought so. How big are Angelina and Jennie?"

"Why Jennie is only two inches taller. Why?"

"Well I'm sorry," said Angelina, "but for my sake then read your paper. I'll explain later. I've read the news and want to see what you'll think."

"But surely Angelina I feel so often already, can't bear it."

"You will be able to bear it if you'll understand the reading. If you don't I'll read it to you as I have the front page of a paper in my possession."

Penrod looked white. "What do you mean?" he gasped.

"Well we read your paper and you'll see."

"Come into my state room he said and I'll look it over."

He led the way in and from under his pillow drew the newspaper. He looked at her questionly and she said "no need to read it aloud, just read it."

He went over the details swiftly with a trembling hand but could only go half way through it and couldn't stand no more. He noticed that Angelina Aronburg was smiling.

"Don't you understand yet," she insisted. "Don't you notice the size of the children? I don't believe they are Angelina and Jennie. Angelina's description is too small."

"Yes they may have been burned to compare to that size," said Penrod with a shaky voice. "But believe you are sadly mistaken. Gertrude but I hope by God's good mercy will that you are not. Then there is some hope yet."

They returned back into the room and heard as they opened the door Joice crying to Jannie:

"Leave me alone Jannie, tell you, I'm not half so grief stricken. Stricken as my poor little sisters here. I wailed and cried and screamed, but look at them they are worse than me. Oh Jennie and Angelina for my and their sake if you really are not dead please try and come back."

Violent and her sisters were not alone with their parents in their grief. Aunt Mary when she had been able to get back home, and heard the details, and then the extras later, was prostrated and was in about as bad a condition as her sister was. She blamed herself for it and would not be comforted and her housekeeper had to call a doctor for her. Her own case was a too both but she had her faith felt, sure and anything that she was responsible to for the disaster she had done all in her power to have the two little girls found even at any cost of men and expense but no trace of them had been even so much as traced. When she saw it in an Angelina Agatha paper that the two little girls had perished it was too much, and she had gone into hysterics.

Little Rosemary did not forget her intention of speaking to her papa on the subject of the little princess next door. It was after nine o'clock that day evening when Mr. Dawson reached home, but despite all Gloria's remonstrances and assurances that such conduct had never been heard of in any Abbeonian families, Rosemary was still up and dressed, and she flew to meet her father at the front door, and was soon settled comfortably on his knee. Mr. Dawson indeed was very fond of his little daughter. Gloria declared he spoiled her out rancorously, and perhaps Gloria was right. He listened with a smile to all Rosemary had to tell him of what she had done during his absence. Absence but when he came to the account but when she came to the account of the afternoon experience he looked rather grave.

"I really was dreadfully lonely," Rosemary finished rather mournfully. "It's just hard to never have any one to play with. Don't you think it was very unkind in Gloria not to let me talk to the poor heart broken little princess next door? The brother came over and scolded her for it."

"Gloria was right not to let you stand by the open window if she thought you might get struck by lightning, as she's wholly responsible for what happens to you," said Mr. Dawson with decision. "But I don't think she meant to be rude when she didn't let you speak or explain matters to the little princess. I felt sure of some nice English talking Abbeonian children to come and play with you some times, but I thought the last experience in that line did not turn out very well."

"Now papa please don't talk about that," said Rosemary pouting. "I told you what disagreeable girls those were, and how they wanted me to do things I couldn't possibly do, and said something unpleasant about most of us foreigners making trouble for their nation. I'm quite sure the little princess isn't like them. Oh papa dear won't you please let me go and see her and also her sisters to morrow? Think of it they have lost two of their sisters who had died in a forest fire. They must be dreadfully, dreadfully sad--and they can't be anything but good I know it, and their brother was over here and scolded Mr. Miss Gloria for saying something to the princess princess which was not nice, and told her that she must under penalty bring me over to see them to morrow. Otherwise she won't be forgiven."

Mr. Dawson hesitated. Rosemary's little anger face was raised to his in earnest pleading, and something in the description of the sorrow of the princess which he also had read to day too touched him greatly.

"Well," he said rather doubtfully or doubtfully, "I scarcely know what to say. You know the little girls though they are beside in the house next door just now are only using the place as their headquarters, they have all the say there as they are princesses and persons of very unusually high rank, in fact only their father, and their gun-dien Jack Evans only have command over them, no one else. They are very dignified too, and the fact I'm almost half afraid to have you play with children whose families are of such high rank as Monarchs, and yet in this case if their brother the princess Vivian really said that I suppose you have a pull with them or at least with him. Of course they don't look down on any body no matter how much lower they are than them because they are little girls better far better than anyone, but in some cases they do look down on foreigners for some reason. I have not only proved to be a troublemaker and coward, but have even aided with the enemy of Abhannia. Yes, Mrs. Jerry who in their house keeps one of the best old Abhannian ladies I have ever heard of, and I am sure you will have some chance to see them though it might be a pretty big question. I don't think there can be any harm on your calling on the princesses, if it is possible you can really see them. You can try and see but I am sure you are expecting a whole lot at that in the present situation of so many now even prominent people have not been permitted to see them and it seems hardly likely you'll be admitted. But I'll give you the permission and you may try it any way and if you cannot see them then I'm so sorry. Gloria will go with you of course, for she'll have to vouchsafe for you for the Princesses are angel possessed and can easily judge by appearance what sort of a little girl you are and whether you are worthy of their association or not. But what are we thinking of! Look at the clock and you not in bed. What will Gloria say to us. Now give me a kiss little woman and run off to bed like a good girl."

Rosemary having gained her point had no further objections to going to bed and after bestowing on her father a rapturous embrace, she flew upstairs to impart to Gloria the delightful news that papa had given his consent, and she was going to see the little princess to-morrow. Whatever Gloria's opinion on the subject had been, she had the good sense to keep it to herself. He had a great respect for Mr. Dawson, who paid her great wages for her care of his little daughter, and always treated her with kindness and consideration, however she could not resist the marking, that those Princesses were too good a bunch of little girls for her association and that it would be a wonder in their condition they would permit her to visit them even if Prince Penrod told her to bring the little girl over, but she made no further objections, in fact in her heart she didn't object if the issue would be a successful one. She really respected and adored the princesses ~~tatattt~~ greatly and she really regretted she had spoken so harshly to one of them, but she had not known she was the princess at the time, and inwardly felt Rosemary was to blame more than she.

Rosemary fell asleep with a light heart and the happy consciousness that she should see so fairly a new acquaintance with her interesting neighbor in the morning though during her night prayers she had asked God not to let her fail. Her determination was unshaken, and even before she was dressed next morning after her morning prayers she had run to the back window to try and catch a glimpse of the little girl, and not only was not disappointed but saw three of them standing by one of the windows, while one of them the tallest and a certainly very pretty one came to the next window to pull up the shade, just as she was peering through the curtains, and she felt sure these were the sisters of one she had spoken to the afternoon before.

It was not raining to day but the sky was dark and gloomy and it was very hot and close outside. She would have liked to have made her call after breakfast and after having returned from Mass, but that she knew to be impossible. Miss May the daily governess came every morning summer or winter from eight till eleven and even papa indulgent as he was would not allow lesson hours to be interfered with, even in the summer when he wanted his daughter to learn plenty and for one didn't even believe in a summer school vacation. Of course Rosemary was very willing in a way to learn her lessons she was not a school hater and was very interested in all her lessons so that she could tell quite a few things that some school teachers couldn't do. Despite her hurry to get to any in wishing to go to see the princesses she was more attentive to lessons than usual, and indeed she was so studious, that good natured Miss May told her, that if she keeps on this way she herself may be a great school teacher some day that if it is the case she would intend to be. At the clock began striking eleven Rosemary was on her feet with the joyful exclamation--

"Eleven o'clock, Miss May--Now, can go can't I?"

Miss May sighed and closed the geography book with an air of resignation, but Rosemary was already in the closet, searching for a rain hat and jacket for it was beginning to rain again.

"Gloria, Gloria!" she called impatiently "are you ready? I'm through!"

Gloria appeared, stern and disapproving, but outwardly calm. Indeed Miss May manifested a denial to remain and chat with the maid but the little girl speedily nipped such dangerous delay in the bud.

"You must please excuse us a light away, Miss May," she said pulling impatiently at Gloria's skirt as she spoke. "I've got a very important engagement this morning."

"Oh Miss Dawson how can you be so rude," remonstrated Gloria as she and her little charge having closed the front door behind them--were mounting the steps of the boarding house next door. "You know perfectly well there was not the least hurry about your going out this morning and it's going to be another shower" as it began thundering in the distance again and the sky north westward was getting as black as an ace of spades.

Gloria Rosemary looked a little ashamed but she was aware of the necessity of a reply, for at that moment the door was opened by a neat servant girl in full uniform, and at the sight of her Rosemary was a little scared and embarrassed, and she also suddenly remembered something that she had hit her to quite forgotten; she did not know the princesses' full name.

"Is Princess--?" mean are the good little princesses at home? she faltered feeling suddenly rather shy and uncertain how to proceed as the girl so out looked very dignified and was beautifully dressed as if she was of very high rank. (It was Argalinda Aronburg).--Oswald to her relief the girl scolded.

"The Vivian Princesses you mean," she said readily. "Oh yes she's at home I think I know you, as one of them spoke to me about you yesterday afternoon--do you want to see her or them?"

"Yes," said Rosemary. "Tell her it's Rosemary Pearson--but I forgot--she doesn't know my name either--tell her it's the little girl who spoke to her from the window last night or yesterday afternoon." The girl scolded again, and showed Rosemary and Gloria into the parlor--while she went upstairs to deliver the message. She returned in about six minutes and said:

"I'm so sorry you cannot see all of them, they have this morning cried themselves to sleep, but you can see the one I believe who you spoke to yesterday as she would be glad, very glad to see her visitor, and would Rosemary please walk upstairs."

It was with a fast beating heart that Rosemary in accordance with this request, ran lightly up the two flights of stairs to the third story followed more slowly by the disapproving Gloria. The door of the large room was open and in the doorway, her sweet face showing her anticipation but so new and both hands extended in friendly loving welcome, stood poor Violet herself.

"Oh I'm so glad to see you," she said leading her way hospitably into the room. "I told my brothers and sisters all about you, and they were interested and hoped you would come. I didn't believe you would really come, but I hoped you might. Now won't you sit down?" drawing forward the low rocker in which she in her morning mourning and longing spent so many hours each day. "So is that with you, you said." And she looked at Gloria but not angrily as expected.

"Yes," said Rosemary. "It's Gloria, Gloria she's my name you know."

She spoke rather indifferently, but Violet turned at once to the maid with such sweet cordiality that the lady felt more sorry than ever that she had spoken to her the day before in such fashion.

"I'm very glad to see you too," she said. "Please sit down. There are not many chairs except those beside my sisters' beds but this one is all right just wait until I take my big book off of it."

"Oh what a very big book!" exclaimed Rosemary with eager curiosity, while Gloria, who really had a very kind heart, underneath her prim fussy ways, mostly compelled upon her looked mollified and murmured a polite "Thank you" as she took the offered seat. The mention of the big book led to an explanation from Violet, and Rosemary and even Gloria looked on with deep interest, while she described the stories in the book to them, and read a few paragraphs, in answer to Rosemary's eager "do show me how you do it." It was all very wonderful, and Rosemary's interest in the princess deepened every moment, though she looked wisely at the little girls either lying or sitting on their beds, wide awake but taking apparently no interest in anything and looking as if they had been lost from Heaven.

"So you know," she said modestly, when Violet had finished explaining, and put the big book away in its place. "I didn't know your name and had to ask at the door for the 'Little Princesses.' I don't believe you know my name either."

"Oh yes," said Violet soberly. "At least I know your name is Rosemary Rosemary Dawson; Mrs. Jerry told me so last night at supper. She heard us talking at the window, and she asked me about it. He didn't know your middle name though, and said you might not have any as Rose and Mary are good names."

"My whole name is Rosemary Cecilia Dawson," said Rosemary proudly. "And mine is Violet Mary Vivian and those are my sisters. My brother is the next room and is with Jack Evans planning something. He won't be in for some hours."

"Violet Mary Vivian, what a very beautiful name." Exclaimed Rosemary. "It sounds like a name I've read of some persons in Heaven. I wish I had such a pretty name. Is your first name real or a nickname?"

"My real name is Violet," Violet exclaimed, "but every one has called me Violet because I love every thing in Violet color, though I love all colors. But, mostly, I love violet reminders to my dearer and violet violet ribbons. Papa likes it better because that was my mother's maiden name, though it is now Annabella. The real violet though they call her Annia."

"I am a great Violet Mary Vivian is a very beautiful name, and fits such a good little girl like you. I wish I was as good. Have you always lived in Pandora?"

"We do not live anywhere particular since the war broke out. We lived in the city till the war came on. We still have our home the enemy had never touched it, and it is such a lovely home."

"Why don't you and your sister live there now?" Rosemary inquired bluntly, with a glance around the beautifully furnished room. You like Pandora much better?"

Violet thinking of her sad loss flushed deeply. "Because our side is with our father," she said. "Papa was so afraid would not prevail against the enemy and his generals either. If we didn't help them, the home here but she is ill because our two sisters are dead now," and he lips began to quiver, and we are almost afraid to leave the house for fear that the may be very bad when we are gone. Our home is still safe, but since the progress of the war at Depressionsville we had to flee here to save ourselves, and now Jennie and Angeline are gone," and she fought hard to drive back the rebellious tears. "Were we? Weren't you sorry to leave your real home so far behind?" Rosemary asked sympathetically.

"Yes indeed it was such a dear old place, but it was harder for mother and father than it was for us, because they are so much older, and they lived there so much longer. I think they minded going away more almost than anything else. We were able however to bring our own good home with us by freight. They are beautiful horses jet black, and Jennie's only has one white spot on his forehead. Poor Jennie called him Black Beauty because he was just like black Beauty in the story. He and our horse would go so fast, and to us they are as gentle as a dog, and to father, mother and our brother too and would follow us anywhere even we went if we didn't watch them, so strangers could ride him however. The other unless we ourselves stood there while the party got on, or the horses would throw you off. The horses we were not born that way, we trained them to do that so the landladies couldn't capture them. We are so fond of our horses, and sometimes we did ride them for a lack down the street of the city."

"I hope my papa will never fail on account of this awful war," said Rosemary a little apprehensively. "We have no plantation or good home, but we have a lovely country place near the sea shore at St. Mary's. We may up northwest. I've got a pony too—a darling little bay one—and some beautiful rabbits and guinea pigs, and even many bunnies. I'm oh so sorry that you lost your two sisters, but some how Princess I have a feeling that makes it impossible to believe the news papa told me he saw in the paper a la la last night. It wasn't right that you and your sister should have to suffer like this, and, prayed hard last night before going to bed that they would come back."

"How did you look rather surprised at hearing this from her little change for she had not expected it for Rosemary had appeared to be a spoiled self loving selfish child."

"I thank you for your sympathy," Violet said trying to smile through her tears, and some how I almost feel you have given me a little little hope. All the people of this city are very good and kind to us."

"And does your good father go out to the army and leave you every day?" Rosemary went on.

"No not often but he has gone away since he heard about the death deaths. He went yesterday afternoon despite how ill he was and got tired. Perched, know though he won't say so feels the loss more than any of us do. Oh he sure loves us dearly."

"And what do you do with yourselves all day now?" Inquired Rosemary with an glance around the room. "What do you keep your toys?" "This is our bed room, we don't keep toys here," said Violet. "They're in our play room down stairs. We have all kinds of books though, and we love reading better than anything else in the world. I've got so beautiful school books, even Latin and English. Then we knit some of the time, and we do a lot of other things, and we love the dear old Catholic church services too."

Rosemary looked much impressed.

"That must be very very interesting," she said. "I should like to play games with you too! If you would teach me how. But you really don't like reading lessons do you?" "Oh yes I like it very much. I love to go to school, and since the war we don't have much chance."

"But only for a few days," said Violet at least, she before her father became a citizen and joined the Gemini. "I love to go to school," said Violet. "They're awful wicked, and cruel." It was Violet's turn to look surprised but before she could express her surprise in words, however, there was a knock at the door.

Little Jennie who was sitting a little forlorn child by the window got up and opened the door.

"A morning news paper for Prince Penrod," said the maid as she came in solemnly, and depositing a morning paper on the nearest bed. "A news boy left it and he said as you are little increases there is nothing to pay."

Violet arose from her seat and spread the front section out. Then all the color went suddenly out of her face. She said nothing, but when the side of the room, she suddenly put up both hands before her face, her eyes were closed, and she burst into a perfect passion of tears.

"Oh what is it—what's the matter?" cried Rosemary, running to her new friends side, and slipping in arm around her waist. "It was not anything I said that made you cry, was it—oh I'm so very," and she was beside herself as others looked too and started to whisper.

"Oh, no, no," sobbed Violet, "it wasn't that—but the news in the paper is dreadful and that's the picture of my two lost sisters. They're coming back."

"Why do you cry then?" Rosemary inquired more and more bewilderment.

"I thought you would be glad."

"Their bodies are on the way. Oh they're really dead after all. Oh I can bear to tell Penrod. All hope is lost now. They're really dead after all." "Yes it is Jennie and Angeline after all dead and never to come back," sobbed Catherine. "Our two most beautiful sisters after all taken away from us—that we thought would always stay with us and never die. Oh how can it be and and they're angel possessed. They say you can't kill angel possessed ones not even fire couldn't. Oh it can't be it can't be. Oh we loved them so. Oh and we began to hope they would have all come back. Oh it will break father's heart, and I know mother will go crazy."

"Let me see the paper let me see it," begged Rosemary. "Please please." Violet sobbing still let her have the paper and Rosemary read it slowly and carefully. Something struck her funny about one part of the description but she couldn't make it out. He said it several times whole Violet's sister's looked on in surprise.

"Princess is it asking too much if you would let me see one of your pictures pictures of all your selves in full form?"

"We have but one picture," said poor sobbing little Daisy. "It's a big one and hangs on the wall down in our play room. It's too big to bring up here. When papa couldn't lift one end of the frame and he set it on too. We are in an unnatural size in the picture."

"Can I go down and see it Princess Daisy?"

"Yes yes, I'll take you down—down—down," sobbed Daisy.

She led the way down, coming along only he self while poor Violet had to follow her self on her bed and was weeping on so bitterly, and afraid to fall Penrod of the news for fear she couldn't stand it.

A slight flicker of hope thanks to Rosemary.

Daisy finally knocked at the door believing one of her friends was in the there but not a cleaving an answer opened the door and ushered Rosemary in. Upstairs Daisy, in more kind hearted than many people may think she was despite her plain ways did her own best to comfort those in such distress. Daisy let Rosemary take a very large picture which hung by strong fastenings against the wall. On that picture the appearance of the little girls were as natural as natural as if they were living only two were the which were not with them in the room upstairs.

"Oh—oh—what did you want to find out?" sobbed Daisy.

"Which are Angeline and Jennie? These three men asked pointing. "Oh—no," said Daisy trying to cheer check herself. "One are pointing at Joyce. That one is—" indicating is Jennie, and the one third one from her holding a beautiful bouquet in her hand is Angeline. The one dressed in a purple list and yellow dress. Why did you want to see them?"

"I wanted to compare the sizes of them," said Rosemary. She looked them over carefully while she looked at the description in a certain part of the paper. Then without saying so anything she went upstairs again followed by Daisy who despite her grief nevertheless wondered exceedingly.

On 11-28-61 beautiful, beautiful--most beautiful. Penn's Mary Hossner was in excellent excellent April's because on mm--that she lavished upon 7 10's and he--also--and Penn--too she couldn't bring them to feel vind in any way, they always looked so lonely at Mary's little girl they passed hoping--that they would be Jennie and Angeline now--a--during and often the new tears in their eyes. They were at that time during the drive passing a small strictly guarded prison camp near the park where a Gladiolus was a field and one of the men--seeing Rosemary and Glor--in who were for--en--riding that with that he knew were the Vivian girl prisoners old curly

"What a way you two fellows - a childless dog too - riding with the high-tailed brats. You have no right to you little Christian dog you." Rosemary was always a sort of slightly spoiled child, she had never in her life been punished or scolded by her father, and that was why usually when she believed herself right she had scolded back at Gloria. She was a tough little girl pretty as she was and never in her day had taken insults from any body grown up or children of her own nationality that she was not at them like a furious wild cat. Rosemary had to day seeing the sorrow of her friends been more gentle and more considerate than in before, and though she was rather a selfish little girl, over-indulged, and very hard to please, she had a kind heart, and the sight of the prisoners and the grief unjustly come upon them had brought out all that was best in her nature and was making a better girl. It had been a very pleasant feeling too to try by all she could do for them to make them a little happier, and to see that she was not succeeding, had cut her heart exactly in two. How to have this Glandinian, persons whom she really detested in her heart insult her and then too had worked her up to the highest pitch of passion in her and which a mother would even have scolded, she had matched the wild whip from her own hand with a stick of fury on the carriage and stopped, and if it had been for the fellow finally darting after a few more blows she would have torn his face up terrible. Rosemary was always high spirited, eager to wild arguments assaulted, and two soldiers of the guard had to take the man whose face was bleeding away to have him treated. None of the soldiers even made any remarks for they had heard the insult and felt sure the little girl had a right to do it. At her vicious evilious face glaring at them with the whip still in her hand the other men at Glandinians not be so very and edged away to better cover of out of a reach for when she would slash at them. Violent and her assistants were too absorbed in their own thoughts to be surprised or shocked at this incident, and Gloria kind of guessed she knew the fighting nature of her little charge for that and at home in their other country was never found a boy who could lick her on a girl either.

"Did you remember about those photographs and the newspaper? Violet and I had a hard whisper and the first moment the little girl and the princess were in love together."

"Yes" said one "Mary" gave it to papa and he said he would take it to the office, and have the bodies inter-captured for further and thorough examination especially for identification of "pinkies."

"I think of what do you mean to think of?" asked Violet.
"Why something they may have carried with them and then seeing they could not save themselves and would die, he'd placed them underneath themselves to be able to be identified."

be identified." Joice herself gave a sigh of relief, but Violet looked queer and Joice said:

"And I was glad. How else, I suppose we can feel about it, whether we have a reason to feel "about it or not. It was so for friends Argall and A. Onberg - I've got to ask you last night night if any news paper had come for you yesterday. Any. And no. And if she would, and she should not have known that I'd like her - for we couldn't talk to any one else under any conditions you know, but she never would. A word about it, and now if she asks this evening if any thing like that comes to my I can just say no, and she'll go on thinking that we have not cleared up the other bad news. She can't hardly believe any longer."

fu - that - bed - here, she can't - hardly - bed - for - any - more - on - the - drive, and when - it - was - after - while - when - they - came - back - from - from - the - drive, and when - the - 910 - in - took - Violet, and - her - sister - and - that - brother - home - just - for - the - week - of - the - company - still - to - leave, and - found - that - Aracelia - A - un - bu - g - was - there, Aracelia - was - surprised - to - hear - of - the - plane - as - that - had - come - to - Violet - and - he - sister - and - that - brother - and - she - thanked - also - in - a - pretty - for - her - kindness - to - the - policeman, and - was - together - was - so - gracious - and - for - her - kindness - to - the - policeman - was - from - that - moment.

for a minute, that Ole was in here at that moment. They are not the only ones of them including the brother" dia informed the cook on her way home. They are dreadfully distressed because over the loss of their relatives and all that property did for they could not make them feel happy and the he said I was afraid to go to to them. He, he I can't help laughing. "You like, but I thought to have seen the way you money stretched that splendid Indian before a face with a whip then he called us Christian dogs. They are brave little girls, the girl had craved them many dreadful years, and they have a hard time to get them alone, but I've often felt my experience of living in the best of families that I may be entitled to know good little girl-law when, and them, hardly believe they are great possessed though. I believe they are little angels themselves."

"The day after my marriage, like the beginning of pleasure for Violet and her sister, for Rosemary was determined to make them happy despite their loss if possible, in fact in her heart she didn't believe that they were actually dead. Rosemary always an affectionate impulsive little person, had taken a violent fancy to the beautiful little girl and that brother too and scarcely a day passed on rain or shine on which she either did not send for her new friends or go to them, to play with her, to take a walk and live in the park, copying the phonograph, though Rosemary took care not to play any places that had any doleful tunes, neither notes standing all the love and endurance that she lavished upon her Rosemary really had been a lonely child, and this new companionship was a most delightful experience in her life, and that presence too was more good than for her own; their ways were absolutely catting; she was more and more good now herself and more respectful to Gloria, and Gloria more ready to help most of the trouble had been Rosemary fault for she had often aggravated poor Gloria beyond measure, and several times she had been tempted to quit her job.

Van though not happy, just as his own Violet and her sisters tried to hide their self-grief, was always ready, and their sweet bright holy nature was unconsciously bringing a new good element into the big luxurious house next door. Violet or any of her sisters never wanted to change the dolls' names, what ever they were now the same to them, and Papa when he came pretended he was the papa of the dolls, and the six little girls would play together by the hour though at times the appearance of two of the little dolls made them think of their sisters and they would hug the dolls and cry. Once Rosemary soothed them by saying decidedly: "I don't care what you say I don't believe you two sisters are dead, and you may see them again. Papa last night said that angel possession children cannot even be killed. I'm afraid they are not the bodies of your sisters and I hope they ain't I hate the scandalousness."

Then when Rosemary found out how far from her friends she was off books to cheer them and make them happier she suggested reading aloud to them, and the proposal was received with such a hail of attitude, that her vain little soul was flattered, and from that day to the end of her student amusement was reading to the princess. Violet and her sister were so fond of lessons so was Rosemary for she could find ambition, and the discovery that the princess who had had so few advantages on account of the war of going to school, was so much more familiar with historical and geographical and other facts and personalities, and knew all about military life, how to drill soldiers and child scouts than she herself was an unpleasant one even though it did not make her envious. It made her more ambitious for she thought the more she knew the more she could do for her beautiful friends. Miss May began to find her pupil far more an initiate in those days than ever before though even before she never kept an eye on the clocks between nine and eleven and often did not know it was that time and felt like scolding when the governor gave a new clock the book and said "time is up," and wanted to go on a little longer until the governor said "so my Rosemary but father must pay me for working over time if, do you a time is from eight to eleven, why don't you go to school then?"

Because of being the head of the powerful Gemini of his own branch Mr. Dawson was a very busy man and though devoted to his little girl he to his regret did not see as very much of her, he had perfect confidence in her and left the arrangements of most things concerning Rose Mary in her hands. He had no near relations in Pander, his only sister lived in Calverline, the way made for her easy and on the one visit she had made to her brother in law years ago he had so much to say about the danger and folly of spoiling children especially in such a strict country like Abbeville, and about the manner in which her own little boys and girls were brought up, that Rose Mary had taken an intense dislike to her, called her a meddling old busy body, and had been so naughty, wilful, capricious and impatient during her own visit that Mr. Dawson had been actually compelled to leave her again, and would at times go alone to see her.

However, Mr. DeGruy was delighted to see his little girl so happy, and of her attempts to "play" away the noisiness of a joint and her attempts, and he listened with the greatest interest to her detailed accounts of the past.

of a loss of Violet, and he waited until the next day, but it happened that the little girl and the princess themselves arrived about four days after their acquaintance with Rosemary. Then a comely house one who came after afternoon tea had been called, he found the children together in the parlor. The little girl and herself Violet and her sisters, except Daisy were sitting listlessly on a big lounge, looked forlorn and being unusually quiet, but Daisy was at the piano, softly playing a sad and doleful tune. Now it seemed they felt better even though it made them cry to hear or play sad music. At the night of her father Rosemary jumped up with an exclamation of pleasure.

"Oh papa, here's the poor little princess! I don't you to see them so much."

Mr. Dawson smiled, but his glance was very kind and sympathetic as it rested on the sweet angelic faces whose those big blue beautiful eyes. Daisy and her sisters had risen at once on his entrance, for they respected and loved every good person no matter what the rank and though readily above every body acted as if they were not. To them now Mr. Dawson was the great and omnipotent power in whose hands rested the fate of their two sisters. He was to find out whether they really died or not. Little did she dream that Mr. Dawson, was bending his utmost and that the bodies had been intercepted at Evangeline St. Clair's city, and that every thing of clues were being examined, and that the trinkets and other things found still preserved and which had been given up by the hangers who had found the bodies were sent to Mary Vivian for proof. He took the hands of the first two Vivian girls, and told them he was more glad to see them and that he had heard a great deal about them from his little daughters. Then his eyes again wandered to the open piano and he inquired:

"Were you not playing when I came in?"

"Oh I was trying to play," she said. "I can't play anything today. I'm so upset. But you and my sister can play any music! I'm sure we have learned them well. We were playing a little but the music of a piano makes us so sad now since our two sisters are dead."

"That is more than most of us can do I fancy," said Mr. Dawson. "Are you little princesses fond of music?"

"Daisy's face brightened a little.

"Oh yes indeed we are," she said eagerly. "We love it dearly."

"Then you ought to take music lessons," said Mr. Dawson looking interested and forgetting what she had told him before. He was passionately fond of music himself and so was Rosemary, and despite her age to his delight Rosemary could play anything you would give her with notes and play songs by heart without song books either. He, not thinking had started playing "Dancing Nellie Gwynn" on the piano but Violet had begged her to stop it as that song reminded him of their loss. He met a young lady at a friend's house the other day, who played so remarkably well on the piano."

"You must misunderstand me," said Daisy. "I said we can play any instrument that comes our way even to those of a band. My two sisters who are dead now could play beautifully and we could sing too. Mother weched us and we like best of all to play a Wal-tz or a waltz that sounds so loud and pretty."

Mr. Dawson laughed, patted the beautiful little heads, and said also that he did not believe Mr. Dawson planned would allow such a blow to come upon them. That he didn't believe their sisters were dead, said a few more pleasant words, promised that he would be glad to be so good to them, and then went away up at six feeling indeed as if he had been in the presence of angels for what he had a strange glad feeling; he could not account for it was on the following Sunday morning that Rosemary and Gloria made their appearance at the boarding house at a much earlier hour than usual.

"I've come to take you little Princesses home with me to spend the whole day," Rosemary announced. "This is my birthday, you know and we are going to have a perfectly lovely time. In the first place we're all going to have a party in the carriage, and yesterday my father bought me lots of birthday presents. He gave me fifty dollars this morning, but I told him stupid old money was not a real present so he laughed, and said I could give it to the priest as an offering for my sisters' souls. He said he decided to do that and yesterday too papa gave me a lot of new records. After Mass you are coming home to lunch with me and our cook is going to make a beautiful birthday cake, with icing and candles and everything, and after lunch--and this is the best part of it! All papa has got seats for all of us down in front at five o'clock Sunday Music program in the Church Hall and you, my brothers I and Gloria are going; don't that be splendid! Oh I wish you could feel better today," she added. "I know that it is a loss to sister for a lost mind and so we go sick after our father thought I would die. Papa said you must go because you little Princesses are so fond of music. He's crazy about it himself and so am I, you know and he wants me to take extra lessons next winter."

but oh don't know, can we learn that fast, it's so awfully hard to get good musical instruments, and father is afraid he won't be able to get any."

"But couldn't you learn on your piano?" said Daisy a little anxiously. "I don't think it can be so dreadfully hard to learn, that is if you love it the way I and my dear sister do."

"You misunderstand me," said Rosemary. "I said unless father can get the music, I do not know how I can learn. I've asked him for some more and he can't find places selling any so many stores are closed."

"I said it would make your father happy," said Violet. "He does so many nice things for you all the time--oh besides ourselves Rosemary I don't believe my girl in the world ever had such a good father as you have, and I know you just love to please him. We have plenty of music sheets we are not using at the boarding house we could give you."

Rosemary looked a little uncomfortable.

"Of course I'd be glad to," she said rather hesitantly. "But I don't like to be taking things of yours. I'd rather give them to you. But now do hurry and get your books. Things on if you wish I'll buy the song books from you but I wouldn't take them for nothing. James will be here with the carriage in just a few minutes, and we've got such a lot to do after Mass. I never was late for Mass and am in such a hurry to go."

If they had not had lost their two sisters no doubt this birthday celebration would have been the happiest days of all yet to Violet and her sisters. Perched at first she refused to go to the music hall as he didn't care to hear any music in his and state, but he didn't want to be alone without the good little sisters remaining. The attendance to Mass, the holy Communion and a delicious lunch hardly of any which Violet and her sisters ate, and on best of all the fascinating opera with its pretty music only tended to make the poor little girls feel as sad as ever though of course they did not show it. Violet and her sisters never spoke during the whole performance, but did not show the captious enjoyment they had usually done when they heard such good music. The remembrance of their planned hardships added to their misery and it seemed at times that they could feel that way when they remembered their own loss, but if they saw now in the remembrance of the good Friday wasn't grateful it was equal to their own loss. Dear good little girls, even at this time there was a Passion Play going on at a certain big theatre and when Rosemary had asked the little girls to come and see it Violet shook her head.

"Oh," she said. "We can't stand that. It's too sad. We saw one once and couldn't stand it."

So the subject was dropped though both Rosemary and Gloria looked at the princesses in evident surprise. He herself with the Vivian girls with her seemed indeed to be living in a beautiful world from which she hated to come until they had left the theatre and were on their way home.

"Was it not nice?" said Rosemary as Gloria closed the door. Then Violet who was thinking oh so sadly about her two sisters came back to reality with a start.

"Nice," she echoed. "It was too beautiful--I didn't know there was anything so lovely in the world and yet it made us oh so sad as we listened. There was one piece that Jennie used to sing 'There's my wandering boy to night' and I felt oh as if I could cry forever."

Rosemary looked solemn.

"How you do love your sisters who are dead and gone don't you?" she said solemnly. "Didn't you ever go to the music theatre before?"

"Yes lots of times," said Daisy while her sisters were silent for several minutes. Then as they rode on they were all silent for nearly ten minutes until Rosemary who liked to talk much better than to think inquired:

"What are you thinking of?"

"I was just wondering," said Violet listlessly. "Whether there are any people in the world who love their brothers and sisters as much as we do each other. I'm afraid not!"

Rosemary opened her eyes wide in astonishment at this new revelation.

"Why of course there are," she said. "There must be lots and lots. But princesses are you and your sisters always happy before this happened for all you go through because of the war and the enemy--don't you wish you could do things and feel things because you can't?"

Violet's face was more listless than ever as she answered:

"I can't help wishing for things sometimes, but out side of that we have always been happy. Expelled from the enemy, like spying on them, getting for that, captured and escaped, it in was not anything to make us unhappy. But at the excitement and we liked that. We used to be happy even when we together in the enemy lines for weeks, for we could find information and help. Oh, you know, we were happy in without our captives knowing it, and now since we've known you we would be happy still, if it had not been for our loss, we couldn't help feeling a little better. You know, when you've been so awfully friendly kind to us. Penrod likes you now very much, and says you're a good little girl and not spoiled as some people said."

"What are your principal wishes?" asked Mary inquired with natural curiosity.

"Well," said Daisy herself, "I do wish sometimes that the whole world was as good as Abbiannia, and we only wish now that Jennie and Angelina were not dead, oh it's terrible and we'd like to hear her and Angelina sing like they used to before they first got lost and then died. You don't know how pretty they were when they were dressed for a party, and I heard a gentleman once tell papa once that all of us were little Bubbles of Heaven. That was just before they went away to save little Nell from the spies."

"But don't you wish we wish for things for you-self too?" Rosemary asked.

"Oh yes very often, we wish that we were even now more good than we are and, can't help thinking how lovely it would be if we could live back in our country home, that our blessed God would come down and live with us forever and never leave us and we could play and sing to Him on the piano." Rosemary looked surprised, and something strange touched her heart. She asked no more questions, but it was not the first time that the vague words of these good little girls had made her vaguely uncomfortable. It was not very pleasant to remember how often she had selfish wished for things over foolish things, and was cross, wilful and discontented because she could not have them, and yet she had so much more to make her life bright and happy than poor Violet and her sisters. The thought of their distress and what caused it made her feel at large and blue all the rest of the way home, and when finally they parted for the evening, Rosemary said she wished to lie down and rest herself for a while, but when she knew she was alone in her room and nobody saw or heard she wept for a long time, sadly and spitefully. Then she put her self on her knees and started a once good and sensible prayer.

"Oh Dearest God," she said after crossing her self and making the sign of the Cross, "I am a foolish selfish little girl, and don't appreciate all the good things I get. I even complained and fretted when I am blessed so much and thanked and lighted ad so much because they wouldn't let me go out side and play, and all the bad things I did that you know of. They are princesses Dearest God, but they have not the good times I have had. Oh if it is really true that you forgive me my sins which I know is a fact, please show it by doing them a good turn for all the love they have shown you by making papa succeed in finding out that their little sisters are not dead. Don't let this affliction stay on them any longer. Dearest God, and if they are not please find some means to get them to find their way back home. Oh God, remember please what the enemy do to them, they do to you, and don't want to seem to say anything wrong Dearest God but what you allow this enemy to do to them you allow to do to you. I don't care if you punish me good for my wrong doings Dearest God, but please, please do good for them. The bible says all you have suffered Dearest God and that you were only an innocent lamb on the Sacrificial Altar, but they don't deserve all this cruel things either, it is, and all the other sinners who ought to suffer and not them. Oh God, please please please, to turn their sisters safely to them and cheat your enemies the Glandelinians. Please do and I'll always be a good girl and I'll be a turn your favor by trying to be a girl scout. Oh Dearest God you know how awfully awfully good they are. They love you you more than anything. The world we're living in is nothing to them as long as they have you. Please do me the favor and turn their sisters to them. Amen."

"Yes Rosemary!"

"Yes Gloria."

"Do you think it's necessary for you to think of such a thing as trying to join the girl scout out of the Vivianites. You are not old enough."

"It isn't my fault, and they have younger children than me as scout leaders."

"Seems to me, wouldn't attempt it then till you are a year older. I don't think you-papa would be very much pleased if you joined. Girl scout's fight in this country, and not do just more duties in as in other countries."

Rosemary gave an impatient sigh and sent the hammock she was swinging in high up into the air again.

"Let the dirty Glandelinians leave Christian children alone then," she said. "They have no right to make the Vivian Princesses suffer all these worse."

"I suppose any poor little girl who is so worried by these people as you are to talk. You would have to be brave, know how to ride a horse and fast too. Know how to fence with a sabre, use the lance and know how to shoot with a rifle and pistol. It also takes a lot of good papa for a woman to be a princess. You have to be one citizen to get in, and unless you friends the Vivian Girl Princesses help you you will not succeed, and even then you won't if your father objects. I told you I would take you to a recruiting office and get you in a standing girl scout if you wanted to go."

"I don't want to go there. It's nothing to do but just guard tents, police the camp at night and make up the beds of the soldiers of the tent you are guarding. You'ding and it's no fun."

"I'm not sure I'm anxious to do even that I only suggested it because I thought it might amuse you."

"The way was a surprise." Rosemary swung herself back and forth in the hammock. Gloria went steadily on with her work. Then Rosemary asked a question.

"Gloria how many days is it since the princesses lost their two sisters who are now dead?"

"It'll be two weeks on Monday, and four days Sunday."

"That'll be more than ten days isn't it?" asked Dr. B. Oxen: "Tell papa that it was the saddest case he had ever seen, little girls who don't deserve this to have to suffer so."

"No it's more than two weeks it is nearly three. They were missing on May the 21st, and it was May the 18th when they went to Angelina's garden with the little girl Nell. Once we feared Glandelinians were looking for you, believing that you had something to do with it. I know something of it. You ought to be very thankful that it wasn't so and that though boy and girl scouts you were secretly protected."

"I'm not," said Rosemary a little defiantly. "I should like to have been guilty of helping them, and I wish I had done it. I defy these Glandelinians to do anything to me. They all ought to be thankful that they ain't in hell every one of them the nasty stuck up old prigs."

"I guess Rosemary." Gloria actually put down the stocking she was doing in her room and disappeared with a disappointed look.

"I do wish I had." Rosemary went on rather pleased than otherwise by the sight of Gloria's shocked face. "I think it would be very interesting to be their helper and have every one say I'm a little heroine."

"You don't know that you are talking about," said Gloria as she picked up her stocking again. "The Glandelinians wicked as they are are very fierce and not to be trifled with. They're dangerous and cruel and very clever. All you better not even so much as let it be known about that you even attacked one of them. The soldiers at large would take speedy revenge out of you if they could get you. Future told me you had to be watched more closely since your association with the princesses, and since you attacked that Glandelinian in the face with that whip. He'll get avenge the first opportunity he has if he can get a chance."

"Oh when Gloria spoke in that tone it invariably caused all that was most disagreeable in Rosemary's nature. She was really very, very unhappy about the association of Violet and her sisters and their brother, even the loss of the two little girls who she knew were missing, if not really dead, far more unhappy than any one lost of all, Gloria suspected. It was this very unhappiness which had made her so quiet and listless all that evening after Violet and her sisters had been taken home, but Gloria had suspected something, for she knew that Rosemary was unfortunately for herself one of these proud very sensitive children who find it almost an impossibility to express their deepest feelings."

"I don't care," she began, after a moment's pause and she gave the hammock a rather vicious push as she spoke. "I do wish I had done it, had been the cause of their making little Nell out of the clutches of these men worse than the meanest devils. Then if I did I would not only be very important and have people look upon me as a heroine but I would have cheated the foul enemy of his prey."

"And how about the danger of shooting in the trouble and trials of the good little princesses, and the price of being tortured, persecuted and hunted down like a bad dog?" Gloria inquired dryly. "I suppose that would be very pleasant too."

Rosemary thought of what she had heard happened to many children who were and have been, and other disagreeable things, and she hesitated only for a moment—but it was only for a moment.

"I don't believe, should mind" she said. "Not if every body else has to suffer and especially these little Princesses who don't deserve it. I should love to make up, and see people standing round my bed, looking good and happy with a newspaper in one of them saying that the two sisters of the princesses are found and safe. I know the way they do it. I've read about it in books. Papa would bend over me, and ask me if I felt a little better over the good news, and I would ask him please to send some one and tell the princesses that I am oh so glad, and will thank Our blessed Mother and Her Son;";

"Miss Rosemary I used to think you were without exception the most heartless self-willed child I've ever seen in my life" exclaimed Gloria surprised beyond measure by this last speech of her charge. "Something sure good has changed you, and if you really mean it it is sure God will answer that prayer I overheard you cry out this late afternoon in your room."

"I couldn't help it, said Rosemary tearfully coming to her eyes. "It is said we should forgive evil people even if they are not sorry for their wicked deeds, but why should we. They ain't worth it, at least these Glandelinians are not, and yet we must what they have suffered the princesses yet forgive every thing even their wicked treacherous brother, and have always offered a perpetual Novena for his Conversion, you ought to see those little princesses because their two sisters are reported dead. It is too pitiful to see them, they are so hard broken and distressed, they can't take an interest in anything, even in all the good times I've given them, and every night and morning, besides the Novena and the Masses and Holy Communion they say many prayers of their own accord asking God to make their two little sisters come back again, and show that they had not perished in the forest fire."

Gloria had stopped to think about it and said:

"Yes, I believe that but I've been watching you when you were with them even in all the good times to day, and though you did your best to make them happy you yourself did not take very much interest in things either even during the days you have come to know them. How those wicked Glandelinians!"

"I hate to hear about the Glandelinians," remarked Rosemary, giving the hammock a fresh push. "They are the worst soldiers in the world, the most cruel and wicked, and they know what they are doing too but don't care. Papa said so. I told him what you said about them and then I asked him if he didn't think that they were a worst than the wickedest devils he laughed and said that I don't know half about them, so the..."

"Your papa was right. That is why I'm nervous when you wish to become a girl scout. These Glandelinians are too dangerous to be trifled with."

Before Rosemary could make any reply, Gloria made any more remark as the screen door was slowly pushed open, and the cook came out on the beautiful piazza. She looked unusually grave and solemn and it appeared as if there had been trouble in her eyes.

George Thomas our butler has just come back from General Hildebrand's headquarters. "She said in a husky voice. "Mr. Dawson said he was to go over at seven o'clock to inquire about the two lost princesses and the condition of their remaining sisters and brother. They say that some evidences have been traced by identification marks, and that the two little girls have really and truly perished. They are in wild straits over there and their brother won't let any one except their guardian see them now until the spell of wild grief is over."

There was an exclamation from Gloria, and her eyes became filled with tears. It was quite true as Rosemary said Gloria had become more fond of Violet and her sisters than she was of most people. Rosemary did not say anything, but she seemed to feel sick all of a sudden. After all they were dead, their two sisters had not been spared to them--that did it mean did they really find identification marks that proved they were really the dead princesses beyond beyond recognition, he had never dreamed for one moment that the two little girls being angel possessed could really perish. The cook lingered for a moment, and she and Gloria talked in low tones about the sad event that had always taken place and which from the hearts of all the people would and truly will set a whole nation to mourning. Rosemary did not seem to pay any attention to what they said she was already too busy fighting down the big lump in her throat and the heartache in her breast and winking to keep back the tears she did not want either of them to see. At last the cook went back into the house, and Gloria began gathering up her work.

"I'm going in," she said in a rather choked voice. "I haven't the heart to stay out here any longer."

"I'm coming in too," said Gloria. Rosemary closing the screen door after her with a sigh and going to her room quickly where she could be alone.

I shall rather comfort to be alone, and for that the sea was one to see her poor Rosemary cried bitterly for a long time, and refused to come down to supper even when the cook called her.

"I'm sick," she sobbed. "I can't eat and run."

It was a long time before she dried her tears but she felt foolish and miserable. She remembered once that her first Maid which was a crosser one than Gloria had ever been had said "of course angel possessed children die, and can be killed too. The angels can make them die if they wish to take them to heaven. She even said she didn't believe good children ever were possessed by angels, as no saint had ever been possessed by them. Therefore for a moment she lost hope, and then she recollected one thing she had read in a book. To be possessed by angels by the grandest thing that can happen to children. Good people to did be possessed by angels, but only when they were as good as the children were, or had lived an unusually holy life for a long, long time, and God knew for sure they would be holier and holier as long as they lived. Violet and her sisters were said to be very angel possessed, but then she had read of children in books who were angel possessed, and they always escaped the worst dangers in the end. It was very interesting to be angel possessed, but she wondered how if the Vivian Girls were really angel possessed they could be so persecuted and ill treated by the treacherous Glandelinians and the Glandelinians get away with it. Yes she did wish she could be a girl scout; she thought then she could show the enemy a thing or two. Oh it would be nice, to see Violet and her sisters happy once more, and to things that would make the wicked Glandelinians more afraid of boy and girl scouts than ever before. How very hateful all Glandelinians were to her now--they were always causing so many needless Christian children to suffer so terribly, just because the Glandelinians wanted to defy the good and loving God who made all the human races. He didn't blame Gloria for being frightened about the poor Vivian girls, and to speak so with a catch in her voice, as she did when she mentioned the good Vivian Girls. Oh don't why couldn't she be a girl scout, just to find out that girl scouts are to the enemy and do to the foe. But papa was afraid to let her be one, but even papa didn't understand her. There were other ways of frightening Glandelinians besides being a girl scout. Causing a sudden disaster for instance. But she knew the nature of the Glandelinians and had heard once from Gloria of a great number of little girls and boys who had been captured by these wicked and fierce Glandelinians. It was a very dreadful story, that massacre, for the Glandelinians stole all their clothes, put their bodies and hung them to the branches of trees for exhibition to all other Christians to defy them. Only one of those poor children and a little girl too had managed to escape because of a storm. And the little girl had got lost in a woods, and had a terrible time for days facing death, frost and starvation and fire, until Rangers rescued her--she died then alive in a cage, and half her hair burned off of her head, and so dirty and bleeding from wounds that her father and mother scarcely recognized her. The child then was ill for months before she got better and was not a girl scout in the Christian army to get even with the enemy.

What the Glandelinians had done and cruised to come upon her Rosemary had heard private doubts as to the truth of this story, but Gloria herself declared it to be true. Rosemary didn't think she would enjoy such an experience, but it would be just fun to be a fierce fighting girl scout and have a chance to lead a column of the scouts upon a patrol of the enemy and give the Glandelinians a good fright. She heard how Glandelinians were afraid of the Christian child scouts who fought fire only like little angels. Of course she wouldn't go unless papa let her--for the recruiting stations wouldn't take no children as scouts first without the parents' consent, and if she was one and did something to the wicked enemy and was captured and punished--well what did it matter. Nothing seemed to matter to her just now when her heart was aching so. If all boy and girl scout girl scouts were so fierce and "heartless" to the enemy, why the too might as well go when her father would let her and be heartless and have some fun at the terror of the enemy. For what they do to so many good children the Glandelinians should be taught a lesson and be brought to repentance before it was too late. The Glandelinians should be made to find out they couldn't do all these things, and be so dreadful and heartless and Christian children and not expect the Christians and their children to retaliate. She remained in her room without even coming down to supper brooding and waiting for all. Nobody came to call her. Gloria herself was indulging in a good hearty cry up in the nursery, and Lizzy and all the other servants were all in the kitchen at the back of the house, some also crying and others feeling blue and heart sick.

Another morning dawned. It was dark, and cloudy and thought it had

It had stopped now. Violet alone had got up from the bed she had slept all night and her sisters neither, but they had still a main idea in their minds. It was very early. Violet was sitting at her small little desk having tried to write a letter to her two faithful brothers, and another to her sister and one but had stopped in the middle of the last to bury her pretty head in her arms and weep silently to herself.

Penrod almost like a silent statue was standing behind her chair looking as miserable as a boy would who had for being bad lost heaven and was in the infernal regions.

"Oh my poor darling sisters, lost---dead---lost to us forever and we'll never see them again." she sobbed.

"There's Violet dead" said Penrod in a husky voice. "Despite all that horrible news I can't make my mind believe they are really gone forever. They probably even didn't get caught in the path of the fire and may have only got captured by the Glandelinians. I'll bet we'll be getting news any time now. I'm sure Jennie and Argeline can take care of themselves, and they're angels possessed, don't forget that. They are real little angels."

The door suddenly came a loud knock on the door.

Penrod went to open it.

General Hindenrines housekeeper was at the door. "Special Delivery letter from An Evangelina St. Claire to Prince Penrod sir," she said bowing. "It is positively personal for you and your sisters only."

Penrod opened the letter and closing the door he stopped before the window.

"Why it's from Wenthworth James Dawson Gemini Branch No. 10, to, Evangelina St. Claire" he exclaimed in some surprise. "Perhaps I owe many a letter had written to thank you for having been so good to Miss Rosemary--how very nice of her isn't it?"

Violet made no answer. At the words "Wenthworth James Dawson, Gemini Branch No. 10, two, he little heart gave one great bound, and then almost seemed to stand still. Penrod slowly and carefully tore open the letter, and the first line, then uttered a low astonished frightened cry, and sank down into a chair, trembling from head to foot. Violet's sisters had sat up suddenly in bed, while Joice herself was covering a little cried out;

"Penrod, Penrod, what does it say?"

"It's about the unidentified bodies, why sisters I never asked the Gemini to investigate anything on that matter, how can it be?"

"Oh please read it Penrod please do, oh please," begged Violet and it seemed to Penrod as if she was beyond herself with impatience. Penrod with an effort covered his self possession as best as he could, took up the letter again and read in a shaking voice;

"Dear Prince Penrod,

In reference to the stories you sent us through the newspaper and the photos of Jennie and Argeline which you have also forwarded to us, some day or two ago we would say that we have intercepted the bodies on its way to Pandora and gave them considerable examination, and forwarded them to your aunt Mary. We have received the post cards and your two sisters brought no trinkets with them, when they left, except except their rosaries and the Miraculous Medals which they wore besides their camera trinkets and pistols, and fighting knives. The trinkets send to her he did not belong to any of the little girls whom you said are dead. We have questioned the rangers who found the bodies, and they declared, they found no evidence of pistols, camera trinkets or any kind, nor any fighting knives, not even in any half melted condition. By some large lake which formed from a river near the western branch of the forest fire, a fire it is evident that some two children of some kind had crossed the lake, and got into the safe portion of the woods on the other side. Some rangers said their trail shows they must have escaped to some where but whether they are any evidence of your two sisters it is hard to say as no clues are possible to prove it. But positively those dead children are not your sisters. We are so favorably impressed by the discovery, that we should be glad to hear from you further on this sad subject so they can be buried and saved. We should be pleased to make some further satisfaction to your arrangement with you in regard of finding out whether those two children who really can be proved to have escaped the fire are your sisters. Waiting your reply we remain

Yours very truly;

"Wenthworth Dawson Gemini Branch No. 10."

"Penrod" said Violet looking at him on no pleading, "I'm afraid you are just reading it that way to try to cheer us up that way. You'd do anything to prevent a tear in our eyes I know you."

"All right," said Penrod. "Here's the letter see for yourself then."

It was exactly as Penrod had read to them, but that however did not give them very much hope for the future that didn't say that their sisters were found. There was only the faintest hope created and that was that their two sisters were not dead after all. But to add to their sorrow they had been apprehensive as to the outcome. Rumors had occurred that the enemy had pressed on in the victory and that depressionville was now in the hands of the enemy and those of its people who could escape had fled to Pandora. This was already the fifteenth day since Violet, and her sisters had lost their two sisters Jennie and Argeline. Depressionville city only ten miles south east of mighty Pandora, Depressionville the beautiful, one of the best portions of that part of holy Calvernia, had fallen before the Glandelinian armies.

The Christian armies who couldn't withstand the enemy had made an exodus to Imperia. The city torn by bombs, wrecked by great shells, thousands of buildings on fire, and devastated by hundreds of Glandelinian forces, she lay in smoking ruins. Her good people sad and despairing seemed for the greater part to have vanished in the two days since the fatal evening of June when at last the city was taken, and the mighty Glandelinian armies were extending their fierce attacks toward Pandora. Many of the wealthy citizens had fled to Pandora taken refuge there within portions of the Christian camps of the great army leaving the magnificent palaces and residences situated in the new part to the flood of victorious Glandelinian soldiers who went with unerring merciless determination to parcels containing the greatest comforts and luxury.

Depressionville, from which vicinity Violet, and her sisters had fled from with the aid of James is built in the midst of a beautiful Calvernian plain mostly on the banks of the river, on the main part of the city lay close to the river and the streets are all of them so immensely wide, that even a small street the width of any alley could have two streets running through. All Abbeonian cities have such wide streets. The beautiful scenery of the streets are impossible to be pictured. They only can be photographed.

The houses of course are very large and beautiful, and though the country is Abbeonian, all buildings are built the American style except that the houses are houses of any kind found that doesn't have high slating roofs slanting roofs to ward off too much snow in winter. The worst elements of Glandelinian souls were now within the city. In these streets the devastation was very great, and the people had scrambled like rats to cover. A week before hoping of Christian victories they had swarmed the streets and had crowded the buildings, a street car had run a carriage had been seen going back and forth and all the lively scenes of city life had been witnessed. Now by some strange miracle they had gone, utterly disappeared. All the houses still standing were deserted, the streets empty. The destruction had been greatest in the southern part of the city but many of the beautiful public buildings and state and city departments in the new part were also in ruins, so many fires were burning that it looked like an immense Chicago fire would look like in 1902 if it had occurred then, and even matchless palaces were also wrecked. The people from the upper part of the city who had taken refuge in the holes along the wide river front were for the most part a sad appearing lot. Some of them carried great bundles which they guarded with jealous care as they were fleeing now to Pandora. Others empty handed sat through the hot summer nights and thousands of frightened little children clung to their mothers hands, or wandered about weeping and screaming from group to group seeking their own people. There was a general gathering of types. Mobs mixed with laborers all mingling in their common sorrow, for the most part in dumbness, a strange silence now prevailed. The shock of this national disaster had befit the people of their power of expression. Since January, day in and day out up to now Depressionville and all its territory had been torn and racked by the largest and one of the fiercest and most stubbornly contested battle of the war, little by little the enemy had pressed upon the slowly shrinking Christian armies the ground wet with the blood of the countless hundreds fallen in death on both sides, little by little she had lost her cherished land until the day of doom came June 7th 1914.

The people who still dared to remain in the city, sitting, hiding in the desolated city, knew that unless the Christian armies could hold Pandora and then make counter advances, Depressionville would be a city no longer on the spot map. There was even no longer now any Depressionville.

For the court my all around it was swallowed up, all Glandelinian crime.

To larger on the map; map of the world had she any place, but in the hearts of the people of Depressionville and all hearts it still lives. For with the most perfect loyalty and love in the world "They say" "We are a part of God's holy Country Calve-India. We live and die for Him and Him alone." As a haze from burning buildings hung over us as far as Pandora. The street of Depressionville after the war of great guns, the bursting of high explosive shells and the noise of hundreds of thousands of people rushing blindly to safety, seemed silent and deserted. Many even fleeing to Pandora for fear of their children being massacred. The hated enemy help the town and now the people of Depressionville most hapless city in all Calve-India covered beneath the iron hand of the enemy. As is usual in the fearful lull after such a bloody victory, the town was filled with confusions, dangers of the most horrible sort and cataclysmic things. Murder by Glandelinians, kidnapping by them, crime of every kind lawless in every guise, danger of massacre of children by the whole mob. Whole sales, the sack of all good buildings, sacrileges, and the ruining of all the good Churches, and all dreadful insults to the Blessed Sacrament overimagined stalked through the streets or lurked down the alleys. The unfortunate citizens who had not been treated in time hid where they could in all sorts of places. They gathered in the melting trembling, whispering groups, into garrets and cellars, even the vaults of the catacombs. The old burial places of the dead were opened by desperate fugitives, and became hiding places for the living. The Glandelinian soldiers were in possession of all the uninjured residences in the more modern part of the city, where they revelled in the comforts of modern baths, lights and heat and feasted on all the good things to eat. They stole every thing of value for their own use. But the lower part of the city lying along the banks of the Mo-ma River was filled with a strange mixture of terrified people. In all things huddled in streets and alleys, in houses and warehouses. The houses there were perhaps no stronger group than the ones gathered in the dark corners of great big buildings where the machinery of some sort had been manufactured.

This had at last enough escaped destruction and stood unharmed in a street where every thing bore the statue statue scars of shells from bombs and high explosives and the men of fire. The engines were stopped, the great wheels motionless, the broad belts empty. Even the machinery seemed to feel the terrible blow and mourned the fallen city. The scores of persons huddled in the shadows of a vast wheel gave little heed to that strange surroundings. They seemed crushed by a frightful frightful grief more personal even than the taking of Depressionville would be in the most loyal heart.

These people had lost their all, friends, homes, children and all other belongings. "When war waged its widest desolation" was and is a correct word saying.

Penrod who stood with his mourning sisters had had his heart of this. No day he was dressed in a uniform as of being the richest boy in the world. Two rings set with great jewels flashed on his hand as he spoke. He tapped his polished boots with a small cane in the end of which was set a huge, sparkling red stone, a recent Christmas gift of his lost sister Jennie. He was angry he spoke with great rapidity in the pure Abbeonian of the Court, and addressed himself to an elderly Glandelinian soldier who had just been brought in, while his sisters looked the mere appearance of hopeless sorrow and yet angry too. Near him sat what appeared to be a plainly dressed woman who buried her stained face in her apron for she too was arrested. Violet at the news she had heard had swept the head sets of those who can scarcely weep no more. The little Daisy clung to her, silent but with her beautiful wide dark blue eyes wild with terror and loss. On the floor had been brought in a wounded Christian soldier bearing in perfect silence the frightful pain of a shattered sold should...

A NEW TOPIC OF THE DISAPPEARANCE.

JENNIE AND ANGELINE IN THE ENEMY'S HANDS.
BUT THE BIRBY AND HUMANE AND FREE THEM.

NEW GUNS OVER THE RIVER.

HIS only bandage was a piece of cloth wound tightly around his coat but not a groan escaped his pale lips. At the window, gazing down into the street with a gloomy face stood James Anderson. His face was bloodless, his strong mouth was set in a straight line; the hand resting on the window sill was clenched until the knuckle knuckles shone white through the tanned skin. Desperate anger, horror and grief struggled equally in his face. His left arm encircled a boy nearly his own size. That was Timmie like Vivian. His sobs brokenly, and James patted him as he listened to the rapid words of Penrod who was talking.

Suddenly the elderly prisoner spoke.

"You must pardon me Prince Penrod," he said in a trembling voice. "I do not comprehend. I did not lead the attack on that train even though, was one of the persons of your two sisters. Will you kindly repeat your account."

A flash of black dangerous anger passed over the face of the young prince; then he spoke cautiously.

"Certainly Professor it was thus. Whether you did or not lead them, your followers led an attack upon that refugee train. You remember don't you that my two sisters there were with my Aunt fled into the Mc-Hollister woods and were pursued by you and your followers. You tell me you are the only survivor of those persons as they perished in the forest fire. Then you understand all up to this morning, since the anger as to my surprise brought you and your wife in, strange she too was in the attack on the train and a woman, you know there fore that my remaining sisters--" indicating them with his hand has been broken down with grief until they are almost ill. You know and so does your wife that we had watched for nights and days with hardly any sleep, and knowing spies percolated my sisters we had also changed our headquarters because we had decided it was too unsafe to be in the direct path of those brutal spies. So we prepared to come here to one of my father's stationary headquarters, where they could be safe. He it sure is strange" he added with a grin, I had to go out for a moment to speak to a priest and when I returned what did I find in the room where I had left every thing belonging to my sister Jennie and also Angelina. The room was empty. It was you who had raided that room for you were caught with the goods on you. I'm furious at you for stealing my most precious things on me. I am a prince, Prince Penrod, and you Glandelinians can't trifle with me. As I came back I had drawn back hastily for this horrible old woman also captured squatted on my front steps. She was clutching over a large sack full of those valuables stolen from my room and others. As I looked two men came up. Glandelinians in disguise they must have been forth with they ran away when they saw me. I had the woman arrested for being where she had not ought to be and examining the sack found the stolen articles and the woman is a man in disguise. I heard foot steps behind me and the way you were coming down the stairs. You had that package in your hands which we took from you. You know something about my sister Jennie and Angelina and don't tell. Well you'll be right at the stake. When you came down you pretended that one of my sisters had given you a book on the history of Pandora, and you had readily stolen it. You said they told you to be very careful of it, but they never saw you. Now give me any book you've got to go some to even try and put something over on me. I'm too watchful. Where are my two sisters?"

"Ain't sobs Violet" He stole the picture of Jennie and Angelina in a pose of holding hands. How could they have perished in the forest fire as in the woods."

Catharine looked up.

"Oh it can't be true they could not have perished" she said "They could easily have escaped I'm sure of it. We have often done so. The Glandelinians have killed them I'm sure of it." He bowed his head with fresh sobs.

"But the prisoner said that your two sisters perished in the flames." said James. "Himself." "So there could not have been any more soldiers in the woods; no one at all save the two little girls who are believed to be strange and perished and the princesses, and surely they are a lost in that labyrinth of woods. They certainly did not perish in the forest fire," "Of course not," said General Hindenburgh frowning. "I've heard about those dense forests. If they are lost never to return then I'm surprised at them for I've heard angel possessed children couldn't be lost anywhere for the angels would guide them. I heard too they know the in and out of a good portion of the woods. Angelina is nine years of age and Jennie also. This is a terrible thing to be lost in those woods, where they could be in danger of fire perils and starvation too but they must be found. I will be posted at once to the head of the Rangers at Evangeline St. Clair. I am convinced they are safe. If they do get out of the forest surely some will take them in just as we took in so many strange refugee children. Join you told me you and your sisters were often lost, and yet you know these are war times. War times. Good people are glad to return lost children and as they can't hardly take care of their own these days. I will hide all most important documents belonging to your sisters in the underground room. I told you of, then we will go to the proper authorities and have the two little girls found."

"Eh!" said the soldier with the shattered shoulder suddenly. "Go where thou wilt these days, there is no authority that can get any one out of those labyrinthian woods. Once lost in those woods you'll never get out. Will that help these. These Glandelinians are responsible. Don't go away with them."

"We must find them," said Jack Evans brokenly. The seriousness of the affair was beginning to dawn on them. "It will certainly be simple. We will advertise a big reward for their rescue."

Angelina Aronburg standing at his side smiled scornfully.

"Advartize?" she said. "Why Evans there are no papers left in Pandora here to advartize in."

"Prince," said the boy at the window. "Did you hear that the three people at the door were talking about?"

"Yes."

"What did they say? The people you said looked like spies."

"Yes they talked," said Penrod gloomily. "But it did not seem to mean much. I didn't get much from it any way."

"Try to think what they said," said Tim. He passed a hand carefully across the bright falliness of his hair where a dark red streak stained it. Can't you remember anything they said?"

"Penrod stood thinking, the jeweled cane still tapping his foot. "Yes he," he said when the man came up they said to another woman. 'What's the news about the Mic-Hollister woods?' The woman laughed evilly, and said; 'The two Princesses are lost there and they'll never get out. The forest is full of pit falls, and bogs and treacherous dangerous animals and no means to get food or drink if they venture in too far.' Then the man who had spoken said 'A good thing' and rubbed his hands. 'That is indeed a good thing. If they never come back it'll be good news for Glandelinia to hear. But I'm afraid they'll get through for numbers is they're angel possessed.' Then the woman said, 'Don't be so foolish. Then they'll run and hurried on. Penrod paused. 'That was all they said.' He added sadly. 'It doesn't help does it.' Violet's sisters looked horrified. Violet leaned forward. 'Say it again Penrod,' she said excitedly. 'Say just what they said.'

Penrod repeated the words, and she whispered them after him. Then a wild agonized terrified cry broke from her lips. She turned to Jack Evans, seized his arm and shook him. So great was her emotion that she could not say the words she wanted.

"Evans, Evans don't you see it now?" she cried. "Oh, Oh Evans, Oh what shall we do! Oh my darling little sisters Jennie and Angelina. She gasped and Penrod ran forward and seized her hands.

"Conjure you wail Violet," he cried desperately. "I never saw you act like this. Tell me what it is."

She looked at him quite speechless. The agony of all that she and her sisters had witnessed, the sorrow of her loss, the terror of the past weeks, the fright and sorrow of losing her two precious little sisters, the danger her father was in because of the violent assault upon his own armies now, all combined to send her into a state scarcely better than insanity. With a desperate effort to control herself, she looked pleadingly into her brother's eyes.

"You see don't you Penrod dear?" she said. "You see don't you? I can't seem to be able to say it. Say you see it too Penrod dear."

Then as if she had found some way of giving him the meaning of doom she dropped against her brother's atony shoulder and fainted quietly away while her sisters were sobbing now. Penrod laid her down, and the housekeeper rushed to her while Rose Mary and Alois who were there too looked on in a scared.

"My God is she dead from shock?" asked Penrod his face as white as a sheet.

"Certainly not. Thanks be to God," said the good woman, "he has just fainted. I did not dare to tell you!" cried Tim. "Was it something I said?" "No it was something I told her," said Penrod, and she to my own knowledge read it right. I know she's faint," and he looked blackly at the two policemen.

"Well, well what is it?" demanded Evans. "This is fearfully upsetting, fearfully upsetting."

Penrod bent tenderly over his sister now lying on the bed. He was regaining consciousness.

"It's as bad as it can be," he said hesitatingly. "The remarks about the Mic-Hollister woods and with it contains the whole thing. Jennie and Angelina are lost in the most dangerous recesses of the dreadful woods, and may surely never get out again. Oh it is dreadful."

A deep silence followed. The housekeeper covered her eyes, even Rose Mary and Alois were sobbing. The wounded soldier himself slowly shaking his head. Evans, Jim, James and General Hindenburgh stood with bulging eyes staring at Penrod, his sister was again aild with grief, while the boys and Evans tried to make themselves understand his speech. Jim who knew more of the ways of the "icked people of the Glandelinians nodded his head understandingly. Evans rumbled his hair though deeply and said;

"You in the world could child who are angel possessed be lost in those woods for ever?" he asked sarcastically and if so what did the Glandelinians do with them into it? That sort of thing; surely is not done now days."

"Of in the best families," said Penrod coldly. "But it is done I'll bet. I know the Glandelinians better than you do Evans being such a spy a long long time among the Glandelinians. They can and will do anything wicked."

"Oh yes it's done all the time," added James. "I know my father asked asked a lot about it since the commencement of the war and the Glandelinians murdered my youngest sister and a girl friend along with my little brother a Bepher civilian was going to stamp out a lot of that sort of thing especially but affected women and children. Yes it's done General Evans."

"Not now," said Evans stubbornly. "There was a record a case and so on during the early part of the war, but later there were no records at all bearing on the subject. And if no records, surely there are no instances requiring the attention of a law all thinking people."

"It would be most natural to record any instance of the sort, however small and trifling. In my experience I would have run across the facts. There is no mention of it whatever."

"I know it happens any how," said Penrod sticking to his point. "The Glandelinians can prevent the records being made."

"Prince, you forget that I am in a position to know," said Jack Evans. "My recent discovery thanks to the presentations of your Father's two brothers and your Uncle, the Gamini, and many others into secret and secret records were before we opened to our side of my records, angel possessed children cannot perish and you'll soon see there'll be a proof of it. You'll see your sister again soon. I'll warrant. I'll get the stand you take with me. I am unused to contradiction, but you know has made you fail to comprehend. I'll bet if I wickedly tried to kill one of your sisters in this room especially when she would be alone and no one to defend her, and not she would be found dead in this very room. Angels will protect children in any condition if they have to work miracles to do so."

"Pardon me," said Penrod weakly. "But those Mic-Hollister woods are impossible to get out of once you are lost. If they come out safe and sound before this month of June is out I'll have you decorated with a special medal as the smartest general in my ranks and make you my chief counsellor and advise which will elevate you higher than you are now." He looked at Tim in the minds of both boys there was a feeling that the mysterious mystery was solved. There was no longer any need to discuss it.

"Well I believe Penrod is right," said Tim himself doggedly. "It doesn't matter what you have found in your searches about angel possessed children Evans, you have had those day old records to prove every thing to do. I have heard the people tell stories, and have read in the news papers that the Vivian girls even if they are angel possessed have gone through and and and and and and and that would make you hair curl, and you had some of those experiences with them yourself and you know it. The Glandelinians not only steal and kidnap children, but sometimes they cripple them something terrible has been done by Glandelinians to Angelina and Jennie, for it is this reverse on that sister's here and no doubt on you too Penrod, and your father, but they are gone, they are gone, in those dreadful Mic-Hollister woods, you can't get out with a load of bills and stick it under the park fence and go back and find your child on the front stoop like you can at home."

suffering badly for these mistakes. This is the worst of all. Perhaps even so, matter that you may not do, we shall surely never see our two best sisters again, and we are the ones who promised Mother that we ourselves would always look out for you since you came back, and let you know your self is unnecessary danger, for we are responsible as much for you as you are for yourself. It is true it is our fault that she is lost, but the fault is not at fault, and this is the worst of all rests on us, for we didn't think at the time and let them go, and we are ourselves paying for our own and mistakes. And my dear sisters, and father too should have known better to have even left them go to Angelina Agathia but we mean to see that you are safe here, and not let you go into those dreadful woods, impossible to get out of, and even impossible to get into at many places the trees are so close together. I know you Pen and dear, you mean to do the right thing by us always, but I am your sister's father too certainly don't know what would happen if we little girls did not look out for you as well as you look out for us. You better remember, and knowing so many ways of how to protect us, had put an obstacle in the way, you are more dangerous to the enemy now than Evans or many of the child scouts put together, and the enemy could do any thing to get you out of the way so the Glandelinians could get at us. Her voice trembled. "I know this does not sound like proper talk from a good loving sister to her beloved brother, but I've got to say it for once. Father has told us, the little girls in his eyes have been made superior to you, but we have will use our authority against you unless we have to through good common sense. If you go without our consent to those woods or attempt to well tell father so the next time. He can prevent you. We can't bear to lose our sisters, it is too much for us as it is, but to lose you, well, rather than die first. Go into the enemy lines to look for them, and stay as long as you like all right, but don't you dare go to those Mic-pullester woods. You'll kill us if you do. And now she was beginning to cry. "We had promised father that we'll never let you out of our sight again, but I'm going to get it out of my system this time. Ever since, I can remember Pen and dear we have been as much looking out for you, as you have been for us. We have had to take care of you and help you even remember you meal times when you were too busy for our sakes, and you talked and you that over eat and loves and mischief. We have had to see that you went to bed and ate and got up and every thing else which you always forgot because of your love for us, and all because of your love for us. We wish then to see you prove your love for us by not going away. I know it makes you bite us full of the Mic-pullester have done to us. You never mention much about it but you have never never been yourself since that dirty low down trick was played on poor Jennie by Fredrick, Oxden, and if it was justified you'd have even not killed him like a snake. I can see that in your face. Oh how you hate him! I can see that. I ought to hate the Glandelinians and so should my sister but I can't because of pleasure, and doesn't hate them as bad as they are, though an angel did appear to us and granted us a promise not to forgive our Father's brother's Gemline if he do not so with us, but we pray for him every day. I know you have heard all of our troubles which because of the enemy have been the cause of our innocent lives. We have been debauched, at dipped often naked before the eyes of wicked immodest soldiers because we couldn't help ourselves, and yet we find no hatred, only a sacred duty to our country and God, but we know the enemy Pen and dear more than you do even despite your experience as Adelaide. And we know the trenches and the forests of the Mic-pullester, other-wise we would not have such hopeless grief for our two sisters which we even now still believe are dead, even despite the faint hope created by their letters. Those bodies are coming and I believe they are my sisters. I tell you brother dear every thing has been just as bad as any other bad habit of illness to us. We know you love for us, and when we are only at your attention and you have us by you self you are kind to every thing else. And you had to see us suffer anything, even though we have suffered so much. But you mustn't go. Prove your love for us by staying. For you think if my dear sisters could have been found safely even in a time like this, we would have we would not have had better news. She pressed and once more pressed her hand against her breast as she then said so. "On you must for give me no Pen and dear but you must for our sakes decide not to go. If we tell father, and he can't stop you, you'll kill us by going. Little Jennie and Angelina come. "The fall of her knees and crying bitterly, pleaded to him not to go."

"If you see it that way then you know best but sister don't get up, don't go down on your knees to me. He said and he lifted her to his feet sobbing bitterly. "But the boy and girls were good at good craft and will try their best. But won't allow them to approach either. They'll all go into the various rooms and we won't if Jennie and Angelina is

"He said and with a cry they found in I'll get them if I have to deliver fire on attack. They have always done this very first act and did it and got away and they'll do it again. But I'll be with you. You are right if it is useless, and do you hate Fredrick Oxden. You said it, and I don't love my brother but the father all the more he has caused to you and father but I must forgive him if God only wills it, he He will cause him to repent. But sometimes oh violet you know he is with Manley, God knows all fit and and Manley is marked for Hell and ready Jennie's prayers were never answered for him and that proves it. If it is the same case with your wicked brother I am sorry but it can't be helped. I can see by the crowd often at the wall. Heaven must be weeping for you dear little girls and God is very angry over your misery. Such dreadful thunder storms, like that terrific one last night and still going on yet a little. The very elements are elements in weeping and enraged. Thank God if that storm goes to those forests and quenches the flames."

He drew her to the big easy chair and sat down with her with her in his arms and held her the way he did Jennie which made her happy and fall asleep after the terrible experience with Fredrick Oxden. The three wicked boys were still prisoners, and though once a couple of the enemy came and wished to make an exchange for the three boys by offering six soldiers for them George Schiefel Pen and dear said they had a black second and were not to be exchanged.

Pen and sat looking blankly at the open window while he held his sobbing sister in his arms. It was a dark morning and rainy and in coming from Man they had all been drenched and had had to change their clothes. As a very young boy and at his age now Pen and had been noted for his ability to memorize remarks, to do all kinds of wood craft and things. When as a common boy about, the hardest and worst of flag and other drill, no matter how difficult had all been imprinted on his mind. Now as he sat thinking he could fairly see Violet's aching pleading words like large print before his eyes.

For once in his life George Schiefel Pen and dear had had a hard the plain truth from the lips of his favorite sisters. Yet he still did not realize the seriousness of the danger of the Mic-pullester woods, the largest forests in all California and which also extended for unknown numbers of miles into Angelina State and other provinces. He had heard the words, but their real meaning did not seem to place his brain, he could not comprehend the meaning, and he felt a sort of shiver to think that any one getting lost in the forests could never get out. He was so shocked, so absorbed that he felt there was no room now even in his brain for any interest in anything, or any thought that the present, the passing moment in which he made out his little life history is more precious to us than the great moments of the past, no matter how filled they may be with heroic figures.

Pen and even his sisters had been what we know as child prodigies of the book learning, and also in military and other things but Pen and was the greatest. Perhaps you readers have never known one, and if so, you may be lucky or unlucky, it depends on how the prodigy is. Infant prodigies show an unusual amount of intelligence at a very early age. So far it is all right, and a such a boy or girl is a miracle and if he or she belongs to a sensible family he is urged into athletics and sleeps out of doors and manages to grow up so he will pass in a crowd. On the day that Jennie and Angelina were lost and Pen and had wanted to go forth and search for them his father had said "No genius no matter how great even though he be a thousand times more genius than you in all your Indian and other knowledge could do a thing for them if they are really lost in those terrible woods. You might as well settle off all sorts of places you don't know to try and find them now. All other experiences were as easy as eating pancakes to you but this is a problem that only God himself can solve. It is just like skipping whole grades in school and plow through an empty teacher's class collage like a mule under a loose horse bush to find them in those dreadful woods. Pen and was now at a loss. He knew that Violet was right but the losses of the two little girls tore cruelly on those who loved him and them. He could not hardly have believed at the seeming impossibility of going through those woods and not being lost. Any thought of that struck the house every body was so quiet that inaudible mice came out of their holes and nibbled in broad day light. Pen and had been known every where as one of the most unusual and wonderful boys every time he was seen. At school his quizziness, and at home a marvelous oddity who unusual and despite his wonderful excitations and amazing marks he never suffered anything like forgetfulness, and though he was book crazy and loved his lessons he never forgot his friends and placed them first before all things. You couldn't reg a fellow but just could not follow the made one hundred light steps, when as he was applying for the same, and entered the distribution city of Abbeism he found a lovely, little little girl, little girl, she after knowing him believed him the greatest of boys and held his position as highest of boy about a decade. Then he had to leave and came the disaster at Abbeism to Violet and her sisters. Pen-od had turned out also as one of the most wonderful boys she had ever known, but for that she had become a little reckless at times, and once had named her younger sisters to look out for their brother, even though he too looked out for them, but some way or other there was different stuff in his sister. They did look after their gallant brother, and took as much care of him as he did of them, but they at times were in danger as he was when he couldn't do any thing for them or himself either and that was when he acted as a defender and was interfered with by sicked G. Wald Stalling, and that sorrow, hardship and experience with them out badly. Pen-od himself was so vicious and dangerous to the Glandelinians that it rather rather worried Violet and her sisters who were always on the alert to watch out for that danger didn't strike him down either but owing to their caution he seemed to be developing well.

And Pen-od blind to it all for he was doing into perilous places knew nothing of the fact that he was the brother of seven wonderful beautiful and good little girls who were successfully carrying on the difficult business of watching for his safety and looking after every thing as well, and neither did they know he was their brother until investigations revealed it to both sides. Then Pen-od became the place of honor as the hated Glandelinian like position position even at the time when he didn't know Violet and her sisters were his very own. He looked clean, and was clean, and thought clean, and that wasn't hard for him to do either.

Now Pen-od and his sister were really had been stuck at luck had and at luck the had a bit of the enemy yet, given the few hours he had that Pen-od had not been with his remaining sisters he had been sitting in his study feverishly seeking the facts of the Mic-Holliste Woods, and was deaf and dumb and blind to every thing else. Yet when he occasionally came up for air, as some put it, he did his best to console his sisters. The Pen-od was good natured, when his sisters were happy the things he could do to make them laugh made them see he was the funniest and kindest of brothers, so soon they suffered made him vicious to the enemy. It was recently before a time that once he came home with the news that he had taken a vacation, and that it made it possible for him to go to Angelina Agathia, and write an account of some part of the city's history of which he wanted to use for the sake of military purposes and make its defense so safe that the enemy had to capture the moon first before they could capture that city. Violet and her sisters had been wild with delight. It was a glorious journey, and on ship board on the river at least it was easy to keep track of Pen-od, who had found a very learned engineer who agreed with him on every known point. A this happened before Pen-od knew his sister and his sister belonged to such other Violet and her sisters had had time to enjoy the voyage and make many friends. In Angelina Agathia which despite the fact they reached softly they took up their quarters in one of the magnificent palaces of the city, and here Pen-od who always boiled with activity soon made numberless pals and immediately had a new boy and girl scout troop of his own formed there. These boys and girls took up the work with the greatest enthusiasm and the more thorough him the armies to have the boy and girl scout troop they can be big gently honest of.

Now Depressionville, beautiful and good, Depressionville the brilliant, lay in ruins, Pen-od too good sister one and he was upon her and raining so much every day that Pen-od was in danger from a flood from the water pipes to day Pen-od at night humped over on the chair, with Violet beside him, but and for a long thought of the wonderful chance that had brought him when a history, tragic and important was being made. To those who did not know him he looked excited as if he did not worry greatly over the disappearance of Angelina and Jamie, but his sisters could see what others could not see, and if it had not been that they tried to check their grief as much as possible and watch him he might have had a serious breakdown or illness caused by his sorrow. At night most of the house instead of going to bed he had come to the library, snuggled in the light, and taking down every aphonia, and other books, and page of paper and ink pens had soon been lost in paper and pages of the books, as if he was more interested in books than over the loss of his sisters. But that was not so. Deeply he had at even to find some way to combat those treacherous, Mic-Holliste Woods, and when fall in he had at times flung the books violently across the floor. He had tried to solve the problem in a way of trying to solve the problem.

times then his sister had been lost. He remembered the story when they were lost as told by a girl while at Vivian Vickay when they had been lost for a very long time and then it seemed as if that which sister Angelina could never come back again. The terrible idea that his sister was no longer in the Mic-Holliste Woods had at first never occurred to him. He at times had suspected G. Wald Stalling and his companions of having caused it by clipping a note to Hamley and only but it had not been so. Very good thing for the three they had it. He would have come to the woods any way but then he knew it would be suicide. Now again that Violet had cried he had to sleep in his room he had placed her on the bed and talked the floor and dreamed.

"Don't take it like that Pen-od dear," said Tim pausing to place a sympathetic hand on his friend's shoulder.

"It's awful, awful," groaned Pen-od. "They are lost, lost for ever in those frightful Mic-Holliste Woods. I believe they are all already dead at that. When if they didn't the horrible terror of their experiences will kill them."

"No," it said James himself. "From my experience with your sisters, they're the bravest little girls in the world. There's no cowardly blood blood in your sisters. Whatever part of that I needed to fear they are they will know they'll get out sooner or later. Once they are will by God's help get out of the woods they'll come back, and will be looking for us every minute. And if those Glandelinians who pursued them into the woods, I'm led in the forests from the flames and your sisters after all didn't they will be so one to hurt them even though the Glandelinians do dog child-enough just to kill them. And they are a better off in the forests than prisoners among such brutal gray coated soldiers you may be sure. The only thing I am hoping is that we can find them or have them rescued by means of the forest ranger who are bending every effort to find them. But we couldn't even go to the forests ever so far away if your sisters would follow you to and wait with you yourselves because because of the battle raging so extensively I don't believe any one even with the best credentials can get away from Pandora for the next few days."

"If the ranger is so many miles down the river had only something for a clue" said Tim. "Can't you even remember that they had Pen-od when they went to Angelina Agathia with little Hall?"

"Oh, yes," said James. "If they would have had the same thing they would have had the same thing."

"Nothing particularly except what they were for defense, and the angels. Remember didn't find anything," said Pen-od regretfully. "Picture of my sister's have been sent to the Angelina Headquarters and there for the angels to keep them. The best Pandora man I know of who has a picture of Ok but I couldn't describe it to you. It isn't a limp—just a picture of a woman's face. But he is too far away to see. There is a woman I know of who is also a forest ranger but she couldn't help me find it."

"How?" asked Tim. "Why she has no experience with the Mic-Holliste Woods. During the night a I could do lots of things since my two sisters were lost, but couldn't fathom out anything that could help me find my sisters. Violet is right. From the into those woods would be to go into a labyrinth that I'd never get out of. I tell you Jim," he said earnestly. "When I get a chance, I shall spend my time in showing these Glandelinians what they have made of me. They have abused and did things to my sisters that I couldn't let Histamine write of, but I'm standing myself and my aunt. If I had thought of things in the proper light my two sisters would not be lost. They are so sacrificed a lot for my little friend Hall, but if my aunt had only used discretion, she could not have been caused this disaster. Good and now at her age."

"Let's not let you father hear," said James. "He would tell you it was all his fault for letting them go with him."

"Perhaps it has been," said Pen-od. "I could blame the three of us for our foolishly and we all have experienced."

"I do think that we ought to look at it a little from your father's standpoint," said James gently. "You know your sisters knew the importance of the information that Hall knew concerning Abbeism. That made apies of them to capture him. Your two sisters decided to take him to Angelina Agathia, and she said if would be safe. Your father permitted them to go and he thought the going would be safe. Well the going was safe at that for they ought to have been right. You can't make the mistake of trying to come home with them on the way. The danger she wasn't lost in the woods is a mystery. I don't doubt she thought the way to go was safe than the way to go. I think she could have done the same thing. Be fair with your Aunt Pen-od. Don't you think not?"

As Penwood and Tim left the building, they passed a man whom they noticed they were again and therefore did not take him into account. They walked along from the building to building, fearful of having been seen by the two boys. When they passed a big man one of the fellows grabbed some of the dirt and rubbed it on his face and clothes, and told himself not to tell the same. He thought very much that they looked like children and that for the present they were safe. He endeavored to attract attention to the fact they were alone and led them from one building to another, but did not fear. One was known to the name of Vance and the other a Ivan. So that they had not been seen by the two boys. He looked down upon them, then asked the man a kind of question of the city, and disappeared out of sight, while the two boys went on and did not they nearly were positively burned to death, it was with an almost a strangely overcome. He sank down in a chair by the window after the fire was put out and leaned his head on the sill. All gone. He did not know what to do. Taken by surprise as to a different location without letting him know, his quick and clever brain for a moment refused to act. He raised his head and realizing why, if they took his place, why to a safe location why would the house burn on fire. He looked dully out into the street where the group of people were moving slowly away. Long, long time he stared, then his eyes suddenly set on themselves or something near him. Dumbfounded and unbelieving he stood. It was as if he could hear Joana's voice, her own words. "If any one kidnapped me," she had said, "I think if I had my diamond I would go to the beach and hide on the window pane."

[illegible]

Indeed, he said, he had served her well before Penrod's eyes, on the Then Perod was in deep thought. One event pressed so closely on another that things lost their significance and importance.

"We have got to get a hustle on now if we want to get those planes," he said again.

"The main thing that is almost killing me is that my two sisters are lost. They really may surely be dead for all I know, and the first thing I should do if it is possible is to try and find them if they are alive. To get hold of them and the soldiers too who I came ad this is they survived."

"Get hold of Jennie and Argeline," said James. "Do you know where they are?"

"Yes, but that doesn't make it any easier," said Pen. "I can't really dare go into the Mc-Ghollester woods even if Violet and her sisters would allow me to. I am well acquainted with the interior of the Mc-Ghollester woods, however, as well as with the interior of the Mc-Ghollester woods. The soldiers are afraid that they are lost to us for ever, but I have made some discoveries through studying my Geog. a phis last night. If they have stayed within reach of the main road running through the place then they're safe and could get out by themselves."

"I wouldn't play any trick like that," said Pen-od. "They're mad enough already and if I was gone, and they suspected my intention they'd risk even their very lives to bring me back. Neither have I made any plans. Besides Violet and her sisters know best and if I was to go contrary to their command it would serve me right for all that would happen to me, but I don't know."

M: My sorrow is more for my remaining sisters than myself for I can't see them suffer so. I can't bear it. What I want to do is to save Janni and Angeline who are the best little girls in the world including my sisters. If the most powerful of the Geminis cannot do any thing, and the poorest rangers still manage to save their children, then the bodies of even dead children may be

"Don't feel that way please" said James. "Think of your remaining sisters. That's a sign you are in despair. Remember God some times gives us a severe answer to a doubt pretty quick, and usually the severe test will come might be now if we don't fail in the trial, maybe this may be one of the last and rather serious like this may happen again."

"You ought to have some" and per od, "We ... and out I'd have to walk even that short distance."

"Father won't exempt any one from paying on cars & other things, not even him, if or my sister's," he said."

anything I have is interesting. The way you'd look like a hell to me. Nothing. Nothing doesn't count for anything. And I don't care.

...and that the FBI should be able to talk to the ...

[illegible]

"I have not clearly informed an agent," he continued "but I had not put his hand

"Thank you so much. I will always keep it" said Perceval. "As so, 70 many many years after, if I ever could have looked into the future, I could have seen a most significant thing. I could see, and conviction on his wife's mind, as being

...at they stopped before a magnificent house and got the attention of their eyes. They suddenly had observed two men, each approaching one at a time. From another house across the street, a man also emerged and left came cautiously out. She did not glance at me, she was looking at the ground up and down the road, closed the door carefully and went off cautiously and slowly without a glance behind toward the big house.

"Come do you see that door of the insignificant house? They did not letch it. I don't believe there is a soul over there but the old woman. The other people had believed that they would have left the place long before they had." "Yes, there is

"That's the girl that I don't want," said Ivan. "With her I need the money to be useful. That's so. The brother is so honest and so good."

...a little girl but it was very young. A mob was in the streets threatening the mob of people. Greatly to be feared. These people would not let go of their...

"It's light -- can't ask that," answered Vernon. "Get you self together. Grab the woman as quick as you can. There's a whole night."

[illegible]

stand back to the wall, jacking the up the floor, and high and low, in a good floor and quick on a light stand back to the wall, jacking the up the floor, and high and low, in a good floor and quick on a light \mathbb{H}^n is a Hilbert space, and \mathbb{H}^n is a Hilbert space.

The kurtosis for all three variables, kurtosis₁, kurtosis₂, and kurtosis₃, are less than 3, indicating that the distributions are leptokurtic.

but, of course, there are a few little children who focus away at him.

"The way is really going to be a shock," said Angelina and, as a party of Glandelinians cowered over the wall and she heard him whisper "long." "Are you sure they didn't see us? They seem to be moving forward now."

"I hope not, but I shouldn't like to encounter them, besides then if we got caught and there's no telling how long we would be held before we could make our escape and as long as we have been gone I'm afraid our sisters and others are dreadfully frightened and distressed by now. Wouldn't we dare take that short way you told me about?"

Angelina hesitated, but at that moment mingled with a loud peal of thunder than before came several loud pistol shots, and as the branches of the trees began to wave in a sudden breeze, the pistol shots sounded nearer than they were.

"I guess we'd better," she said with a nervous glance in the direction of the foe and hoping that the rapidly darkening storm clouds would make enough gloom to hide them from their pursuers. "I don't believe General Hinddale's guards will see us, we don't have to pass very near his encampment."

"Do you suppose he would really do anything to us even if he did?" Jennie inquired.

"I don't know; but I shouldn't like to try. He's got such a dreadful temper every one says. We got our pistols to help us if we are pursued, and a member that Glandelinian officer who befriended us gave us plenty more ammunition."

"I'm almost afraid to try it," said Jennie a little nervously, but Angelina had pressed by the other pursuers had already turned in by that other road indicated, and fired by the spirit of adventure she had no intention of turning back.

"I don't believe he or his Glandelinians will see us," she repeated assuredly. "It looks so much like it is going to rain like a cloud burst he'll sure be in his headquarters and his guards won't be paying any attention to us. It's getting darker and darker and the storm may help us through."

She quickened her pace to a run as she spoke, and poor Jennie not having happened to look where she was going, stubbed her right foot against a stone, and then though a little bigger found difficulty in keeping up with her.

"Did you hurt your foot very much?" asked Angelina anxiously as they were going along a gravelled path.

"Yes I did, oh I hope I didn't break it, K! I'm afraid I can't run any faster," panted Jennie. "Are we most out of the territory? My how dark it is getting!"

"We'll be ought of this territory in about half an hour and then we'll be able to get to a glen where we can hide till right and then proceed."

"Stop, stop both of you little brats the way that do you mean by coming through our territory that way? Stop. You are under arrest do you hear me?"

Indeed it was a loud and most terrible voice and it came from what appeared to be a little rustic summer house only a few yards from them. It was an awful moment as a swarm of Glandelinian soldiers suddenly appeared with fixed bayonets. Angelina uttered a loud shriek and Jennie's heart seemed to stand quite still.

"Bring them here to me the little brats. I want to speak to them." For the first second when they found themselves surrounded, they stood quite still, panting for breath, and scarcely realizing what had happened.

"Pen and. Oh Pen and" gasped Angelina, stretching out her hand toward Pando. "Oh if you were only here now. Oh dear God make him come." Jennie had given a little frightened sob and she and her sister's sisters were led toward the man with the terrible voice.

"Who are you and why didn't you stop when I commanded you to? The loud harsh voice demanded. "Didn't you hear the cavalry leader calling to you to stop. What do you kids mean by coming where you are not needed eh?" and a tall old soldier dressed more like a king than a general laid a heavy hand on her. On Jennie's shoulder Jennie gave one more frightened sob then resolutely stood still to meet her doom for not one of the little Vivian girls were cowards.

"You have no right to make us prisoners," said Angelina. "We wanted to get home before the storm, and we didn't know you camps were so near, this way was so much shorter. We thought you wouldn't mind."

"You thought I wouldn't mind, did you? What right have any of you to think of such a thing. Now listen and mind you pay attention to what I say. I have a right to arrest all strangers coming too close to my camps. I believe you are spies. Take them boys into my headquarters and we'll investigate them. If they are spies they can be punished to take the consequences that's all."

He actually turned away, and the soldiers followed the little girls along having taken their weapons from them already the first big drops of the threatened storm were beginning to fall.

Angelina also gave a little frightened gasp but there was no hesitating the soldiers and in another moment they were being forced along the gravel with walk in the direction of that which she and Jennie had been talking. The general and the soldiers walked fast, and Jennie and Angelina had a hard time to keep up with them along at a distance. Not another word said any one until they reached the house, for as they stepped onto the porch, there was a vivid flash of lightning and a loud boom of thunder, and the storm began with a violent crazy fit of blowing wind and a blinding dash of rain mingled with banging clatter of hail stones. Still in silence the general with the soldiers led the little girls into what she afterwards knew as the wide hall of general Hinddale's headquarters. The little girls were panting from their rapid walk and their hearts were still beating very fast.

"Sit down the two of you," said the general, and they obeyed.

"Well," he said looking down at the two of them with a puzzled expression in his keen eyes, "who are you two brats any way?"

"We won't tell you for I know what you'll do," said Jennie.

"Oh you won't sh. Trying to defy me," he began savagely and then he cut himself short. "You don't need to tell me I heard you mention the name Pen and. That means you are two of Prince Pen and's sisters, and that means you are the Vivian girls. Well what are you doing here. Spy ing I suppose?"

"No, oh no sir," gasped Jennie. "We were lost in the high-collared woods and came up this way by train. The train wouldn't go any further and we tried to get to Pen and's by foot."

"Oh I see. I heard you two had been lost in the news papers and got to believe you. Well nevertheless you are arrested. You are spies any way, and I'll teach you what it means to disobey my orders by coming across my territory. But that brother of yours," he added in a different tone. "He wasn't with you was he?"

"No and I'm glad of it," said Jennie.

"Oh I see. And you and your sister there ran off from Pando and did you and took with you a girl who was very important to us for information she stole from general Hanley. You assisted the most dangerous of all Christian spies on record, and you did so without your brother's knowing it did you. And he let you go. A nice person to have charge of you he must be. Well you are caught whether you expected to be or not and there's nothing for you to do but see general Hanley as soon as I can get you two sent to him. What can you mother be thinking of to trust two nits like you with nobody better than your brother to take care of you."

"It wasn't his fault how dare you," said Jennie her eyes flashing. "We are glad we did rescue little Nell in spite of all we suffered for it. You dare blame my brother it wasn't his fault it really wasn't. You can't do any real harm to us. We are not afraid of you or Hanley."

The general made a queer noise in his throat which sounded to Jennie and Angelina something like a suppressed chuckle.

"Well I'll not even lay a hand on you," he said. "But I know when once you are within Hanley's confines this time all Hanley can't enable you to escape again. But I won't do that on one condition. Will to accept that proposition?"

"What is that proposition?"

"Tell us where you hid that little brat called Nell?"

"We won't. We'd die first."

"Well you won't die, but you'll never see your brother and sisters again. He then had the two children moved through a dungeon like doorway into the gloom and chill of a great room beyond.

was The first impression of the two little girls was of a dead heavy chill which a big fire burning in the large fireplace at the other end of the vast room was powerless to lighten. Now it could be so chilly in here when it was so warm out side they couldn't understand. By now the storm outside was in a wild uproar. The place seemed half underground and what light entered, though it was dark outside now, but what the lightning flashes revealed they could see nothing even then very good for the moment. The flashes of lightning partly revealed the heavy oak beams which supported the ceiling but the lower part of the room lay in deep shadow. Emblems and made a sadfully immodest pictures, the little and often dirty to look upon were scratched and chalked on the walls, and there was one actual photograph photograph of a Glandelinian soldier disemboweling a little girl, but fortunately the two little girls could not make them out in the dim light. Lining the width of the big room before the fireplace was a long massive table and on either side of it were benches built where they stood. From the size and strength of them they might have been intended for the use of a race of giant so exceedingly fat men. Their carved bases spread heavily apart and huge dragon claw feet braced them on the floor, which beneath and around the table, was covered with stone.

At one side of the fireplace a great pile of wood was placed, broken and splintered pieces picked up from some where. Bits of oaken beams, pieces of rare highly polished furniture and scraps of priceless carvings made the pile which would soon go inflame to cook the wretched supper even then in course of preparation.

A woman stood by the table scraping scales from a big fish. A heavy knife was in her hand, and as she raised her dark and scowling face Jennie and Angeline seemed to recognize her and could not help it when they shuddered. As she stood watching the entrance of the group at the door, scowling and peering through the gloom she looked in the eyes of the little girls, like a demon would and to Angeline and Jennie she looked like one of the furies of the wall recorded dreadful French Revolution. All the history she and her sister Jennie had read of that dreadful period was made clear and real to them. Jennie and Angeline closely watched, and closely guarded from her hand up to the time of their experiences in the woods and else where, never come in contact yet with any one out of their own good and holy and noble class with the exception of the Christian soldiery at Poe's. Their father - The Emperor - knowing the educational standing of Aunt Mary, and judging her and her family by her mild inoffensive manner had decided to allow Jennie and Angeline to take the chances of going to Mary Mary with little Nell. It had not occurred to him a man of many unusual National Affairs to suspect the presence of an ingenious, lively mischievous blind in the person of the Glandelinian boy scout in every location down from Angeline's Agathia to Pando. After Jennie and Angeline had felt sure the trip to Angeline's Agathia would have been safe, the little girls' Father too imagined them to be safe in their trip and rejoined that the two little princesses could go for a time to her aunt and be out of much of the dreadful war for a short time. So he had told the little girls to go ahead and visit her and take little Nell with them and might spend what time they liked with their beautiful aunt, and then forget the whole thing in the fearful question of War which soon extended fiercely in that direction too. When the battle of Depression raged two and the territory of Pando - a he left orders than in case of any peril or disaster Jennie and Angeline were to remain at Aunt Mary's for a safe refuge. But she had not received the orders and the warning until three days after she had lost her two changes and now they escaped being captured by the enemy herself. Before the happenings of the last two chapters however, Penrod himself had been almost always with his sisters and had so imbibed his democratic ideas and had studied military things so hard to make good as a princely chief of scouts, that he was a greater menace to the enemy now than any one can conceive. Knowing that his sisters should be angel possessed it had never seemed that he could touch his good and wonderful little sisters. They should all be safe, and Penrod had moved through his own adventuresous days with only the thought that he would have so much more to tell his Imperial Father on one of the rare and precious evenings when his Father's duties at Court and with his immense armies would allow him to spend a few hours and days with his son and magnificent daughters.

And now for once in his life he was stumped and couldn't dare think how to find his two lost sisters.

With a keen and appraising eye Jennie and Angeline viewed that dark and interior like dungeon thinking to tell Penrod about it when they would have a chance to make an escape. The woman beside the table scowled darkly as she saw the group.

"What now you scoundrels?" she demanded of the soldiers. "Are those two little girls spies? They are nothing but little girls. Why do you carry soldiers both with them. Why did you bring them here?"

"The general orders that they be kept here until they can be taken to Manley," said one of the soldiers.

"Aw c-rack them on the head, cut them open kill them. The river runs swift enough through the camp there."

"But it's the general's orders. They're to go to Manley as soon as the general can get an opening there."

She brandished her knife as she spoke.

"I will not give them single one single meal do you hear that?"

"I don't care if you don't," said the leader of the soldiers with a smile.

He looked at the little girls as he spoke.

"Who are you two?" he asked. Clothed as the two little girls were in the dresses the good Glandelinian quarter-master sergeant had given them, there was still something distinguished about them. The little girls stood perfectly erect. They knew if they mentioned their names they would place themselves in grave danger.

"Try and find out," said Jennie defiantly.

The soldiers shouted with laughter. The woman scowled and then said:

"Ain't they clever? Ask them something else."

"No," said the leader of the soldiers. "I want to think that over. Come it's cold here."

He forced the little girls down the long room roughly made his way with them around the long table and hurried them roughly down on a big pile of bags.

In their earlier days any one of the Vivian girls used to have an unspeakable terror of Glandelinian soldiery. Then But they were used to all that now.

Jennie was hurt by the rough job of tumble she received and she couldn't suppress a scream. From the pain of her injury which after a shock left her lips and one of the Glandelinian soldiers started over to her when a short mysterious unseen voice silenced her. She looked to see who had spoken, calling her so familiarly by name.

"Stop Jennie stop," said the voice in English and her cries were stilled as if by magic although she still gazed with longing and terror at a pale face of some body lying near where down whose face a tiny line of blood trickled. There was a second body dirty and torn and nearly dressed in a Glandelinian boy scout blouse. She stared at him and so did Angeline never recognizing Walter Starring, whom she had seen so gorgeously clothed in beautiful uniforms. It was not until he spoke again that she recognized him.

"Be quiet little girls," he said. "He will save you. Henry is not hurt he is just dizzy. He will be all right soon." Walter spoke hopefully, but as he looked down at the boy lying before him he wondered in his heart if there was really a spark of life left in that still pale bleeding body. As for Jennie, after the first outburst, she sat dumbly and dumbly trembling. The past days and nights had been so crowded with dreadful horrors, that the two tender little girls were fast passing into a state where they neither seemed to realize nor feel the hardships and abuses they were subjected to. The wicked woman studied the two little girls carefully. Jennie and any one of her sisters were children whose beauty was always remarked where ever they went. Among their own following they have always been used to kindness and attention from every one, and never were spoiled. The soldiers too who were to guard them sat looking at the little girls while they ate their evening portion of black bread and cold fish. There was a great discussion. The large man who was sergeant called Michael favored offering the two little girls for the execution squad right away and to check with both taking them to Manley. The other soldiers would not consider it at all.

"Remember," said one of the men. "There is much danger in killing these two girls. There's something peculiar about them, something as Christians would call it - a largely spiritual. Rather will I prepare these little Christian ladies for the trip to Manley's own territory, go beautiful are they that we all are suspicious as to who they are even though they won't tell."

"Have it your own way," said the woman. "I favor getting them out of the way."

"I always do," said the man simply. Then she herself studied the little girls again.

"I think it will be well to twist the legs of the two of them," she said with fiendish glee in her face. "Both of them would make such sweet little cripples."

"No," said Michael. "You may not do so. General Hinsdale will not have it."

The woman laughed. "I'll have my own way," she asked.

"All right Martha, you do," said another soldier. "But believe me, I don't believe you could do them personal harm even though we captured them. I've heard that angels take the greatest care of these little girls and could I'll be have prevented us from capturing them if they so desired. There is also a fortune for those who bring them to Manley I'll be found. Be careful do not try and harm them as something may happen."

The woman sat thinking for a little.

"Perhaps you are right," she said. "Many Christian dogs are angel mad these times so it is said. They are pretty enough to climb to any heights."

One of the Glandelinian soldiers laughed.

"Why laugh?" said Martha angrily.

"Nothing, nothing," said Martha only that it is funny to think these two knew that their sisters and brothers are grieving for them, and they had hoped to see them and cheer them up. We have again prevented them from getting back to where they belong so that they may climb back for you pleasure."

The woman's brow grew black. She reached out a heavy foot, and pushed Angeline and Angeline away from her.

"Not for my pleasure," she said sneeringly. "So pat your nose. They are to pay me over and over for my hand life that God has given me against my will. I swore to Him I would get revenge for my sufferings, and drop by drop, pain for pain, I will take from these little brats just because they are Princesses of Abbiennia, and for all I have suffered. They shall sleep cold, because I so slept all my child hood. They shall hunger because I did so. They shall beg in the streets while I shall listen." She shook her fist above her head and her face was frightfully contorted. "I have hated all the Christians world, and now these shall pay me."

Pat her shrugged his shoulders. "As you will. I would advise you to feed them enough to keep beauty in their faces and grace in their limbs if you indeed wish to take them to Glandelinia and to use them for food and light and fire."

"That is sound sense, Pat but remember I'm only spoofing. I'm only saying what I would do if they were only left with me put to Manley they go. He'll

"I make them suffer more than I can. Besides I'm his mother and will bring them to Manley when the cavalry starts for his army. You two little brats will spy on me. Well, we have you now, and when next you little girls walk the streets you will have cause to remember my husband Michael and me." Pat-o-foned frowned.

"You are too handy with names," he said. "Trust only a dead dog. Suppose one of those Christian boy spies would escape us. He'd bring these little girls to rescue. He'd go to Prince Penrod, and the rest is nothing that Prince can't do." "Leave that to me," said Michael with a very dark frown. "You" he said to Walter. "Staring you see this gun? We will not bind you but if you stir toward the door, or make a move to free yourself, or sneak out with any one of the girls you are lost. I will shoot you down." "We only want the Vivian girls," said Walter boldly. "We'll defeat you yet. Man imposes God disposes."

The Glandelinians set up a shout of laughter. "Thanks, thanks," said the sergeant called Michael when he could speak but Martha said angrily;

"What give up those brats so that they can get back home and make their sisters and brothers happy again. I hate them. What do you think I am a fool?" "Suppose I pay you," said Walter. "I will reward you well woman."

"Again a shout went up. "A million thanks," said the woman. "What will you give me—a dozen dried fishes to skin and eat?"

"Listen you don't know Prince Penrod," scowled Walter proudly. "He is the son of the Mighty Emperor Vivian. Beware how to you treat me and these princess friends of mine. Their angels may secretly betray you and the rest to their brother."

"Their brothers will kill me," cried the woman leaning back and wiping the tears of fright from her leather cheeks. "Go on, go on bring the prince."

"Will you not ask him to take us to the palace soon? We would like to see his own palace home."

"Give us the little girls you wicked woman and set us free," said Walter after a pause.

"No you are too amusing," said the woman. "Rather we will take you with us or else leave you safely locked here where no one shall disturb you."

Walter looked at the little girls and the form of Henry now sitting slightly then he handed a great ruby to the sergeant.

"Take this and let us go," he pleaded.

The man looked wonderingly at the flashing stone.

"So you too help your self in these war times," he said sneeringly. "Take it back. We are sick enough but we don't accept stolen property."

"I didn't steal it."

"You did too and trying to bribe us with it. Take it back."

And he made Walter take it back. Night seemed to come all at once in the dark and partly underground room and the thunderstorm still continued heavily outside. Henry unattended came slowly back to unconsciousness, and lay where he had fallen in a sort of dose. Argeline crept to him cautiously and laying her head on his shoulder, went to sleep despite the peril of her surroundings.

Presently Martha began to yawn and the men nodded as they sprawled on the benches while two soldiers stood on guard at the door. The woman drew out an armful of rugs, and prepared for the night by wrapping another shawl around her shoulders. Two of the men rose after a whispered consultation, and taking Walter to the furthest and darkest corner, tied him securely to a ring in the wall. This was done also with Argeline and Jennie. His bonds were loose enough to permit him to lie down on the hard earth and stone floor but he sat with his back against the wall wide awake, every nerve tense and quivering. Twice sergeant Michael came and looked at him in the light of a torch from the fire, and he treated muttering. Walter decided to pretend sleep. The third time Michael gave a grunt of satisfaction and went back to the fire and beckoned the others from their pallets.

"He is dead asleep," he said in a low whisper. "We must make our plans."

"Good," said the woman. "Are the children asleep too that is the two girls?"

"Yes."

"Then what do you want to do about it?"

She too whispered in a low tone and it struck Walter. Staring that for some strange reason he was listening to a conversation spoken in tones that ordinarily could not be heard three feet away from the speaker. He listened very intently. Every single word was clear and distinct. Owing to some peculiar peculiarity of the vaulted ceiling, the sounds were brought to him, four feet from the speaker as accurately as though spoken into a telephone. Walter's courage rose once more. He heard the man Michael light his pipe.

"I don't know," he said.

"Of course not," answered the woman. "You never do. Those two boys are dangerous."

If they get away they'll cause these little girls to be rescued. I suppose you don't want to kill them?"

"What's the use?" asked the man. "Why blacken our souls further than we must?"

"I'll tell you why," said Martha suddenly. "He whispers out like a knife. I'll tell you. Because I fear them. Boys as they are I fear them. There is a spirit in the eyes of the one who talks of the girls but the Penrod that will never die until death blinds them. I fear him the little rat. The small little rat. Talking about that dangerous man, defeated Prince Penrod, if he escaped and reached him that prince single handed could rescue his brat sister's sister. My I wish I had the training of him. Whoever he is he is an Abbeinnian, and he will hurt us yet. I feel it. I can feel it any way that plenty of harm will come to us through those boys we captured. I saw you Michael. Captain Pat-o-I saw you. Once twice twice. You know I never fail. One is dressed like a boy scout and boy scouts of the Christians are dangerous."

There was a silence and Walter heard the Glandelinian captain catch his breath sharply and then saw him glance toward him sharply.

"Well what would you?" he said finally.

There was a note of triumph in the woman's voice when she spoke.

"To me now night," she said. "We will leave them here, tied to the table. I will leave food on the table for them, just enough for one meal. I have still my little friends in the pill box on the chimney ledge. They are as strong as ever, as deadly as ever. Even we will not stay to see whether they eat or not. But I think they will because I will see to it that they do not taste any food to move now. We will lock the door. I will go down toward Manley's encampments. He's near. Then they say that town is not harmed, and the Christians are not winning the war. I will give the smaller girl to one of the officials there. I have a fancy of taking the prettiest one to Manley myself."

There was a long pause. Then "How is it as you like," said Michael. "Of course the boys would be a good deal if they once got free. See it that the little girls are under the guardianship of the cavalry. Those boys will interfere if they could."

"Certainly they would," said Martha. "We would never know when they would creep up with a big swarm of Christians and girl scouts—especially that Prince Penrod. He's as dangerous as a desert-lying angel, he's one himself."

"Suppose they do not eat?" asked Captain Pat-o.

"Pat-o," said Martha. "Well you know nothing of boys, and they will suspect nothing. You are brutes, brutes are members and I so kind, and oh so sorry," she laughed. "They will believe all I say," she added.

Michael nodded. "Then it is settled," he said.

In Abbeinnia, like in the United States but in a more terrific scale every precaution is taken to protect all children from harm. In Abbeinnia all kinds of strict laws are especially made for their safety in all things, all Holy Societies exist in every town and city and village to look after them. They go unharmed through the streets and were to those who try to do them the slightest injury. Noble men and women everywhere give their lives to visiting all distant cities and making easier the lot of the unfortunate ones made destitute by the dreadful and cruel wars. Hundreds of thousands of special cases are frequently written up in the Abbeinnian newspapers every day and help found for them in that way. In factories, shops, stores, asylums in the street (there are no slums or poverty in Abbeinnia thank God) every possible effort is made to make the lot of children as easy and as happy as it is possible. Rich people in Abbeinnia are not money lovers, and they bend their every effort to see that no poverty exist anywhere.

God alone can tell the terrible frightful story of how children are treated when ever captured by the enemy. Violet and her sisters know from their own frequent experiences, so that is why when Glandelinians are caught in the act of capturing, slaughtering or chasing after children on they are given no quarter by the Christian soldiers. With in the Glandelinian camps where child slavery abounds there are no laws for instance governing the age at which a child slave or child captive shall be put to work. In fact in order to keep body and soul together, children are forced to labor whatever whatever age they are captured even if babies. They do no work than that of farm animals when their little hands can scarcely grasp the implements of toil. The there are on so many of them, and they are held cheaply, not hardly at all clothed, poorly and nastily fed they often die under such hard ships. If a child taken sick, it is cast aside as mere trash and is killed, deliberately or left to die of get well, and when sick made to work until she or he drops. If children were too robust and may grow strong from their hard ships then making cripples and dwarfs was a regular trade. All the child slaves were stolen by the Glandelinians and they often twisted the legs of the stronger robust ones so their faces were distorted. And to Glandelinians like those in whose hands Jennie and Argeline have fallen life, and child live especially of Christians was too cheap and of too little account to matter much, and especially if they were Abbeinnian princesses.

Oh it would be too terrible to tell how in the majority of cases how fiercely the Glandelinians hated God and all His. Probably the demons and all the lost soul souls in Hell do not hate Him that much. Their recollections to Christians to child slaves, all their butcheries, immodest ways of killing little girls, doing things to them that the heads would blush red with shame to think of is done just to defy our pea-Blessed Lord to punish them for it. The force as these Glandelinians were of that kind they did not in the least mind the contemplation of a crime as horrible as the one they had just decided on. Just to see to it that Jennie and Angelina would never see their beloved parents and sisters and brothers again, and that was really going to happen this time if they can only get them into Hanley's hands. If once in his hands now it would really be so. No one can ever escape Hanley these days if brought to him under heavy guard. Therefore they decided to do so, put they feared of Prince Penrod, and then too they were afraid of the bright light. Boy scouts who had fallen into their clutches and to them there was but one way to treat the matter—the shackles and the poisoned food.

After this there was silence that is within the place, but outside the thunder-storm did it a best to keep the best and tightest sleep of from getting even a wink. At times would slacken up as if it would soon quit and then it would boom, boom, boom and boom again in the distance and fifteen minutes after it seemed as if Volcanoes were exploding in the sky. The men could not sleep because of the din and cursed the elements and blasphemed God for it, and Walter himself neither could sleep, nor the little girls, and they feared too that the heavy rains would flood the old place but no water seeped in. Walter was anxious to know whether the conversation had been overheard by Henry and the two little girls but dared not communicate with them in any way, although he could hear an occasional sigh as though Henry was suffering pain.

Henry was indeed feeling badly from the blow that had nearly broken his skull, which he received in the fight. Fortunately the weapon only the flat side of the Glandelinian cavalryman's sword had glanced and so saved his life.

But his head ached worse than he thought a head could ache, and he was to turn away by the frightful din of the worse thunder-storm Jennie and Angelina herself had overheard, and when he finally came out of the din he slept only in a sort of stupor which the crashing thunder failed to rouse him out of. He had not heard the conversation, that had been listened so eagerly to by Walter, neither had the little girls, and so were at least saved that anxiety. Day came dark, and stormy and still thundering and to Walter who was prepared there was signs of departure. Henry who still lay silent on his pallet of logs did not seem to see anything. He did not eat but accepted a cup of water from the woman's hand. Angelina and Jennie clung to him, and the woman did not seem to object.

Walter was afraid to speak to any of his friends. The day dragged away stormy but not so noisy and finally it seemed years as the storm grew so dark that Walter knew that night must be approaching. Soon he would know their fate. It was uncertain because he knew that at any time in the day they might have decided not to leave their death to poisoned food, but to shoot them to death before leaving the place.

However Ma-tha commenced the preparation of the meal that was meant for supper, and Walter noticed that she made more than usual. A crust of dry bread and a cup of water was given to Jennie, and the same fare thrown on the floor beside Angelina, who did not eat it, and watched anxiously to see if Jennie would touch her food. The angel had warned her and her sisters in their sleep. But Jennie shook her head.

"Never mind," said the woman, slyly looking over to the door where the men were bundling some uniformed military stuff in a big square of cloth. "Never mind. I'm sorry for you my poor boys. Soon those brute soldiers will take us away, and leave you here, but I will leave one good meal for you. I promise you that if they beat me for it you shall be decently fed for once the both of you. And I am a good cook, you shall see."

Walter shivered. Then as the woman turned to the fire and rattled the pans he said sharply in English:

"Henry do not eat."

The three turned threateningly as he spoke but as he made no effort to continue the speech in what was to them an unknown tongue, they once more went about their tasks. As they became interested in the task they were doing Walter spoke again in English.

"Henry!" he said.

"Henry heard."

"Yes."

"Don't try to keep the little girls if they start to take them or they'll kill the four of us," he said as rapidly as he could talk.

"There they go again," said the woman scowling. "What are they up to do you think?"

The captain himself went over to Henry.

"Do you want your head broken again?" he scowled. "You will get it, and you too she started it," he turned to Walter and shouted threateningly across the room. "It will be your turn if I hear you speak in your foreign tongue again." Walter who had said all he wanted to nodded, and was silent. Soon Michael and a soldier picked Walter up and carried him to the big massive bench that stood at one side of the table, and seating him there, tied his legs in a most clever fashion so that he was unable to reach the bonds he was so wedged between the bench and the table. The place must have once been some sort of store room and what furniture there was was of the heaviest sort. Henry lifted and tied in the same manner on the opposite side of the great table.

"There," said the woman Ma-tha. "Now you can see each other, and talk as long as you like." He looked at the men and laughed.

"Where are you going?" said Walter in his own tongue.

"Well," said the woman, "I don't mind telling you in the least. You couldn't do anything any how."

"Don't do it," warned Captain Penrod.

"Why not? They are safe," said the woman curtly. "Won't you bonds hold as long as necessary. You see she," she said turning to Henry. "It will be a day or two perhaps before any of your friends will find you and maybe they never will."

And when then, don't believe you will tell my plans. It will be too late. We are going to see to it that General Hanley will tighten these nice little Christian girls, and make child slaves of them. They will never see their parents or sisters and brothers again. They'll be made useful slaves you see instead of letting them grow up in idleness as they would if they stayed with you."

"We will first go to Shelby Masonville from here and if possible, I will give the smaller ones to the authorities to separate them from good. Then we will get out of this accursed country soon as we can and get away where money comes easy to us Glandelinian war refugees. What do you think of that?" she leaned close to the boys face.

"I hope God will nip your dastardly plot in the bud," the boy answered.

It was to be soon however when God imposed and God disposed. Every thing was ready. The food poisoned as Walter knew it to be, stood temptingly between them on the table. It was not an unpleasant unpalatable meal. To Henry who had not tasted solid food for two days, every thing looked very inviting. When Walter found himself shaking with excitement, all was ready. The men unbuttoned the door and the woman with a last sneering jest at the boys, picked up Angelina while Michael lifted Jennie. The child princess screamed.

"Oh Walter for God's sake don't let them take us away. Don't let them take us and separate us." She cried over and over.

"Be a good brave little girl Jennie and you sister too. We will come for you soon or get Penrod after you," said Walter swiftly as she paused for breath. The poor little girl screamed again and Michael round a thick muffle around her face. The heavy door closed with a clash. The boys heard a faint cry and then the key turned in the lock. They looked at each other.

"What does it all mean?" said Henry. He struggled furiously to at least his feet but gave up to sit staring at Walter. "What does it all mean?"

"Well for one thing," said Walter bitterly. "That food is poisoned. He proceeded to recount to Henry the strange circumstance of the whispered conversation which he had so closely overheard."

"It has saved our lives," said Henry solemnly. "I am starved and would have eaten the stuff as sure as nails. See what an escape. Let's work out of these bonds and get out of here. Perhaps we can get those cut throats before they get away to the main Glandelinian encampment."

For some moments the two boys wiggled and twisted to free themselves. It was in vain. So closely were they wedged between the benches and table, and so cleverly were their feet tied with ropes and pieces of board to wedge them that it was absolutely an impossibility to release themselves. All through the night they sat there, at intervals renewing their efforts to get free, and with despair growing in their hearts. They began to realize the seriousness of the situation when Henry's watch told them that morning had come. They found themselves looking wistfully at the food. Its scent was in their famished nostrils. Henry drew a piece of fish toward him.

"I wonder if it is all poisoned," he said.

With a cry of fright Walter reached out and swept the food from the table. "There," he exclaimed. "I found myself wondering the same thing. If we die we die but not that way. My Henry dear we will be free yet. Walter Starving does not die to day."

But Henry weakened from his hurt and laid his head down on his arms with a groan. Walter looked at him pityingly. Walter knew that for Penrod the loss of his two little sisters had crushed him. Penrod who was always the leading spirit, quick and resourceful was crushed, and as was his poor sister, and these two boys who had looked high and low for Jennie and Angelina and who had found them had lost them again. Walter did not speak. He expected the grief of his good friend. He knew that he soon would be himself again, planning for success.

In the meantime a portion of the battle had surged so fiercely and savagely in this neighborhood that it was in possession of the Christians again and for good. A little later, after the victory of the Christians, these boy scouts sauntered down the dark and twisted county lane leading to the divide. The section of the county thus captured was strange to them, the village nearby was so wrecked by the recent shell storm that the Christians troops themselves shunned it. The poor creatures that had once found lodgings in those dark holes of want and famine caused by the war had all fled at the first gunshot and the boys idled here and there in the little town looking at the marks of the shots and picking up many a queer memento of the battle. They knew that any day Depressionville would soon fall to the enemy but the spirit of the boys is the same all over in their imaginations. Even while the smoke of battle still hung over the town, they had planned other and victorious battles. They had already saved Depressionville for a wonderful golden future. As they climbed around one of them pointed to the broken plaster plastered on the ground.

"See here," he said. "A scout. Two of them have been here. There are the marks of the nails in their scout shoes."

The other boys looked, and although they saw distinctly the marks of the well known scout shoes, sold even in distant Abbeville.

"Let's follow them up," said another boy.

It was something to do and they bent to the chase like young hounds on a fresh fox trail. Rather to their disappointment the tracks did not double or disappear here and there. They led directly down the small village street. As they followed a faint cry sounded.

"What's that whisper?" said one who was a foreigner and an English boy.

The cry was repeated.

"Some one is in trouble," cried the first boy hurrying forward. The boy behind who was the English lad took a quick step, and caught him by the arm.

"Stop. He whispered. 'Don't go on. That's not a human voice at all.'"

Frozen in attitudes of astonishment, the boys stood listening with all their might.

"Pshaw," said the tall boy, Thaddeus in his rapid Abbeville manner. "That think you would cry like that—spirits. It's like you English boys," he laughed. "It might be," said the second lad doggedly. "There are spirits of course, and when souls are set free in the violence of war they say they ever return to haunt the scene of their passing."

"Well nobody has passed here," said Thaddeus. "Live or dead. Let's go on." "Wait just a minute," said the second boy. "I tell you there is evil some where about here. Glandelinians have been up to something here. I can even smell it. There is a force we must be cautious."

"The street is dark and crooked enough to hold almost anything," said Thaddeus. "I am not surprised now that my father always ordered me to keep away from streets like these leading to the river. They say many and many a poor child captured by the enemy had been bundled down these and pushed off into the river. He tells no tales that live."

The cry was repeated. It was faint, and there was a note of pain or terror in it that chilled the listeners. A very faint and far away it was too.

"I'm going back," said the English boy.

"Go," said Thaddeus scornfully. "Go and give up your Scout badge and tell the chaplains that while the little sons of Abbeville were not afraid to meet a bloody death, you are not one of them because you think that the spirits are abroad in the town. I tell you there are not such things as Ghosts."

The English boy blushed. "Come," said Thaddeus. "I know you don't mean it. There is some one in trouble. Let us find them quickly."

Following the tracks and listening every few steps for the voices the boys reached the place where Walter and Henry were imprisoned. They were nearly exhausted from the cramped positions and the long fast. They had called until their throats were parched and their voices croaked and wheezed. But as they heard the boys' families and welcome voices sound faintly through the heavy door, new energy thrilled them and they lifted their voices to the men in the room. It was answered. So close and a shout that echoed loudly in the vaulted room.

So thick and close fitting was the door that they could not make the listeners outside understand anything but the word "help" which spoken in any language is certain to bring a response. The boy outside shouted assurances which were also not understood but the sound of friendly voices put new life into Henry and Walter every moment. They tried to open the door but found it locked and baffling. Walter had them try on the door several minutes and then go away. Then it was so long they heard nothing that in despair they thought the boys had given up and abandoned them when came a great boom and shock against the door that shook it and reverberated through the vaulted room. The three boys had known where there were plenty of heavy timbers and after a walk of ten minutes they had reached the spot and picked up a piece that could act as a heavy battering ram. They came back with it, having been gone however twenty minutes and the three went to work with a will. The blow after blow fell on the heavy door with a terrific crash that echoed defiantly in the big room. The door did not yield an inch. The lock also held firm but the new casing was built in old and rusty wood, and that it self gave, and with a dusty splintering the center of the door broke through and toppled in, and the boys springing through the big hole they had made without a moment's hesitation, entered.

They hurried to the exhausted prisoners, and cut the ropes and freed them. Both boys were so numb that it was some time before the other scouts could run about feeling into the cramped legs and feet. Henry pointed to the floor where the pieces of food were scattered. Six dead rats lay near.

"You were right Walter," he said with a great shudder.

"What is it?" said the scout who was rubbing him.

"Poison," said Henry. "Mean for us." A little at a time he told the new comers the adventures of the long past hours. After the blow on the head Henry had lain senseless for so long and when he finally roused the darkness and dungeon like appearance of the room so perplexed him that he thought himself delirious. He was very dizzy, and tried to sleep feeling that if he could lose himself he would wake and find the thing only a bad dream. Even when Jennie and Angelina came and caressed him, he did not change his mind, but finally full consciousness came with all the suffering of his heart as well as the dreadful anxiety about Jennie and Angelina and the seeming hopelessness of escape. The boys all shook their heads when Walter broke in to tell how he had given up the great ruby and the Glandelinians wouldn't take it and called him a thief. They listened breathless when he told of the strange whisper that came so clearly to his ears and when they reached the account of the poison they scarcely breathed.

"You couldn't see that rats could you," Henry asked Walter.

"No," said Walter.

"Well," said Henry. "It queer to me so I thought I wouldn't say anything about it. After you threw the food off the table, I looked down and presently something slipped out of the shadow. It was the biggest rat you ever saw. Much bigger than any of those. He walked around bold as anything and I began to think what a big fellow like that could do if a person like me got down and out. Well it made me cold. Then he felt off and I think he told a lot of the others that there was a lot of good eats on the floor, and half a dozen of them came along and went after that meal and stuff. And when they ate it one by one they went staggering around for a little while as though they didn't know what ailed them, and they fell down and I never hope to see such agony. It was back of you Walter and I thought there was no use telling you. But it's all over for the rats, and for us too, and we can be glad you fellows found us. As soon as we can walk we must take this thing to headquarters. We know where to look for the girls, and they must help get word to Prince Penrod. He'll attack like hell to rescue them."

The laziest scout laughed.

"You don't know what you are talking about," he said. "You can't get help from any one. The very Christian soldiers are so fiercely active they have all they can do to take care of their fighting affairs now, and the people of this town are so scattered that it is the same as though they did not exist and all communications are cut off. As for the others the enemy—they laugh! know of one lady who lost a child—but there is no use to talk. Whatever is done we will have to do ourselves. We will go down that way if possible ourselves now we know where to look and we will by some trick kidnap the children. We are strong if it comes to a fight, we can still get them away. We ourselves will rescue the Vivian girls." He laughed and helped Henry to his feet. "We are Scouts," he said.

"It's a good thing we are," said another boy busy rubbing Walter who lay with set teeth stifling the pain of returning circulation in his tortured ankles.

"Prince Penrod is the boy who can get his sisters even if they are taken to Hanley Henry," Walter continued. "Penrod did a wonderful thing when he started the boy scout movement over here in the American city. Well I remember the day I told my people about it. They were amused. They called it one of the crazy plans of the Americans. They were afraid to have me join. They were afraid I would get into trouble with the Vivian girls. That was before Penrod was discovered to be the lost son of the American girl. Every thing is so strictly watched. But they were so glad to have me have a good chance to learn the American language that they would not quite forbid me. I thought I would never learn. Sometimes I thought I knew it well and there would

824
 "I hear you speak some words that one could not seem to translate to us and Penrod called it with one word - slang." He said he could not get along without it when he spoke American and it was and is the most difficult part of all the noble language. Yet not that I can read the American tongue I never seem to be able to find it this slang. Penrod talks in the books, and news papers. I have kept a careful list of all I hear and Penrod say and I have been teaching it to my mother and sister who was to have been present at the Imperial Court had not this war-battle come up. It would be fine for Penrod's sisters to talk this slang so they could use it in talking to each other when scouting." He stopping speaking Abbaabmanian and broke into lame and halting English "Do you get me. Is that" he asked.
 Henry y groaned, "For the love of Mike," he said, "no I don't mean that. For a Pets
 For a petes sake" he groaned again. "I don't know what I mean" he said, "put it do get you.
 Penrod won't have a chance to teach two of his sisters any more gems." He hastily sought an excuse, "You see only men and boys talk it as a general thing. Better teach the women and girls stuff out of the books. It sounds better."
 "All right" said the earnest student of the American language "put in all other things the Boy scouts are all right for my family. When the books and other things came from America I brought in by Penrod, I showed them to my father with trembling, but he approved, and now we will do all the great things, we our selves, that our poor country cannot do. We will help good dear, Emperor Vivian and rescue the good little Princesses at all cost as with god's timely help."
 "One thing I have noticed" said the first boy. "There are so many boys and girls scouts giving so much help to wounded soldiers that we cannot get help from from them. When this territory was taken again the evil be against order here and all the boys and girls in the neighborhood shall have a chance to prepare for it."
 "Geowhiz, yes," said the student of slang, solemnly "We will get em all in line."

We will leave the boy scouts puzzling over the team trembling over the tremendous problems of getting in touch with Christian headquarters and releasing some of the Christian spies while we visit magnificent home far up in the residential part of the city of Pandora, where the beautiful parks wide streets and find magnificent buildings all told of great wealth but great holiness as well. Many of the places were crowded with armed Christian soldiers of the awful battle raging, even the dazzling white marble buildings which many of these being occupied by officers and even others who also were badly wounded. On the battle field, destruction of the worst sort went with it, and fearing that the enemy might finally win the conflict and press on and finally take Pandora the unhappy and fearful owners had where ever possible secreted the most valuable of their belongings. Holy Pictures, jewels, silver firms and even rugs were hidden in secret vaults or buried in gardens or cellars. For the frightened people of Pandora so well as their fair city was threatened with abject ruin. Rich and poor faced alike for the present. At least, every one needed food and shelter. In the dining room of one of the finest places sat a group of officers. They were big black haired men and they were German in secret spies, and they talked roughly and rapidly. It was plain to see that they were quarrelling. One of them rising from the ground carved chair in which he had been lounging, kicked it from his path with a blasphemous oath and walked nervously up and down the room. At the end of the table sat another young officer who was scowling ferociously while with his subconsciously jabbed little holes in the leather covering the back of the chair opposite him. He shook his head as the man who was walking up and down neared his chair.

"I tell you Hanson, you can't do it," he said. "You can't hurry things. These Christian dogs we captured are Americans. You can't execute that old dog of an American on a bare suspicion, just if his notes are a code. We have them at all events, and we have him and we must wait until the general of us spies turns. If we kill this fellow now with all these damn boys and girls scouts hounded hounding us down every where we'll be in hot water if caught ourselves."

"That's not my idea at all," growled the other man. "This is war! I'm in command you are a captain I am a colonel my friend, and if I think I have a Christian spy no matter what his nationality is and see that it is my duty to stand this man up against a wall then what? Bang. bang. It's all over, hat can be said!"

"What is your idea exactly?" asked the man at the table. "He seems to be secretly within a city full of Christian people, soldiers and boys and girls, scouts, so what is the use of having things so it is not that it sounds like murder to me, but can't you just about that, put me together to be careful for our sakes."

I think after all the old man is perfectly harmless. He is probably just what he claims a professor of one of the Crazy Catholic American Universities. I've heard of these kind of "crazy schools."

"That's just it George," cried the other "That is one reason for suspecting him. He is too glib with his knowledge. Good night. Did you ever hear a man talk so good and so much and use such words. Though I'm a Glandelinian I can speak as good English as any man my age, but there were a do dozens of em that I had never heard of."

"Is that the real reason why you are going to shoot him as a spy Hanson?" asked George. George coming back to the main point once more.

"I don't suppose I shall shoot the old fool at all," answered Hannon grimly.
"I want to that," all but I can't do it unless I have sufficient cause no matter how I would like to remove him. He is in the way."

George stared as if he did not believe his eyes, and laid down his sabre. "Oh I see" he said, nodding slowly. "The girl. The mans twenty one year old daughter."

"Yes the girl," said Hanson. He frowned and continued to stride up and down the stairs.

"That's ridiculous of your name," he demanded, "you would get you-self into all sorts of trouble."

There is no kidnapping of young women in this campaign. The member respectfully if they're foreigners. Remember if this leaks out America will come in in on the side of Abiennia, and what nation in the world can lick her, one nation."

"I would like to marry her," said Hanson coolly. "She is so pretty and sweet."
"So are the Glandelinian girls, and you have a wife at home too," declared "That a romantic episode," sighed Hanson rolling his eyes in a sentimental of this dirty christian wrrr war I love her, I marry her whether she wills it o or not, she can save herself by marrying me. That's the only escape from the firing squad. It is wonderful."

"It is certainly so," said George, "and I am indeed. And in order to bring her to a proper idea of your goodness and charm, and to persuade her to this step you shoot her father and brother and kill her little sister do you cut little girls to pieces by the way like the rest of us Glandelinians do. I thought that Hanson scowled.

"You are close my friend" he said. "I do not shoot any one. Gladislina may destroy a spy. As for the brother he is small; I think he disappears. He little sister of brother, she is a little daughter. I would have been with them."

"Does the Glendell have any bad old confidants cause that too?" asked George.

"Does the Glandelinian Army and its confines cause that too?" asked George.

"In fact, so far as I know, if you kill her father you think she'll marry you. She would hate you, and rather die before marrying you. Americans hate us any way and would help the abolitionists at that if that President allowed them to join social and would help the Abbigannians at that if the President allowed them to join again against us, but this is not their want, but harm and do injury to an American and his family and we'll be seeing American warships steaming up to our ports and his family and we'll be seeing American warships steaming up to our port's with guns we can't resist. you are crazy just plain crazy. The man is no more a son than I am. I'll be bound. It is true we are cruel because we all hate Hanson shrugged his shoulder. He was a Nic-Hollestonian. George was an Omaha.

Quarians are not exactly bad glandelinians though they fight fiercely. Mic-Holl estimians are mermerandians and dreadful soldier y.

"You don't know the roof you speak" Hanson said. "You have not heard that American American pig talk, have you?"

"No I'll grant that," George acknowledged. "Have him brought in and let me hear him. I'm the colonel you know and got the command." "Yes, yes," said Hassan. "You need a lot help my head. But speak English to me."

"Very well" said Hanson "you word is law being my head. But speak English to him as best as you can; his Abbissennian which also is our tongue is so bad that he ought to be shot for that if for nothing else."

He turned and summoned an orderly. The two officers thought they called themselves Captain and colonel. They were really a colonel general, and a captain themselves Captain and Colonel, were really a Colonel General, and a Captain General of spies. At a nearby table two lieutenants, and other officers were busy writing. They did not speak but looked eagerly as the door opened, and the prisoners entertained. The lieutenants shifted in their big chairs and smiled at each other in anticipation. George caught their fleeting grins and so did Hanson and George turned his attention to the group standing just within the door.

"Professor Otto stood with a protecting arm around each of his children of the tallest. The little girl, six years old clung to her elder sister. He looked broken and old, and was the al of a man who has been u dely wakened from a secure and comfortable sleep to view some horre beyond conceiving.

The War, the dreadful battle of Depressionville still raging in mightier fury even though Depressionville fell, had at least become something more than a spectacle to be transferred to the pages of his book. He had been writing details on the way, and had once even been arrested by the Christian which only the "Wt Writer" of the Book of Life " can count, and as many children who died deaths too frightful to relate, where countless thousands of women's hearts broke with their anguish and despair. He found that War was on both sides - recognizes but few laws, and even fewer obligations. It seemed that his standing as a man of great learning, his claim as still a citizen of the far-off United States availed him nothing on both sides. Only when the book and other things proved to the Christian and the wife he was so fond of he was allowed his freedom. Here within the headquarters of secret espionage the rascals didn't want to extend him at all spy or no spy. Standing there a prisoner unjustly just because Hanson wanted his elder daughter, covetously, with his helpless grown children on either side, and his frightened little daughter clinging to his elder daughter's skirts, the ivy covered walls of his beloved home seemed terribly far away indeed.

It was a frightful fact a living reality in which men died by numbers

As he closed his tired eyes for an instant he could see a clear and lovely picture of the venetian green campus and the great iron gates opening on the smooth and level street shaded by lofty trees. He heard the chimes of the laughter of happy Catholic school children passing to and fro in a courtyard where all are safe from the war. There were rows and rows of beautiful peaceful homes, stately mansions and simple cottages. On level perfectly kept tennis courts he saw a lot of men and girls all in white played tennis. He saw his friends--

But opening his weary eyes, he saw a gorgeous tumbled room whose princely draperies were a torn and full of sabre cuts, a side board where police less glass had been a target for the rough play of the rougher wicked men. Before him were two hard blonde Glandelinian faces, and there he stood a prisoner, with his three children clinging to him. Captain General George stood motionless but General Hanson bowed and bowed when he saw the old man's elder daughter whose name was Elino. He was wicked and cruel as he was could not help it. The girl was so noble, so lovely and hid her fight so gallantly that he was compelled to pay her the slightest courtesy that he did.

"Captain General George tells me that this big writing book is yours Professor Otto Hanson commenced in almost perfect English.

"It surely is," said the Professor. He eyed it hurriedly and reached a hand out without thinking what he did. Hanson drew the book back.

"It has a very suspicious look," he said. "So many plans, and measurements, and specifications. Will you not explain?"

The Professor responded with a grin. He shut his mouth stubbornly.

"These are private notes," he said. "I was sent over here to make what discoveries I could along certain lines and things about Panama."

"About Panama, what did tell you George," broke in Hanson turning to his brother officer and speaking to a loud tone. "There is the whole thing. He not only spies on us but the Christians as well for his own government. He was a spy sent to make discoveries along certain lines. He confesses that, spying against both sides. The book tells us that."

"Wait, wait," begged George. "Professor Otto, do you understand that you are here facing a most serious charge."

"It's a silly trumped up charge against me," declared the Professor angrily. "Silly wicked trumped up charge. You cannot prove anything against me by that book. I absolutely will not answer your questions. Wait until you hear from me the American Consul."

"No hell with the American Consul. We won't hear from him. He can't do anything. We'd arrest him too," said George. "So you are in our hands bearing suspicious documents, and you refuse to answer our questions. Do you realize the seriousness of this affair you spied on the Christian dogs as well as us."

"I'm no spy and I do not realize anything like the seriousness of the affair," declared the Professor. "And let me tell you, I shall write this thing up in the papers when we return to America. I shall make public your personal attitude in the matter toward our legions. At the present, I demand a release and that manuscript on the table beside you. Also my note book, or before God you are a thief not a soldier." He bowed slowly and stood waiting as though he fully expected the officers to do his bidding, as indeed he did.

"Will you explain your manuscript and your notes?" asked George quietly. Hanson was nervously and angrily biting his too long moustache, (a wonder they were not too long young snakes, they were long enough) his eyes fixed on Elino's lovely face.

"No, no," cried the Professor loudly. "A thousand times no. I refuse to share with you Glandelinians the result of my researches even if it could gain me my freedom. What and have you get the credit of all my labor? There I won't do it. He clenched his hands.

"Father began Elino pleadingly. "I know that I am about to refuse to say anything, whatever happens. They think I'm a spy, learning the details of both sides. Well let them think it. That book can't bring enough evidence against me. They want to kill me and take you the dirty viper. I know it."

"You had better this this over Professor," said General George. "I'm an Officer and no one sensible, but Hanson is not. He won't have any mercy. We will leave you here alone for about half an hour. Talk it over with your children and decide if you wish to give up your precious life for the sake of these notes. Explain them to us, and we will promise you safe conduct out of the country. The two girls and boy will have to stay here for two weeks longer as guarantee of your good faith. After all we won't make her come with us, but if you lose your life, we'll force her to marry one of us to save herself as she is implicated with you. The members otherwise they will not be harmed. In case you will not do as we suggest--" George tapped his sabre and started to the door. Then he stopped and continued. "Remember the windows are barred. A good number of men guard the door. You cannot escape except you can work a miracle and go like spirits do. Don't be a fool and decide."

He looked longingly at Elino and followed Hanson from the room. The heavy door shut silently behind them but not before they had a glimpse of seven men dressed as civilians but armed with long rifles with bayonets attached. All standing at attention in the hall way while they were looking at it it opened again and Hanson entered, closing it after him.

"I may as well tell you," he said. "you and your brother son, and two daughters will be executed if you do not explain your charts and figures and leave the country. Your son shall be shot and you two, but first your elder daughter will be strangled by a rope, and your smaller one cut open alive. Before your eyes. Remember, warned you. If you prove that you are not a spy we'll escort the four of you out of the country. put in any case you know your elder daughter's name here."

"Rebels here," cried the Professor. "How is that? What do you mean?" Hanson shrugged his shoulders.

"I'm in love with her," he said coolly. "I might marry her you are very lovely." He added turning his bold cold eyes on Elino, but she darted a hand spitefully at his face and would have scratched him if he did not jump out of the way. Yet the sound she laughed. Jack sprang at him with a shrill cry. The big man caught the boy and flung him contemptuously to the floor.

"Be careful little sparrows," he said with a sneer. "A second time, will you crash both of you. I'm going now," he said turning to the Professor. "In half an hour we will come, and you will tell us which you prefer--death or safe conduct." He bowed. "Good bye for a little Miss Elino," he said and closed the door behind him. Elino threw herself on her father's shoulder and burst into sobs.

"Oh father, father, what shall we do?" she cried.

The Professor was silent then he said;

"Well my dear I actually believe that your Glandelinian general meant what he said. If I am not mistaken;

"Of course he did," sobbed Elino. "Glandelinians are dangerous."

"In that case," said the Professor very firmly. "I would as lief be dead and my whole family too as to have the work of a life time destroyed by those rascals. He hastened to the door."

He hastened to the table and took up the portfolio enclosing his book. "It's all here," he said after a glance.

"But father, what are they going to do to you, they are going to keep me here. What will I do, oh God what will I do?"

"He ran to the window and looked out. It was just as they had been told. The casements were heavily barred and there was but one door, the one through which the officers had passed. The walls were paneled half way up with old oak. The room was as solid as a dungeon. There was not a chance for escape. In a few minutes the soldiers would return and then her father from her. Oh how she prayed. He was father was speaking. He listened.

"All here," he said. "My page. That is fortunate indeed."

He looked searchingly at Elino.

"I have a plan my dear," he said. "This is a very dreadful occurrence, but on second thought a good scheme occurs to me for not to do it I will be guilty of the sin of committing suicide. I will explain some what of my notes but not enough so they can amplify them. Then with my safe conduct, I will go over to one of the head Glandelinian generals, explain the whole affair and demand your release. You will doubtless be absolutely safe here, absolutely safe. The chief of these Glandelinian officers here seemed rather a little brained youth, but the high at officer looked conservative and sane. I will place you in his charge. I'd trust an Officer Glandelinian before I would a Hic-Hollistarian. Jack is with you, and you will be perfectly safe. I'm positive."

Elino grew deathly pale. He said she would never marry a Glandelinian if he disembowled her alive. He kissed her father's cheek, then listlessly approached

The big table. A revolver forgotten by one of the officers was lying there. "Yes, I know that I will be safe," she said firmly. "I know how to use this as good as any soldier does. I'll fight for you if freedom father!" She took the weapon in her hand and looked up. As she raised her eyes she gave a sudden start. Was she seeing a beautiful little girl? No, it was she only seeing things. For she found herself looking straight into the face of a little girl, a little girl more beautiful than any she had seen anywhere in her whole life time, whose beauty she could not fathom. He stood motionless against the wall one hand out stretched as though to call her and the other. Elinor stared in unbelief in some awe and fright. In an instant before she knew positively they had been alone in the room. Here he senses leaving her - was she looking at her guardian angel in the form of a little girl. He looked at her father and brother and little sister. They too were staring speechless, and wild eyed. She did not after all imagine the graceful beautiful little figure and lovely face with its dark blue troubled face.

But surely it must be a spirit. How did it get in? Elinor was going to speak but the strange suddenly pressed a little finger on her lips in a gesture of silence, then she beckoned, and as they approached in awe, tiptoeing over the thick rug, she turned suddenly and pressed a finger on a carved rosette in the oak panel. O that great surprise, without a sound it slid open, and they found themselves in a narrow stone passage. Once more the strange little girl motioned for silence. The party could see she was armed like a Christian girl scout but not in uniform. Then she slid an iron grating across the secret door through which they had come and pressed again and something else slid in place, and turning she ran lightly down the passage without a moment's hesitation. Elinor started after her hand still clasping the revolver which she had taken from the table. The Professor clutching his recovered manuscript followed, while Jack, and little Jane brought up the rear.

As they turned a corner, a faint shout reached them. The officers had returned to an empty room. The way was long with many sharp turns. It seemed to be a space between rooms. Once or twice shouts and laughter were faintly heard, as they seemed to pass near a room full of soldiers. By the sound of their talk, though they were Abbeinnians. It was dark. The little girl ahead felt in her pocket and brought out a tiny flash light. They came finally to a steep flight of stairs. How for the first time the little girl spoke. In a cautious whisper she said: "Be careful of these steps they are steep." A dim holding the flash behind her for the guidance went swiftly and lightly down with the manner of one who is familiar with every inch of the way. The stairs were wide and shallow. There were a great many of them and they seemed to go down a long way. Elinor wondered if wondered if that part of the hillside city was built on a hillside making it a long way to the underground regions she suspected beyond below. He afterwards found out that this was correct.

A door barred with iron was at the foot of the stairs. Indeed they ended right against it. The little girl pushed the door open and when they had entered closed it behind them and dropped a more massive bar across it. They were in a large stone chamber empty save for a few scraps of furniture. Their guide swiftly crossed the room and opened another for bidding looking down the second room was like the first but was filled with vases and huge barrels. Beyond this again they entered a narrow passage so very narrow that their garments brushed the walls at either side. The stones underfoot were rough and uneven. Professor Otto walked carefully, picking his steps by the aid of the flash light. Elinor and Jack, and the little sister were also careful and still the leading little girl lit as a feather, flitted on, swift and sure footed. Once more he flashed a veiled a wall ahead. As she approached it the beautiful little girl turned and smiled. Elinor stared. There was no sign of any opening in the rough rough wall and the great stones seemed fast in the cement, but the little girl stooping, pressed a corner of one of the paving stones. To their amazement the whole wall slid from its place like a sliding door revealing another very long flight of steps. The little girl descended, and when they were all down passed another step, and the stone wall slid in place, no other flight of steps exactly like the ones they had just descended rose against the flooring, and when the little girl had led the way, they one by one stepped into a large and brightly lighted room. Professor Otto blinked, Jack, Jack turned red but Elinor gasped with surprise and little Jane looked interested and curious. It was a vast apartment of stone but the rugged walls were nearly covered with the most rare and beautiful hangings - curtains, tapestries, and strange oriental rugs and hangings by them were great big holy pictures. Numerous of other religious paintings of great beauty and value also hung about, or stood on the floor leaning against the walls. The stone floor was deep with rugs and fine furs. A number of couches wide and comfortable were set here and there and one corner of the room was hidden by a great black and gold screen. From this corner came the comforting odor of coffee. Professor Otto sniffed it with joy.

In the center of the ceiling hung a big single drop light of great power illuminating the place with almost the glare of sun light. Beneath the light stood a large table littered with all sorts of religious books, religious magazines, papers and articles of value. Beside the table in chairs sat four other extremely beautiful little girls. It looked as if the Professor's eyes would have popped out of his head as he looked at them. The eldest appeared about ten years of age and she and the others were beautiful little girls beyond all description. Jack looked scared at first at the sight of them. Their garments were very rich it is true, but they looked as if they were more holy than the holiest saint ever heard of, and the eldest was sitting listlessly leaning her head on her hand for she had been weeping. There was also such pious sorrow in the faces of the others that the Professor's kind heart was deeply touched. At her side evidently bent on comforting the little girl knelt a beautiful girl in the custom of a girl scout official. Two boy scouts in beautiful uniform stood near them behind the chairs. The little girls were not in uniform, even in that strange endless underground place, wearing anything in sight, confused though it gave evidence of immense wealth and luxury. But it wasn't theirs alone. It was their father's.

After the dark blank twisted passages and the horror so lately escaped in the room above them, the scene seemed unreal enough to be a strange pleasant dream. As they approached through the small square in the floor and stood in an awed hesitating group, the four little girls rose suddenly to their feet, while the one who was kneeling leaned forward and looked at them earnestly. Their guide the young girl, who now appeared really the eldest, pressed the spring that raised the flag stone, and as soon as she was sure that it was adjusted, she eagerly makes the wide space, and placed on a narrow round the waist of the next eldest girl. He spoke rapidly and excitedly in Abbeinnian. Elinor could catch a word occasionally. Then the other little girls advanced with a graceful gesture of welcome.

"You are indeed welcome" she said easily in English and her voice was like silver bells. "I cannot be thankful enough to our dear blessed lord that my sister's voice overheard those brutal Glandelinian spies and was able to rescue you. Come and tell me about it. But first my friends to come to the point. Did you ever hear of Professor Vivian's daughter? Yes! Well we are they! This is our refuge from Glandelinian spies."

Professor Otto bowed a low bow - the little hands extended him. Then leading the way the little girls turned to the table, where the boys drew chairs for the group. Professor Otto told his story of the arrest and imprisonment and the result of the conference in the dining room. The little girls and even the two boys shivered.

"You are safe now at least," the one who was violet assured him when the story was finished. "and we are happy to have you with us. It is a comfort to have some one with whom to share our sorrows. One has no happiness to share now," she smiled on so sadly. "I am Princess Violet, and these are my sisters and one is my cousin. These boys are James and Tim. My brother Prince Fenod is out scouting with all our regiments of boy and girl scouts for some purpose that he alone knows. One boy scout Jack Gaude is with him. We went with him yesterday but to day he remained but will be with him all day to morrow. Then several weeks and three or four days ago the enemy destroyed our two other sisters Jennie and Joyce we came here to live and lose our sorrow but we can't. They perished in a forest fire. How did you Americans get here to Pandora?"

"We were perfectly safe until the bombardment of the city of Depressville commenced," said the Professor. Then he decided to escape if possible and get to Pandora. We clothed ourselves plainly and under cover of darkness crept from the house the first night. All lights were out, it was noisy with heavy rain and thunder and lightning and we reached the common safely. We had planned to go down to the river front where we had a motor boat in which we planned to escape. But just as we turned into the live street we were met by a mob of citizens all rushing to safety. The town was under shell fire. They met us like a great wave. The force most of them had shouted to us to look out but it was too late. Elinor and I were pressed against a building. When the crowd passed we got through but the boat was gone. It took us ten days to get home. But we came also from St. James first and got through safely. Who did you say you lost?"

"Oh I can't tell it," sobbed Violet, and she hid her face in her hands and shuddered. Her sisters looked suddenly so tearful and in a moment violet looked up.

"You can imagine our agony, Professor Otto, when we found that our two sisters Jennie and Agnes were gone. They are lost forever. In those terrible Glandelinian woods and never will be seen again. They had started to come back with our journey and got to a point where in the excitement for the foul attack of the Gladiators of the night. No one matters how hard they tried could not find them until finally the large man did only the chamber and buried bodies. They can't get near those through the Pando or account of the battles. Then our Canadian Jack Evans and a number of soldiers brought us some help by a secret passage and the way happened to be in some way of value and comfort. We have plenty of light because we have our own electric light system, and this building is a powerful fireproof structure. The secret passage through which I discovered Violet brought you to the room revealed to us by General Evans and he carefully taught us the secret springs and all the turnings. I do not know why Violet or, please I mean happened to venture along the dark passage."

"I don't know either sister dear," said Joice. "I had a strange feeling that I had to go. Something seemed to demand the go."

"Did you hear the conversation?" asked Professor Otto.
"All of it," answers Joice. "I knew that something terrible was going on. I was all at first. I did not know how I could help you until I heard that damned full Gladiolus office say that he and the other man would go out for half an hour. And sister dear, he told them they could not escape because the windows were barred, and the door guarded. Then at first they pressed the spring, the panel would not open, something had started. I had fortunately an oil can with me and oiled the spring and yet it worked and so I had to go back."

"A moment later would have been too late," said the Professor shaking his head. "This room is absolutely safe," said Princess Violet. "There are seven or eight of the chambers about fifty feet from the house, under the garden, so compose yourselves and rest. I and my sisters cannot leave yet. Half the city and the whole Christian community is searching for my two sisters to bring in their bodies—we can do nothing but sit here in agony and pray for their bodies to be brought here. I know they are dead, the news papers said so." She bent her head and sobbed. Her sisters looked nervous.

"He did your two sisters a terrible thing," said Elinor.

"If the girls—Hic hollister—woods—Violet sobbed.
"I do not doubt that your two sisters are safe, Princess. I heard you and all your sisters are angel possessed. No one could deliberately harm or molest you two sisters and they could not have perished."

"Oh please please Violet don't talk as if they were dead," cried Joice. "They were caught in the forest fire in the woods. Violet dead—no." Professor Otto cleared his throat and secretly wiped his eyes. Jack himself turned his back to them to hide his tears.

"What part of the forest did they perish in?" asked Elinor.

"Violet again, continued, told me herself.
"In the forest between James St James and St Charles. They were and their names were Jennie and Argeline—"

"They had no chance to continue;
"Princess and Princess Jennie and little Evangeline Vivian," cried Professor Otto and Elinor and Jack again and again. "Princess Jennie and Evangeline Vivian?"

To the amazement and surprise of Violet and her four sisters, Elinor reached inside her blouse and pulled out a small gold chain hung with a splendid large golden Mithraic medal and Crucifix attached.

"Did this belong to Princess Jennie or Argeline?" she cried.

The little princesses took one look, then suddenly came forward together, Joice seizing Elinor by the arm.

"It belonged to Evangeline yes yes," she cried chokingly. "Tell me oh please tell me where is she and Argeline. Oh please please please please do. Have you seen my sisters Jennie and Argeline. Tell me, tell me. Oh please do."

"Elinor said the thing quickest.

"They've been captured by General Hirsdale a cavalry and are being taken to Manley's army as soon as they can be gotten there. Unless something is done they'll never be free."

Joice looked surprised partly relieved but for a moment looked as if she was going to faint.

"Oh please please tell us the truth," begged Violet looking so pleadingly at her. "Are you sure you are not mistaken. The news papers say they are dead. How can it be possible?"

"Tell me not sure at that," said Elinor encouragingly almost discouragingly.

"Father befriended two little girls recently within the fox lines who were in charge of some old wicked hag. I don't want to alarm you little princesses but those two were more beautiful little girls than any of you here. You claim that beautiful medal and crucifix is Argeline's and yet you are afraid I might be mistaken. I can prove to you little girls in a minute. Have you got any pictures of the two lost sisters?"

"Yes yes," said Violet, and she went to a dresser and drew from a drawer took out two small photographs and handed them to Elinor. He looked them over quickly and then said;

"Father didn't they the ones and she handed the photographs to the Professor. He looked them over and nodded.

"Yes they absolutely are," he said. "They were with an old Hag by the name of Manley. That old hag had wanted to separate the two girls, one to the town of what the name was, forgot and the other to Manley, but General Hirsdale told the old woman to mind her own business. The little girl called Evangeline gave the medal to me and asked me if I ever saw Penrod. You probably brought it to tell him she was a for she said she was positive he could get him and he sat in his possession. They told me they were rescued from the woods how they went through a forest fire without being burned. I promised her and her sister I could notify Penrod on the first occasion and could have but those confounded spies caught mail came to Pando and could not find Penrod Penrod."

"Oh he will get them, he will I know. It is impossible for him," said Violet almost crying for fear from relief. "Oh if he could only come back himself but he was out scouting."

"Thank God we are so relieved," said Joice. "Oh what will Penrod say then to day. We have secured one who found our sisters," and she burst into tears of gratitude. Her eyes and those of her sisters were still very red, rimmed with the tears of days and nights and sipping of weeping, having remained almost incessantly kept vigil beside the open windows of their other homes—waiting—hoping; listening for word, of their two little sisters whom they hoped were not really dead. To others some may have thought that Violet and her sisters would have been shocked by that fact, but by hearing they were prisoners within the fox lines. Yes they could have been had they not known Penrod. They knew Penrod, and knew that he could do, but oh, they were disappointed in the least that a frightful massacre he would commit to escape his two sisters."

"Oh you four are a blessing to us," cried little Daisy herself. "When our brother comes back next time we can set them to hunting up our dear sisters and we will soon be reunited."

Joice clapped her hands softly and James approached.

"Purchasing James dear," she said, and the Professor watched with pleasure with which the princess was obeyed, though he was surprised to at first see James place his arm around her and kiss her on the cheek, and she smiled back.

Soon they were eating a delicious and much needed meal. The little princesses themselves were so strengthened by the tonic of hope and a relief and joy that for the first time since Jennie and Argeline were lost they were enabled to enjoy the delicate food. The little girls could not hear enough about their two sisters and at every sound declared that some of the child scouts must be returning, although both James and Tim constantly reminded the little girls that they were unlikely to return before dark. The afternoon wore on, Professor Otto and Elinor glad to rest after the recent shocks and Jack playing games with Argeline's Auntie, while Joice walked restlessly about the vast chamber constantly looking at her watch, while her sisters looked with longing at a certain part of the wall. Finally Joice said joyfully;

"It must be getting dark now. The boy and girl scout captains and other scouts will soon return and when Penrod comes I know when he hears that the news he will leave for the Gladiolus camps to do something something he thinks best to get out to sisters. Oh how can we be so thankful enough to you for your kindness to them?"

Professor Otto smiled.

"Considering the fact that Princess Joice has saved all our lives," he said. "I think you need feel no obligations to us. We are delighted to meetly entertain you two sisters. If we could have we would have made any with them but we were closely watched, though the Gladiolus did not molest us being for Argeline and as we had no weapons on us. Your two sisters were a positive that he will save them from reaching Manley's lines, so you really need not worry. I do not."

Elinor suppressed a smile. He was quite sure he father did not worry hearing so much about the girls of Penrod and Joice said;

"It is not hopeless war if they would be taken to the army under Manley where rescue seems impossible. Oh if Penrod would only come."

Suddenly a silver knob fastened to the wall dropped from its place, and swung back and forth on a thin chain.

"They have come," cried Princess Joice. She rushed across the room and as James drew aside one of the heavy hangings she pressed with all her might on a rough spot in the granite wall. As in the case of the floor, the wall itself parted and slowly swung open. In the dark opening stood one of the boy and girl scouts expected but a slight figure showed the situation of the building in plain. Wall on one of the sides occupied Captain Haxell. It was there that he still saw a hole in the building, fixed that part of the house as a rifle could not be aimed. He indicated the location of the building in plain. He then said, "The situation is like a rifle. The human being could not live in it. It put they did not find the hole. They could not see a hole in the building in the way. They don't believe it though," he added. "That was the end," he said.

633

"Have a 'n another" said Volienko clutched Ivan Henry and sunk into the chair. He was shaking.

"O, my god it's all over I've done it" he whispered. "They have killed them. Oh my God of such awful luck. How I did hate to be an enemy of those dear little girls. God's vengeance through human nature is terrible to the enemies. They have killed them. I can feel that protection is coming at once and stronger to the Princesses every day. Wait till I see Penrod. Won't there be a fray to get his sister back. Despite the common belief God even knows they can never reach

"Anley is a very kind, gentle and intelligent man. He said, 'I'll tell Penrod and I will.' He said, 'You might be mistaken' said Henry fearfully. 'But I don't know for a sure. But one thing is sure, if we could not rescue them, before we can't run. The little princesses are like the water. Vultures or birds that are there we can never help them any more, but Penrod himself can do almost anything. It seems to me the only thing to do is to try it as they say to me Penrod is famous inside the city and cannot be found. We must go back to Depressionville and find Emma and Angelina. That woman is a wicked sister who also is a GI or Glendishman and if we can only do it, we must go to be Depressionville. We may encounter Glendishman there if we do. We'll disguise and find the little girls. We'll invoke God to scramble the wheels to help us."

"Yes that is the only thing to do," said Walter. "I'm glad poor Fred and his other relatives keep themselves busy at something so if they let themselves think about poor Jenn and Arrelene they will go mad. We will go back to Depressionville."

"Now we spent our last cent on the train we happened to take here."

"We will have to walk" replied Walton.

"Well I hope we can get a lift some way or other and that ought to be easy from our own side as there is so much charity here," said Henry. "At any rate we must do our best for the two little girls and then if we fail we cannot say we have not tried any thing. We can at least do something at any cost to prevent those wicked women carrying out their plans. I know every step of Depressionsville, and I know every step of this part of Pandora. I used to play all the time in this park before the war."

He led the way rapidly through the beautiful grounds, and entered a grove of noble trees. They went on and through the shadows until they reached the open fields. Beside the high way a great pile of hay lay scattered.

"We might sleep here for the rest of the night," Ivan Henry suggested. "No, no safer to travel by night," said Walter, and the two forerunners continued onward. They now proceeded in silence, each busily thinking. Walter always wondered how Peter and his rescuing sisters could bear up and take the blows struck to them so manfully, and at a loss to know what to say of the brave boy and his friends who had lost all held dear in so terrible a manner, and when discovered, Ivan and he cannot even rescue the little girls.

The road was level and they went rapidly. As they rounded a sharp turn, they saw a party of horse men and horses ahead of them. The best horse was a bay mare and stood at the side of the road. There was some trouble on for one had raised the foot of a horse, and the others were bending over it.

"One of their shoes has lost a shoe," exclaimed Walter and who ever they are they appear to be a party of the Gamin headed for Depressionville. Let's see if they will give us a lift."

He boldly approached the men, who started, then looked relieved to see that it was a couple of boys scouts.

"What's the trouble?" said Walter in his own loud tongue. The man stammered, and threw his hands up in a gesture of despair.

"All the trouble in the world," he exclaimed "The horse has cast a shoe, I cannot mend it, and there's no blacksmith open at this time of night. I

"I am not a blacksmith but we can ride horses good, and my master told me to bring these horses to him. I don't know what to do. Of course as soon as it comes light we cannot do any traveling as we must do it by night."

"I can fix a cant shoe" said Waits "I know all about it, but we too are going to Depressionville and we cannot afford to wait. It's a long way four hours by 4 r e in , to ain, six b. ho rae back. Give us a lift and I'll fix the shoe."

"Good," said the man. "We are going first to Depressville too, to hunt the two lost princesses which were rumored are within that city as prisoners. There are two extra houses here. Only be quick and mend the shoe. Our lives may depend on it."

Valte turned his flashlight on and asked Henry to hold the beam on the

He was alone and went to work picking up the right size of nails. He found only five in the lumbered place. He had always prided himself on his swiftness in working out the problem, and when he saw the loose shoe he had it fixed in no time, having worked in desperate haste, and Ivan Henry helped him with equal desperation in holding up the horse's leg. The men watched or restlessly walked up and down the road talking in undertones to each other. It was evident that their knowledge of fixed horse shoes was slight and they were forced to trust to the young stranger if they were to proceed at all on their perilous journey. When the horse shoe was tightly in place, White threw away the brick he had used for a hammer, and they were given the two spare horses to ride. The man who had spoken took the leading horse and his companion the other. It was soon evident that there was something wrong. They thought they heard pattering as soon as they had left the city of Pando.

"Good heavens Henry," exclaimed Walter after a few miles of this, and sounding of shots far behind. "We must be pursued, do you suppose? Landolinian spies are onto our plans."

"What's the matter?" he asked. "Are we pursued?"

"I don't know but it sounds like it" said the man. "In truth I have never been out any where that some body didn't try to catch us. I've a hard pressed I suppose you'll be able to reach Danversville by our safe route."

He urged his horse forward a little faster. The horse Walter rode reared up and so suddenly that Walter was nearly thrown off the saddle and some of the other horses stopped with a suddenness that almost threw the others over their heads.

"all right you birds," they heard a voice say. "We are all out. Remember this is war. Hoot to kill, and give no quarter to these two boys mainly before they guess what's up. There's ten of those men. You have your derelict go before they descend on that river area again what the-----"

From seemingly nowhere a little ragged girl had suddenly appeared in the crowd with the word - "Oh..." and then she started to run as fast as she could.

"Stop him," cried the leader of the assassins.

"We'll warn em" yelled a third third "don't let her get away, an" and they suddenly fired with their rifles and all the shots struck the poor little girl and killed opened fire with their rifles and all the shots were aimed at the kill, no hesitations. One of the members of the Gemini were also hit but the confusion caused by the appearance of the unfortunate unfortunate child gave the Gemini time, and those who survived blazed away with their rifles, hitting down six of the pirates at once. The five pirates who also survived opened fire with more vigor but the Gemini had gotten some distance off by this time. Walter brought down the leaders and two others.

"quick" follow those christian dogs with the two brats" cried another of the gales not so terrified by the loss of the numbers. "They musn't reach pop' ann

but now to put distance between them was impossible, and so the remaining spies licking up the wounded and leaving the dead went off to the point of the

They made good time the fogitives being compelled to leave their fallen comrades behind for their mission was very important especially when they had been killed any way. They soon came within sight of Depressionville with all its tragedy and wretchedness sooner than they expected. Walts had scarcely slept for and strange. As they went on and on, Henry commenced to wonder if he could possibly make the distant city now in the hands of the foe. At intervals at range color red light flashed before his eyes and faint booming noises sounded in his ears. They

It's a specific conflict only to me or new or the me now, lay dead. Finally a faint

"I see the town but how far to that confounded Depressionville?" Henry called.

"Quite a distance yet," said the man, sitting at his side. "It is a long one, when it looks like."

"Where are you going when you get to the city?" he inquired.

"If we can not find the Prince's two sisters, it will be possible to find the Prince's two sisters."

"It grew brighter and was quite light when they entered the streets.

Fortunately because of the interference and having been placed in the car, he was able to escape. He was stopped, and with the guidance of the man beside him Henry was taken up before the car was driven away. The man beside him was taken away with him. The man who was with him was taken away with him.

and the men and Walter jumped down glad to stretch themselves. Henry made no offered to move. The others, after sampling the offering, refused to touch it.

His hand still held the knife as he lay partly on the horse's neck unconscious. They carried him into the great hall and a nurse in uniform directed them to an empty cot and hurried after a doctor. He pronounced it simply a bad case of exhaustion and gave orders which the nurse rapidly filled, mentioning the others to leave as she did so. All were Glandelinians however but to those of their own side, and those they thought of that side they did administer a dose of mercy. But they knew Henry was an Abbelesman they'd have killed him. The servants turned to Walter and thanked him for his assistance. For a moment Walter thought it would be a good plan to try and find a means to send a secret message to the Vivian girl Princesses and tell them he was in Depressionville looking for Jennie and Argeline. Then he decided that the presence of a stranger boy in the city telegraphing to unknown parties would bring suspicion on him so he merely nodded turned back to tell the nurse that he could not return shortly, and then in his gray uniform as a Glandelinian boy scout captain he walked listlessly down the street into the heart of the ruined town. Army wagons were driven here and there and a company of turme-hanrian soldiers passed at double quick. Walter wondered where they were going. He wondered too what possible chance he had to get something to eat. There seemed to be no Glandelinian boy scouts in Depressionville. Then too Walter thought of Henry with a gasp that he could not have put in words. Walter and Henry in fact had taught him so many things. With boy scout principles and boy scout training he had charged from a helpless young man to a helpful well balanced fighting boy perfectly capable of taking care of himself and of assisting others as well. Walter felt the change, for he was so reliant on strength. A few years or more ago he would have stood helplessly in this present situation, conscious only that he was a plain Abbelesman boy who would be a "damned boy and looked after now as he faced the morning light, hurrying dressed as a Glandelinian boy scout, and only with a piece of account Glandelinian pennies in his pocket, he smiled at fate and went on without fear to enter whatever adventure might come. The only thing that worried him was the want of enough money to buy himself a bit of bread and a needed fish. He reflected that he could easily have aided for his supply of wants but that would be a risk. But he could not turn back. Head of him an old Glandelinian soldier with a heavily laden provision wagon was having trouble with a skittish horse. In vain he pulled on the lines, and cursed and swore in volumes. In vain he threatened and coaxed. The young creature would not stand and while the old man worried with it, a wagon of green vegetables and long sticks of black bread were slyly stolen out of the end of his cart. Walter approached.

"Let me hold the horse Ma," he said taking it by the bridle as he spoke. The old man threw his hands up in a gesture of thankfulness.

"Thank you my son," he cried. "These thieves will ruin me while I speak with that crazy foolish animal. Hold fast my son, and I will give you your breakfast."

Walter nodded, and the old man turned eagerly to his customer. Presently he reached over and told Walter that he needed not bother about the horse any more and handed Walter a generous piece of black bread and some fresh fruit, got up on the wagon seat and drove on. As Walter idly watched the farmer pass, he noted that with the passing time, the street had become crowded. People and soldiers moved in the crowd all apparently Glandelinians, and then as the crowd before him happened to part Walter noticed in the distance a big ugly looking woman hurry by. She had a big basket on her arm filled with provisions. A solitary little girl clung to her other hand or it seemed it was held tightly by the woman. The poor little girl was ragged, ragged dirty and pale but Walter recognized poor little Evergeline. At once he dashed toward them, but the crowd had had closed, and he was too late. The woman seemed to have swallowed them like a pound on the trail, he searched the district over and over but not a trace could be found of the wicked woman or child. In his surprise at seeing Argeline he had failed to take particular notice of the woman, but as he thought of it he felt that it was not the one he had seen in the outskirts of Depressionville and he remembered that that woman had spoken of having a sister somewhere. Feeling that there was nothing to be gained by remaining longer in the territory, Walter hurried back to the headquarters, where he found Henry much better, and fretting because he was not allowed to get up.

"Well, bad luck worse than even," said Walter as soon as he entered the place where Henry was.

"What's the trouble?"

"They have separated the Vivian girls. I saw Argeline, put out Jennie."

Henry sat up, his eyes bulging under wide bandages.

"Have you found her?" he cried. "The girl is she?"

"Well I lost her in the crowd," said Walter and told the whole story.

Henry lay listless, carelessly.

"Well as long as we know she is here in the same town, we will find her."

"In time we will find her," said Walter, "and there won't be any slip the next time."

His face then clouded. "But Walter," he said quickly, "I can't bear to think of poor Prince Penrod and of his poor sister at Lone Mountain. I feel as if I was in his place myself." He closed his lips and shut his eyes in a desperate effort to control his grief for them. Henry got up and crossed a closed door and he knew indeed how far away in Pandora Violet and her sister no doubt were still crying their hearts out for the two lost sisters. Little did they dream that only in a few days more they really would be reunited.

When poor little Argeline and Jennie Vivian, found themselves dragged forcibly from Walter's strong arm and his companion and away from the comparative safety of the big underground room where Walter and Henry had so mysteriously appeared, as they thought, to get her and her sister back to Pandora which indeed they did, the childish heart's for some reason or other for the first time in their lives were filled with a terror so overwhelming that they did not know what they did. Notwithstanding the efforts of the big woman who held them, Argeline for the time was some what more docile but Jennie always a little "pitiful" spite fire against the wicked, screamed and scratched at the woman as she held her as she could and stiffened in the woman's brutal grasp until she was obliged to put her down. Jennie then tried to run but she was too tightly held. Then with a muttered rush of comments, the wicked woman raised blows on the poor little shoulders and body until the child sank to the ground nearly stunned from the force of the blows. Her cries died, and she lay gasping. On the poor fool of a woman, little she did she think that sooner than even expected Jennie and Argeline would be with her sisters once more and she and her wicked sister facing a frightful fiery death at the stake, rather than be hit with the little girl's wouldn't even prove her statement that Colonel Hunsdale kidnapped them and not she. "How will you be silent?" demanded the fury shaking her wildly. "The reader may wonder why the possession angel didn't strike back, why should he. The woman would get hers shortly and he knew it." "You just try that again you little blundering plunk brat" and other words that a modest woman would blush at to read. "Just try it and see what will do to you," Argeline managed to get her finger nails into the woman's face and scratched her badly or ying. "If you are ever captured I won't defend you if I'm to be questioned about you you cruel old wicked witch."

She then overwhelmed Argeline with terrible threats but that didn't scare her though poor Jennie was silenced and shook as though in a chill. "Now the both of you had better do as I tell you," the woman said. "You and your rotten sister will never see your brother and sister's nor parents again, never even know and you will have to live with me and do as I say and I'll be sure you'll commit too. I won't live a hard life all my life and suffer, and not see little brats like you get away without suffering. I'll choke you both next time."

The wicked poor Jennie to her feet and dragged her down the street after the two men who had gone on one of them now carrying Argeline. She was still muttering when she reached them.

"Both of them have got to be thrashed my way as wicked as it is," she said savagely. "And I might as well begin it right off."

Michael the soldier's husband shrugged his shoulders.

"Why don't you try and show a little mercy for mercy at the first?"

"Martha!" He inquired carelessly. "It doesn't matter to me but tell you Martha they're the sisters of that dangerous rattle snake Penrod and if it happens we get captured with them which is most likely we'll sure get our share, and I also tell you Martha you will spoil her for everything if you handle her and her sister too too roughly. I'm beginning to be afraid too as they are possessed with angels, and they'll outwit us so outwit us sooner or later. They may either cause them to die or be rescued if we act maliciously. I've seen her sort before. I'm afraid you have brought a curse on us all by beating them."

"Then let them die," said the woman. "I'll even kill them. Good riddance it will be if they do not take kindly to my tasks. They'll get worse than child abuse by with me I'll tell you and I'll make them sin too."

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Michael. "I'll bet you all the money I've got you cannot make them sin so much as what you do, but suit yourself, but take my advice and give her a little time and her sister too."

"Time," said Martha scornfully. "Time, ha, ha. Are you crazy? What are you thinking of? There is no time. They have lost too many years as it is, you don't seem to remember Michael that I am as good a pickpocket as the others in among all you Glandelinians, even though I'm an old foreigner as you call us. Both of these children are almost too old to begin to learn the art even though they look about eight, and have such fine, delicate little features. But you know they are clumsy after they reach five, so you remember the other yellows had

"Yes indeed" said Hattatha. "Michael heartily." "And the other day-- the other day--"

"Read read" said Martha scornfully. "That's another mistake. What in the world should you be like now, and I'd like to know, what in the world should I be like now?"

read anything about those christian dogs, you never know what the reading may contain. Better not know what you don't know won't hurt you."

"You are deathly wrong," said Michael stubbornly. "Often what you don't know does hurt you terribly. If I could be born and live again, I'm sure, I would be a much better man. When I was a little boy there was no learning to be had, except for the upper classes and those confounded no account priests and nuns. New York was too old and it is too late you can learn every thing. I have loitered around the schools and listened to the boys and girls talking their lessons over. It is amazing what they know, why they know every thing in fact they know so damn much to be good for them, and there are in many countries schools where they are sent to work at all trades. I took a job cleaning floors once so that I might go in and see what it was they did. And the those boys and girls too--(they were quite a little ones too) made such beautiful things--furniture and all that. There was one little table that you could set on your hand. It was as perfect as though it was big enough for you. I thought that I would steal it. Then I thought that it was too much for the child who made it, and how sad the fellow would be who made it. The janitor told me there were prizes for the best work men, and I knew, felt sure that that table was the best of them all," he said with the conviction and did not take it. I never wanted any thing more in my life."

"Gilly," said Martha, "Always bothering you - I heard about some case like that - well, you would stop it. As for those personally children, ask your Michael if he wants to go to business. We are no longer young, so may yet get killed in battle and I left without a husband. We have to find a place for the time when we can no longer do anything work as we have. My fingers even now are beginning to grow old, growing too clumsy to switch papers, who will do the work for us if we do not train these children to replace them their own count - yeh! I can make them so afraid of me they'll do any thing."

"I suppose you can, and maybe not," said Michael a bit listlessly, "but it does seem a pity you ought to have seen that table."

"I've heard about it enough at any rate," said Mr. Hahn. "You should have taken it. You could have sold it for a few dollars."

"You could've taken it," said Michael.

"All right," said Wartha. "This is another matter, these children. If they are possessed of angels, why did you bring them to me. If you think I can't train them, then take them back, and give them back to my master, Colonel Lansdale to take care of them himself. I hate angels and don't want them around. You hear what I said. Take them back."

"Can't " said Michael. "His Hinesdale says it s your duty to train them or you'll suffer the consequences. He don't care even how you kill them if you go deal re."

"Well then here is my plan. We will go to Dnp.-seasonville and there we will stay for the next month or two. This battle in this territory cannot last all day and when it is over last, my then we will set like out into the world. Now I tell you I know not these kind. These both will be enemies boyed measure when they are a few years older even though as they are angel possessed children never grow but remain children for all eternity. But I have a plan "he laughed as he dragged Jennie along. "I tell you, did I have counted these people from Olagat. I should Hunsdale."

"No doubt no doubt," Michael answered. "I'm afraid, I'm afraid. They say there is nothing that Penrod, their brother, cannot do, and no matter where we are if he get a wind of it, will get them and us too. And then we'll be in it."

He could not but look with pity on the two little girls, now as they were a orphaned child whose life had also been as evil like the rest of them but some who but some who as in him was a spark of kindness and tenderness. He fought against the Christian soldiers, he drank, he stole, he murdered, but the spirit of the two poor little girls dragged miserably along with the wicked - a poor selfish life of his home had touched his heart, and he inwardly cursed his shield for making him give the child was over to his cruel officials knew that he would often be them and he could not give them their first lessons in picking pockets - if they were not to be like the other children he knew that he could not Like the virgin of L. B. L., they'd not to it with the face of the most and death of the world if possible where it could shield them from the evil and pain of the woman. She'd once a good woman and so had her sister, but when she was young, her only child had died on her despite her prayers for it to live. She had wept and prayed for it so she would not have to live. Her and life and God had not seen it. His will to grant her petitions and there she to as she could to get even with Him. She became the woman she was. So it was with of pity for the weary little feet that he asked;

"I Tired" according to the "You are never tired a big strong soldier like you. You are bluffing like you always do. You have too much pity on the poor brat. However we will eat some supper and then on to Depressionville."

"Well, what do you think we are?" asked the other two soldiers, who had not spoken before."

"I didn't say anything about walking there," said the woman scornfully. "That'll give these brutes a chance to escape me or get around. I have a pocketful of money. So you don't she need any one of the men come close to her. Here's a handy can I've got if you try that some thing to get me to get out of here as fast as I can. And it will take me time to walk with these burdens."

"I would not spend this money on the rail-road if I could help myself when it is necessary. But we got to watch out for all these accursed christianity patrol too. If I am caught with these little bars in my possession, I know my fate." He turned into a doorway. The house was deserted.

"Here," she said. "I will stay here with these two, while you get something to drink. Also go to the railroad and see if any trains are running. And for the love of Mike Murphy."

Michael hurriedly pushed the children away from the front furthest from the door, drew a harpoon to cover them, and settled himself to wait at the door, while the three men walked leisurely out of the house and away. An hour later, Michael hurried back. Martha greeted him sourly.
"Don't pretend to be a lazy one," she scolded. "I know where you have been, and you bring what I asked."

"I bring deeper and shocking news," said Abdul Haq, looking at

"Eah that is dry drinkin' you rambakull" said Ma'ha making a face. "We'll have

"There are three about of the two girls is known by the christian name 'tho' I sur' tho' d'ies; and there is a deeper o'ts diligent search of for these 'v's.
 said Michael, 'some man a Professor; by the name of O'ts something r'v'us away.
 If they with these two with us they'll be draw his hand across his back with the whistling sound of a knife. 'They'll turn us at the stake as well be charged with kidnapping two of the P. incenses. We'd better give them up or let them from findin' us and them."

"Who are they really then? Are they absolutely the princes?" asked Martha in astonishment.

"Ah, ah," exclaimed "Ar-thu," "so tender-tho' hands are so delicate-smell and beautiful. Well we have got to go on with it now. We got to get to Dep. Gen. Renville where the christian dogs can't get us, and quickly too. Now will we get out of here? Shall we trust the cars? Do they run? Now - Michael. What'd you find out?

"A lot of things" said Michael. "In this place no trains nor street cars are running; all this territory is in possession of the Christians, also stations are catch-d. We must go down to Depressionville to see how but some other and a great empty city at night. They are going for more munitions. It belongs to the christian enemy which was captured, but thanks to my 'landolinian' soldiers they are not going to let them take it. I told them this. I told them about my life, and two beautiful little children she was going to walk through the perilous swampy country to Pop and Delville. It was great luck. They said we could add them. They want change for it."

"And teach me with the brains here!" asked Martha furiously.

"Thank God," said Martha, "not to be a step ahead of him. I'd have been a fool to get into one of those 'out there' things. I never knew any one had any in this country."

"You are to go down now, and they will come soon. But they don't want the disadmission office to know they are taking you. It is only because of my disadmission office vice my," he laughed. "Well get up and we'll go over."

... and won't give either to me or to the child, an opportunity to be able to...

"A good plan," said the man. When they had finished with the work of the woman walked slowly down the porch, the little girl with her four clanking tin soldiers, bigger when she was younger. They were able to recognize the man when she met them, although they were not happy, plans however they gave, and saw her proudly. The man, of course, had the black deck game and given.

"We will have to exchange this stuff for a few large coins somehow," she said. "But we can do easily at the rail road station if we go there." The day had been a time of the two children because they wouldn't do anything that the crowd wanted to make them do. Jamie was so tired after her work that she thought that she would fall at each step, but the policemen had held a hand and pulled her up and she came with Ageline, whose hand was bloody and in a bandage. The policeman did not mind that, but she was afraid of the police with their color and their faces looked very different from the two of them and they were sure that when they fell from exhaustion that the crowd would probably kill them for being hysterical. Then she would be stricken for the reason they would not like. There was a great crowd at the station and dozens of officers. There were many more coins in the sack before long and just as Ageline knew that she was alone and she thought that now at last she could fail, the woman set the children on a big box, placed Michael to read to them and with the most visible threats to the care of them if they stirred or spoke to any one walked off to the ticket office to change the small coins into soft quarters for her to handle.

After this the women decided to go with her sister under a strong escort of cavalry to Hanley's lines, and the next day they were on their way with a toilet and her sister riding on her horse, and were in a strange sight. Around the necks of Jennie and Appelle were two smaller like like a collar attached and lightened with a four chain, held by the arms of some of the women. The cavalry was twelve thousand five hundred strong and-----

"Why didn't you let me come out with you today on this extremely exciting tour of the desert?" asked Angelina Antonucci, as she moved toward the couch by side. "Ben had had a bad day."

Penrod slowly approached and said "They are a few miserable and depressed over the loss of Jennie and Argentin. The old hunkly. They are afraid that they will never see them again. Oh it's killing. To see the way they look and---- he stopped suddenly because at some distance about half a mile, appeared a large column of clouds in the canopy. Evidently they to his astonishment appeared to be headed by two old ladies, and they had two scared babies in like little girls in their possession. Penrod looked intently and then did not pay any attention as the army came no longer within his suspicious. The canopy did not noticed anything but the children did. They put things were a Jennie and Argentin. Oh how they loved a boat fast at that array on the hilltop half a mile away. Penrod gave them a casual glance and Argentin a doubtful nod. "No, you think we should attack them and give them a fight. We are of even odds with them, them."

"I'm in no mood to quarrel like that," he said sadly. "I have to cut another couple of weeks from those islandella and sendy those are. They look like nice holottariums. I never saw them here before."

"I cannot tell," said Penelope broadly. "I haven't got made into one of them but what suppose I am like those two old hags with them and two children. Probably the children suppose not just because usually I'm going to take a look with my field glass."

He took a long look at the scene and as he looked a cry came to him on the instant, full of plaintive and most heart-rending, the like of which he never heard before and immediately recognized. It brought tears to the eyes of every one of the child scouts who heard it, and a feeling of horror, such as never

"Peenod, Peenod, Peenod, Oh Peenod," how that cry played the almost tones from Jamie who had tried to reach out him in the small column up the wall. At the cry she felt a terrible flow a loss - the face a disorientation of ice had stuck her across the face with a snare but the first end of the other was nothing. The group of accusahad disappeared to the sound of the little girl. They after all had not been seen a shock. Oh yes! Poor Jamie might as well have accused her self the unnecessary man to cry out. For if Peenod didn't recognize her and Angeline through the field glasses he must have had bad eyes trouble then.

He got his put their army, then to read to Angelina A. on the "Back was to the column."
The order was obeyed and as soon as they were below Penrod without realizing why they quickly changed orders to his office as you
"You Angelina take your column of force along the route and go by the east, my I'll take mine over the brow of the hill toward you. Mary's group take by the east, and GIVE NO QUARTER" but takes those high prisoners will fill them.
Carey's attack into the island from announcement and destruction by all before a you.
You'll see the reason, give the command that you think forward."
The order was obeyed for all the about were eager to give the order to the army which was expected.

"You little brat" growled the officer in charge. "Get up out of here. What do you mean?"

"I won't," said the girl, answered Jennie.

"I won't make you because I know the folly of it, put wait until you reach Hankley camp. Giving this woman guardian of you Martha and this trouble and your sister's rebelling; here because she liked you'll fix you."

"Who is this person she said so loudly calling for?" asked one of the other officers, and he asked the question he couldn't help. A sudden chill of fear in his heart for the name sounded suspicious to him."

"He is said to be that upland brother," said the woman who had struck Jennie such a cruel blow in the face with the flat of his sword. "A little about thought he must be mean."

"If he is we had better look out," said the other officers. "I've heard he is dangerous, and there is nothing he could do or could not do. If he heard that any good night."

"As he didn't say where a round, that could he do if he was. He couldn't go up and take his blasted sister from us. We'd have him too. You are afraid of the prince but for nothing. All the rumors of him I believe are a finesse, you see him come coming after she called for him. No, if he heard he must be afraid and will only go back to the christian lines to get help. When he get a help it will be too late."

The whole column was still continuing, continuing slowly. Now, however knowing that he was wrong, they do, they knew the officer was sadly mistaken. They knew Penrod would probably secretly follow and do his Adelsdorf stunt. Jennie hoped he would follow on how inwardly she prayed that if it was God's Holy Will she and her sister would be free and be able to return to her sorrowing state. She was almost weeping as she continued her prayer when she was startled and so were all the rest by a moving cloud of dust coming swiftly forward over a dusty lane. The glandellians at first thought it was the wind doing it until it reached a margin of wet soggy ground. Then the dust cleared and to the horror of the glandellians, and the astonishment of the two little girls who couldn't hardly believe their eyes, and though they were dreaming, came thundering forward a wave of girls on horse back flying on little girls' scouts, and suddenly they were yelling, shrieking and screaming for all they were worth, while from another direction there came dealing forward in oblique fashion another column of girls and boys, the dreaded purpleoughs and vivantes. Before good looking boys and girls that face row were horribly contorted with wild savage fury. The glandellians were appalled. They were taken aback by surprise that it seemed a mistake was involved. In their fright and terror the two women screamed. The glandellian leader shouted to his followers to stop and retreat and though they started to obey the command it was too late. In a rage the officer who had struck Jennie across the face made for the little girls with an iron drawn with the purpose to cut them down and prevent their being rescued, but Walter crying, James and Jim who were in the lead of the flying yelling purpleoughs bent him to it and he was killed by their sabres instantly.

James and Jim pointed their rifles at the two terrified women and Walter and a number of boys rode up to the policemen just as the two columns closed in a merciless horse-hill conflict with all the men to be only on one side and taking R Jacobs in his arms from the horse, then followed by Jack Leach, rode steadily out of the conflict with them, taking the two women along with them.

"Why in hell don't we charge those dodgier kid middle? If I do - them down" - a fellow of the officers in the midst of the wild fray. The dust was in his eyes nose and mouth.

"Keep on in line," he ordered one of the grizzled old troopers as he pushed the blow of some acute subv. "That's just what the those little devils want us to do - confront us before us out from that dust, where a man can't see twenty paces away and out us to pieces. For they are a real army now. Why we can't be able to charge.

Why do we lack if any of us got many alive, did you not see the vivanites at ground in. That meant that our own gun had been too far in front with those bursts and they have rode through us like a whirlwind, took our lead. We could suddenly see the gun, and realize they come behind at our column. Confound their yell.
"We would sooner than a crowd of child ran up - fighting in fire."

A rowing attack developed in the night, the still darkness approaches of the boys and girls and a horde of little phantom figures materialized suddenly out of the smothering dust. The glandelinian officer whose name was Carter saw rows of boys and girls on horse back armed like cavalry and weapons combined and said to himself that heaped and decided as if by their own intelligence. Then a long lance from some other under the rim of his hat and struck quivering in the front of his saddle. A glint of a face, fierce and distorted with fury loomed up before him and there came a strange lightning bolt, a little but already a man showed and something long and curved like a snake sleeked at his head. The glandelinian officer forgot every thing else in his excitement and he caught the blow of the snake upon his own with a loud clanging sound and drove spurs into his weary mount sending that steed a least forward in one leap but there was a terrific shock against him and a thud as the glandelinian horse man went down amongst the stones and sand with his horse rolling over him. A lieutenant a colonel blinded and on in the midst of the christian enemy. In an instant he was surrounded. His hat was knocked off his head, and he slumped blindly right and left with his long sword. The affair was over in a few seconds. At one moment he was the center of a whirl of weapons, at the next he was cut down while the other glandelinian had melted away before the moving mass of hoofs from behind. One young glandelinian officer felt his horse's head seized and he reached upward as a harsh voice ganted in his ears "You young fool. Are you tired of life."

The young glaucousling having failed to reply but glanced fearfully to the spot upon which the flames attacked, progreasing.

"Young Sir" the special officer grunted, "I had you to fight in my service not to go into the thick part of a fray where it is suicide. Get back to your place before I lay the flat of my blade across your stupid shoulders."

During, with whom the young officer obeyed. The blue and yellow banners of the national flag moved forward again on a hop for a safe retreat in company with the mass of men of which it formed a part. The dust raised by the conflict was stifling, the heat was stifling and above them like a furnace, the bites of the stinging flies were maddening. And added to those torments was the inevitable fury of the attack. Each man not yet in the engagement lunged so furiously all around, with his weapon clutched in his hands. The losses of the Alandellians were terrible, the losses of the furious attackers nothing. The enemy soldiers couldn't get at the formidable attacks of the some minor cohorts who fought like fiercesome lions. But for a time upon this section of the Alandellian column no attack had yet come. The minutes sped by.

They were a riot kept torn in suspense. The dust thinned a moment. Though the haze appeared the figure of a rider slipped to the waist and flapping a foaming horse he yelled "Close down!" The vivandiers were coming. Then the dust rolled in again and he vanished. All along the line this massive army of still unengaged "clamdiggers" came to a halt. It was crowded and everything was forced in upon the baggage animals. Banners dipped and swung, dust covered figures shouted frantic commands and to crown the confusion, came a low ominous sound - the rising thunder of a host of galloping hoofs. In the wild moments which followed panic was not idle. He urged the attack to its utmost. The clamdigger leader time-I had become upon this expedition and Hanley a line a for anything else but to see the victim girls separated from their parents and parents.

For even now he would fight for that wicked purpose, would swallow the thunder of his own and it could be distinguished by the wild yelling of the child acrobats and the noise was almost upon them, but as thick was the dust that one could see nothing. A thin line of rifle men on horse back sprang out between the tightly packed ranks of the horse men and hastily ran to the other rifle men were well loaded. Then to General gave a standing order, "yes, as he stood in his line-ups, the dust cloud seemed to thicken, become solid. The next instant it had become a solid bank on one side, thousands of them rushing in at breakneck speed. He saw black, brown, brown, brown, of all colors, in a massive wave they came from the west, topped by columns colored and armed and lit by the lightning flashes of the light carbines, the ordinary exhibition of cavalry but the pick of the boy and girl scout regiments. The rifle men on horse back spread out in the line and tucked back behind the horse men to the safety of the baggage train. In front of them the lance men clipped upon to their great charges and plied forward like an avalanche.

With an excellent stock of all kinds of weapons and the spitting of pistols and cracking rifles Red and East and Jordanian was let loose. He is a fierce and

The old, bearded blasphemer, and pale and imbecilic and yellow from the child about attack him went up in one moment. He was aided by the neighing of fighting horses, the clanging of steel striking upon steel, the noise of musket firing against such other, the roar of pistolry, the crack of rifle and the confused sounds of conflict. So thick was the dust that the sunn light was darkened to a danky glow. Carthage, gasping at his leader's inaction could not distinguish friend from foe. All that he could see was a fierce battling man, seen a moment with wound. Was General Ivins could to sit thus and let his fellows fight for him and in vain, to see how the boy and girl scouts were cutting their way through every thing with the swiftness and irresistible fury of angels, and at awfully suffering no loss of their own. Did his precious mules know more to him than all the lives of his countrymen? But he found himself wishing that the Bureau would have broken through and seized the mules and all they carried, which without his knowledge in what they did. He found out soon it was true his wish had been granted. From the struggling mass of figures a position detached itself and seemed to lead them. The half light of the sun glinted upon spurs and helmet and bayonet and the uniform. Ivins had a voice, screamed sudden alarm.

"Give it to them, give it to them. The punishment is upon us."

A torrent of steel descended upon the little band. The boy and girl scouted above their little steeds recklessly against the barrier of Gladiolusian lances. Twice they were driven back but they came on again trampling the dead and wounded Gladiolusians mercilessly. Conspicuous amongst them was a boy upon a magnificent white charger. He wore the uniform of a boy-pilots. Fanned and some of the others came out of the line and he had all he could do to defend himself.

"There is that dangerous Prince Pen-wedone of the mer, shouted to Curt as he parried a blow to his head. "The devil fake him."

A giant glaucochlorian cavarly man had come at Pen-rod but pen-rod with his own long pole had dragged the soldier's lance from his grip, and the soldier now was fighting Pen-rod furiously with sword, but Pen-rod down him and hewed and dashed single handed at the yelling mad man who confronted him like a fiery apiried little angel killing all who da-rod contend him. Every man of Ivens little company was fighting against the fire-ice child acouts with the fury of desperation.

There and more of the boy and girl scouts kept pouring through the gap left by Evans failure to cover Colonel McCallum's escape - a most alive as they would say could not prevent the run - enough a from forcing them apart. Evans black and red brimmed dipped and fell. After that it was a weary man for himself. Curcurn was surrounded by a dozen life line faced girls themselves who were doing their best to carry him to pieces. Be though he couldn't get at them to do injury he was holding his own. His arm was strong, but the sweep of the long shadows of the boy and girl scouts out stretched his own. Six of his men came to his help but three of them fell back howling, the other hesitated. The girl scouts were fiercer than the boys. Penrod himself came up on the clandellians again and was forced to break through determined to put an end to these girl scouts at whatever cost to themselves. Penrod however recalled them. Throwing spurs to his mount he drove straight straight at straight at Curt smashing through all opposition, and before the clandellian leader knew his danger Penrod was on top of him. Only by throwing himself over his saddle bow did the clandellian leader save himself from the long snare which whistled over his head. As he at nightened the clandellian officer showed an impetuous hand to his followers waving them back. Then like a wild cat he flew at Penrod. But from the first it was an unequal combat. Try as he would Curt could never land a blow, his heavy blade cut only the heavy bit of supply at the boy prince leaped, wheeled and cartwheeled in all the trick ticks of an Indian horse as man evading the clumsy rush of Curt's big mount while the light weapon of Penrod's licked in and out like a snakes tongue now over, now under Curt's guard.

Professors' uniforms, the next morning, he laid open the iron links of his "College Professor" slung square topped hat, and then the sabre struck full across the top of his head. Only by Penrod striking wrong did he fail to kill

Car 3's front headlight, by chance, was the sabre's tip sliced a good gash in the gladiolusian's right then. As it was the sabre's tip sliced a good gash in Car 3's eye brow from which the warm blood flooded into his eyes. The boy scouts next stroke would finish the man he felt sure and his bones would be added to the hustly herd of dead. It was all ready marking the line of that one unfortunate march. But it sure was to be now. The gladiolusians were shouting in alarm. Fast Car 3 understood a wave of boy's and girls on foot horse back bearing a huge standard of red and cold gold. No light armed Lagerians there but the fierce vivantes, perched on tall chargers. They struck the disorderliness of gladiolusians with a crash crash and cut their way deep into it without a single loss to themselves, their long sabres or waning vigor and falling like flails. Car 3 suddenly wheeled in flight but he Penrod's great sword flashed down in one tremendous blow and overran the Glandelinian with his horse kicking on top of him. Penrod then rode forward toward beside James who had also killed his assailant. James gasped, "Never in all his years had he seen Penrod fight like that."

"I saved my back, boy," roared Penrod. "We are not so easily rid of these spawns of Satan. We got to avenge my sisters."

Yelling excitedly to each other the boy and girl scouts swooped around the two hacking and thrusting with sabre and lance at all Glandelinians in their way. For a brief time these Glandelinians held their own against the swarm of boy and girl scouts. A Glandelinian lieutenant, half blinded with blood almost dropping from his saddle with exhaustion gritted his teeth and used his sabre manfully. The big man roaring and blaspheming like a talking bull struck right and left with his huge weapon but could do nothing. Then came disaster. Unseen by either of the pair one of the boy scouts, a girl no doubt armed with a keen blade dismounted and slipped under the balilar bellies of their horses with a scream of almost human pain the charge of the Glandelinian Glandelinian suddenly stumbled and fell hurling his wide sword the plunging hoofs of the horses of the children soldiers.

The man had barely touched the ground before a dozen of the girl scouts had flung themselves from their horses and were on top of him. At another Glandelinian officer tumbling from his jaded mount threw himself into the midst of them. With arms almost dropping with fatigue he seized his sword in both hands and clearing a circle around him by driving his eyes back stood over the fallen man. It was hopeless. The desperate defense of the Glandelinian only lasted a moment. The girl scouts, baying like glibish wolves, surged in upon him with wildly distorted faces their eyes streaming tears of rage and to bore him down by sheer weight of numbers. He fell upon his back across the body of his comrade. Strong childish hands wrenched his iron black hat from his head and the steel of a glittering sabre came toward his throat. Yet in that brief moment before the steel had time to descend, something long and dark and thin, slit past the soldiers wildly staring eyes. The sabre fell harmlessly upon his breast and its owner vanished with an agonizing scream bore away upon a lance head, painfully but not dangerously wounded.

Across the soldiers bewildered gaze as he lay there with upturned face flashed the lightning like vision of the belly of a great horse of flying hoofs and a pair of feet in stirrups. After it came another and still another and still others. The Glandelinian scarcely dared to breathe. He lay there until no more horses came then he sat up. His rescuers were gone, vanished into the density of the dust but the noise of their progress came back to him in a bedlam of sound. Around him lay the wreckage of savage cavalry battle. Men and horses dead and dying lay twisted into all sorts of queer positions and there amid the wreckage stood the white horse of his fallen comrade, perfectly still with its master trying to haul himself erect by the stirrup leather while a boy who happened to be Prince Penrod moved toward him. Here was the prize horse Penrod had long hoped for and which he sorely needed to escape him. The Glandelinian general had one foot in the stirrup when Penrod's sabre in hand plunged upon him. Abandoning his attempt to mount he braced his back against the side of his horse and feebly lifted his sabre and buckled. One smashing blow of Penrod's sabre split the buckler in half and the sword arm of the Glandelinian general dropped. His face was a gray mask of pain.

"So ends," he gasped in Abbeidanian, and crumpled to the ground but Penrod gave no quarter and slew him.

Of the Glandelinian squadrons Ivan was still alive, although much the worse for wear. His horse was gone, he limped heavily his sabre was broken and his uniform clothes were gone. Most of the Glandelinians who survived survived were retreating still followed by their victorious enemies. Of his immense number of followers only half a dozen faint and wounded men remained and his precious mules with their burdens of loot had vanished.

"He surrendered to me but I killed him," said Penrod. "I did not give quarter. These dirty spawns of hell are doing too much harm to my sisters." He turned to James and Jim who brought his two sisters before him, and the captured women.

"As you have done well my boys," said Penrod with the satisfied smirk of a cat who sees a dish of cream before it, "and you captured a high Glandelinian officer with them. These are no ordinary prisoners. I would not have given them quarter but they're a set of it worse than I. I have just opened them for the final drama within the Christian lines. Here Conrad," he beckoned to a dark faced man for with the child scout had been an immense body of cavalry. Far off big shoots of flame and clouds of smoke showed the camp too had been attacked and every thing destroyed. Great explosions went the air.

"You speak the tongue of these two wicked looking women. Demand of these women what they were doing with my sisters in my shelter. He looked savagely at the women. The women stared in abject terror at the fierce company of boy and girl scouts and savage looking men around her and her sister. To Conrad's questioning one of them replied in a scared sort of sentence.

Conrad backed away his mouth wide open.

"My Prince," he announced in tones of surprise. "The one who says her name is Martha was the house keeper of Colonel Hirsdale a headquarter. The little girls were arrested by him on the charge of spying, and given over to her care."

Penrod whistled. "House keeper of the Glandelinian Colonel Hirsdale's 'lair eh?' he repeated. "The colonel's house keeper eh. Well I'll wager he'll remember Prince Penrod of Abbeidanian. He looked at his sister Jennie whose head was in a bloody bandage. Angeline looked also as if she had been beaten up. The captured general showed his teeth like a cornered fox. At the sight of his sisters Penrod could scarcely believe his eyes. Two iron rings with a long chain attached were around their beautiful little necks, and the boys had wound the chains around the little girls' bodies so they wouldn't hang down. Walter Starrling told his story of his experience with Henry with the woman Martha and of her attempt to poison them so they couldn't rescue the little girls. Penrod listened in alarm. What kind of doing was this.

"At Walter Starrling," said Penrod dumbfounded "it can't be possible. You must be dreaming it."

"No I was not, your sisters will tell you the fact. That's Colonel Hirsdale we have captured. He was the main one. He did not capture your sisters. He kidnapped them as they were unconsciously running through a portion of his territory to escape a storm. I will be satisfied if your sisters will all prove my statement is true."

White to the lips Penrod sat on his horse for a moment paralyzed with amazement and horror. Then with a yell of rage he flung himself in front of his prisoners and handed a back handed blow with his little fist in the colonel's face a blow that started blood walling from a fist made out over the man's eye.

"To the devil with such Glandelinians," Penrod shouted. "You three shall pay for this."

Hirsdale despite his cowed fury caught sight of something which his blood blinded eyes had not noticed until now. This was a really Prince Penrod who had the reputation when his sisters were crosses crossed in any way of having the same temper of a leopard and the colonel shrank back from the baleful glare of those fierce blue eyes. If looks were daggers Penrod could have slain Hirsdale on the spot. It was a bitter pill too for Penrod to swallow to see his two sisters rescued in that plight.

"Take him out of my sight to camp," stammered Penrod. "He is your prisoner do with him as you like."

"I release him to you Prince," said Walter Starrling. "I have no further claim upon him, since he made your sisters prisoners unjustly it is your duty Prince to make him pay for it."

Penrod's voice sank to a menacing purr.

"My sisters have a stout heart and should go far in anything," he said. "I always always did fear some sort of accident may befall them and it did. Many of you Glandelinian Glandelinians would slay them for a quarter of the reward you would get if they were dead or alive not for the money but for the pleasure of it." Penrod then turned to the two women with a sneer. "So you two helped Colonel Hirsdale steal in his kidnapping plot, and to take them to Hunsley a line, so they would be separated for good and never see me or their parents again, and give my sisters more sorrow," he snarled. "You are women it is true but we had hand the same fate to you as we do to men who kidnap Christian children. That goes for you too Colonel. You took them prisoners on the charge of spying when you know well enough they were a trying to shake shalts from a thunders to charge you with kidnapping in the third degree degree you women and Colonel Hirsdale in the first degree."

"I didn't kidnap them," said the woman Martha. "I can prove it by your sisters they'll tell you the truth." At that moment to their surprise though only the little girls saw it, an angel suddenly appeared before them. "I command you not today a word when Penrod questions you," said the angel and disappeared. Only Jennie and Angeline saw the beautiful creature.

Penrod turned to his sisters.

"Did that woman speak the truth?" Penrod asked.

Jennie and Angeline to his surprise remained silent. He knew them, he knew the silence.

"You lie," he snarled at the woman. "I know why they won't talk. They won't defend you. Then looking at Jennie's head he said a little reproachfully to his boy friends. "I thought you took my sisters out of the line of fire."

"They were not in the battle" word for the enemy fire" said Tim so + of cur'ly. "The girls told me all about it. I first couldn't believe it. It's a terrible war. Those two women beat your sister up because they couldn't sin, and Martha's sister slammed Jennie's head against the door. Well because she came to the defense of her sister and these young women are for a long period, German by descent and Martha is the wife of one of the "Gladsonian soldiers" called Michael. They told me he took their side against his wife as much as he dared but she sent her foot down and he had no say. He was not with this squadron as he is of the main Gladsonian infantry. He is a wounded hero and, and it's a nasty wound too."

"Our see on those old hags" shouted Penrod "I'll pay back. "Then the one who had the key to these confounded iron "hills around the track..."

"The officer who had the key got rescued by some of his men and escaped our troops" said said James.

TWO hours had passed and the whole calvaude was on its feet. The Christian encampments. There had been thirteen thousand boy and girl scouts in the attack (whether such a number is unlucky or it, it was for the enemy) and out of that number all came back. Many of them, hundreds of course had wounds more or less, but the wounds were slight and they themselves even knew how to take care of them. Great fires raged far away for an immense Glardelaine encampment had been destroyed and fourteen thousand Glardelaine lay dead, and thirteen thousand five hundred badly wounded lay dying. An immense drove of horses had been captured from the vanquished cavalry, and an enormous amount of cavalry booty and many weapons. From the safe location Argeline and Jennie with the two women held prisoners by a bunch of scouts not in the conflict had seen the dreadful fray from the beginning to the finish, and as much as it took to describe it, the attack of the scouts had been made with such terrible violence, that despite the numbers engaged, miraculously it was all over in ten minutes. Vanquishing the cavalry the attackers had rushed pell mell for the camp killing and destroying, and carrying all before them, driving the frantic frightened defenders out of the camp pell mell, and then heavy reinforcements reinforcements came up, repelled them and drove them out of all proportions also. Before the scout army the Glardelaine fled like wolves before a herd of lions, leaving every thing of value behind them.

Penrod rode between his sister's deciding to go to a blacksmith to get those wide wings cut off. This was done the rest of the group going on, James Tim and Walter going with Penrod. Then they entered the blacksmith with two little beautiful girls with that outfit on the shoe maker stared as if he did not believe his eyes. However Penrod quickly acknowledged who he was, who the little girls were and launched that the corruption be broken - chisled off as soon as possible. The blacksmith smiled.

"Rough as cutting pie" he said beginning work. Ten minutes later the little girls were a free of the strange wings. Then thanking the horse shoe maker and saying him well despite his protest that he was willing to do it for them for nothing Penrod took his sisters to a dry goods store within the camp and gave the little girls were dressed like themselves once more. Poor Argeline and Julie though they felt a little forth si redder, release did not feel like having a simple word.

"You prisoners look so clean now," said James. "But that bandage on Jerome's head does not go with the rest of them, and I'm glad you got it off those ragged clothes and all that. Besides I have not seen the national bandit before. I see faces for nearly three weeks and to try is the fourth one of James. They were gone so long I had forgotten just what they did look like. My chief relief they are back."

"Pan rod smiles. He could smile now.
"I saw a married couple and a young girl," he said. "As long as we are in the line now, they must look the part. There is one thing certain though.
They are not dressed exactly as they were before they came away when they were a vivid vision and away with it. Well, I wish to get into communication with my sister so that they will get over their anxiety and as soon as I'll have to telephone telephone to Panama to that nominal as soon as we get there."

"I did not think of that," said Walter Shaeving. "I wish we could wait until he showed back up, but he cannot wait here to have them see that."
"I don't know," said Burdett. "Come along to see me. I will let my other dear sister and her mother see if we have our two dears come back again. We will have to phone them and let them see Jerrrie's head. That won't shock them so bad as if they still think for them."

"There shall we go to picnic, wonder" mused Walter.

"I don't suppose it matters how long we've got connected with the hospital. They are all the same to me," said Penrod. "It's so late in the afternoon, we're not going to call here to be on our way. Jennie and Argeline will be home like that before we leave them. My sister's must not be held in prison and some conditional feel she no more for them now that I'm released and they are still out of my jail. Think of them more than of my selfish that case; I don't care at all for my self when it comes to them."

"The three boys with their two sisters rode slowly down the company street giving short commands to the sharp-eyed soldiers who patrolled the way.

[illegible]

"I'd like to give you sisters a ride in that car through to Pando-na" said Walt, pointing to a big automobile a low mile and a half

"Why not, Prince?" said James as he approached the big machine. "And it would be some ride for them. The driver sure would take you for that sake."

"He'd have to," said Pennrod smiling. "That's the red flag or red cross flag on it. I wonder."

"I must belong to some army hospital I suppose," said Valdez, "but if we did get in, no one would have a right to stop us, wonder who drive it."

"Here is the chaff saw," said Penrod in a dark, but firmly but kindly tone. "It is a good saw, and it will cut through the wood of the machine and take a package from the tool box. The lock is like an emergency one," said Tim.

They rode around the corner of the building on their horses and for a moment circled with the throngs until for the 'signal' came puffing in, and as the crowd pressed forward.

"Should we tell the man to let us on the machine," asked Pan Red. "I don't like to risk them on the back another hour. Poor Jennie looks half dead. Let's go and asked the driver of the car."

They went quickly through the crowd, followed by the girls. The train was re-commencing on the track. It was evidently going to make up a section. They came up to the big car. The ho-osen were to be given off over to the soldiers for care. They met the driver, and he was only too willing to do it. Without the driver's seat, and Arneline next. Penrod took the other seat. The drivthe car full speed, and they started with a jerk that almost threw them out looking behind Penrod to his amazement saw a tall woman point to the car and to his surprise a soldier on a motorcycle jumped from his machine and ran to handle the woman. The man jumped back on his machine and came right up to the automobile. He gave them a searching

"I had you pardon Prince. The woman made a mistake. She thought you were some and--and---" he looked at Jenette and Argeline sharply; then exclaimed;

"Yes they are" said Pennrod smiling at the soldiers evident

"So y" he began. "are you positively sure. The news papers say they are dead.

"Well it did say that "said Penrod" but they are here. I rescued them from the Glandelinians. But don't talk so loud they have fallen asleep and a aroused. They need rest after what they have gone through. I

"You'd be pained" said the soldier. "Won't the army be joiced though? I'd spend you lightly on Prin Price. It takes you to do things. You are a handsome kid, and your sister and I can thank God they have such a great little brother like you.

The man then advised as the driver of the car shipped the

A Argentine commenced to cry in her sleep;

"Don't let them get me pinned on please don't let them get me Pinned looked at her then he said to Walter
"I'm not taking him from Underlines headquar - to me. Didn't you say "I have it. We can telephone from Lima - Lima Hospital - that my other relatives went to St Josp Joseph Hospital to see my brother

"Yes," said Walter.

"Good. Then I'll telephone the... Well, you could make general Hinder-nines housekeeper recognize me in spite of my uniform, couldn't you?"

"Couldn't she recognize you in all that armor?" asked James.

"Perhaps," said Penrod.

"Well," said James, "he can't go any further than Hinder-nines headquarters with the car, and the thing for us is to go to his headquarters as quickly as we can, and you get hold of that housekeeper and explain. You see she stands in with the general. It's his own sister's house, isn't it?"

"Yes," said Penrod, "and that's the only thing to do. This is a Red Cross car, and as it is the only one may be a big favor about it at headquarters. But I rot in mind my sister's friend of all."

"What are we any way?" said Walter, and the driver of his command slowed down to a snail's pace.

"Turn to your left and ahead for three blocks, then once to the right, and you will see the headquarters in the distance," said Penrod.

They swept on through the immense seemingly endless courtyard, reached the double steps of the building, stopped the car, and Walter stepped to the ground. Penrod looked at his little sister Ardeline. She was awake and sitting up now, but Jennie was still sleeping on but there was a look of suffering in her face as if he wounded head hurt her even in her sleep. Penrod could not speak but he held out his arms to her, and she sprang into them, she clung to him, trembling and calling his name over and over while he pressed kisses on her pale little cheeks. With a word Tim still holding Jennie, they hurried up the steps. Then they were inside. A first-aid camp came up and her brothers, and the boys commenced both at once to explain matters. The boy scout looked at them. No one would dream that the two thin half-starved nearly dressed little girls were anything else but the patients they looked to be, and the first-aid camp shook her head. Though she was unusually impressed by the beauty of the little girls and so was the boy.

"I'm sorry," she said, "this is General Hinder-nines headquarters not a hospital," and she pointed to Jennie's bloody bandaged head.

Penrod immediately stamped his foot.

"I know this is General Hinder-nines headquarters. I want either the general or his housekeeper," he said. "I'm Prince Penrod and these little girls are my sisters. Send some one for the housekeeper or the general."

He demanded.

I think the general is out scouting with his officers to see how the battle is going on today," said the first-aid camp. "But I will send for the housekeeper. Mrs. Jerry who came to see the general to day on some important business for your sisters at the hospital. He'll be tickled to see you sisters back. I hardly recognized them."

She gave a message to an assistant, and they waited in silence while the undergarment was gone. She returned in a moment.

"The general is not here," she said, "but your friend Mrs. Jerry is coming." As she spoke the door opened, and the lovely old face of Mrs. Hannah Jerry appeared.

"What's the trouble?" she asked of the first-aid camp, and glanced at the group before her. One lay on the floor, one a spring, and little Ardeline was folded in her breast. Ardeline threw her arms around the good woman's neck, the beautiful little face hidden, while Mrs. Jerry murmured loving names and caressed the beautiful little form close to her heart. Jennie was taken care of by the first-aid camp who telephoned for a doctor to attend her head. Penrod was the first to speak.

"Well, what do you know about that?" he said solemnly.

The doctor turned to Penrod after he had attended Jennie and plied him with questions. Penrod answered every one. Presently Mrs. Jerry looked up.

"You are a miracle boy," she said, and lifting her head with a reverent look up she said:

"Thank God, God is good to have brought them such a good brother. Nothing is impossible for you to do. Your two sisters are supposed dead, lost forever in an impossible impossible to get out of and you have them here."

Suddenly the nurse came to Penrod's side.

"Come with me, Prince," she said, "your sisters are all right and in waiting for you."

Bring Mrs. Jerry and Ardeline in with you."

Impetuously she led the way down the grand hall, now full of cotons, and ran to a narrow door by opened this and pushed Penrod through ahead of her. Mrs. Jerry and Ardeline followed. Ardeline pounced on broken little Jennie and him as he came. Penrod had his arms in a instant and for once Penrod could not kiss her even though she was his head. But he had to be satisfied with a poor Ardeline who commenced to look happy once more.

"Where is father?" asked Jennie doubtfully.

"Out along the front," said Penrod. "He has crushed the enemy and will be at St. George's hospital where your sisters are. Our brother James who was wounded has been brought there and is doing fine."

Then for the first time they noticed that Mrs. Jerry was gone, and the door shut, and they were alone.

"Penrod dear, you must be very good to poor father," said Jennie. "I know even though I didn't seem him before lost with poor Ardeline that he has with my sisters suffered more than I can say. Any one could tell but he takes all the blame for everything."

"Well," said Penrod, "it has been the fault of those spies who tried to capture little Nell. Father and your aunt is to blame but those spies."

They say she knows too much about Abigail because she is such a bright child, and she has learned something of great importance about the cause of the awful disaster and who were responsible. We heard news from Aunt Mary and she's pained about the loss of you and Ardeline. And poor father was nearly crazy. Your sisters are all from that now. So now we who are his children can't surprise him as soon as we can. We have just got to remember that he is a truly good and great man in his life in every thing, and we are very proud of him. I'm glad poor Ardeline has fallen asleep again. We are free together and I hope by God's help things won't be so hard for you little girls again like this. If it is possible I'll see to it that it isn't. But you are right about father and my other dear sisters felt pretty bad more than had than we can say when the news came. We ported you were dead, and that you were bodies were sent here. We couldn't hardly believe that even though we felt you were lost for good with Ardeline in those awful woods, and it didn't seem as if it could stand it. You two sure made an awful sacrifice of yourselves, to get Nell safely from those spies. I'll tell you one thing I'll going to finish this business for good and all. I'm going to stop the enemy doing this to you with a plan of my own."

Jennie smiled through her tears.

"I hope it will work," Penrod dear," she said, as he still clasped her in his arms all this time.

Penrod looked at her.

"What will you do to this?" said Jennie. "You would begin at the beginning and tell me all that happened after you left with Ardeline to come back here from Aunt Mary. I've had such a lot of scraps."

"All right," said Jennie, "I'll tell you everything on the same part of her head. She looked down at her little sister Ardeline in her bed. "See," she said, "she has gone to sleep. Gardenier sister is exhausted. I got this news when Martha sister pulled me against the wall to defend me from my sister and Ardeline got it too."

Penrod looked at her. "You and she has had the same experience of all and two of you with bandaged heads," he said. "I'll fix those two women. We won't know for good while that count to have undergone. I would not want to question her. It will have to come out in time. And I think the baby I rescued from its dead mother will be a good thing after all. It will help me up Ardeline and your sister and make her forget. Yes we have got to get news to you sisters as soon as the scout comes back. I sent with the report they are at the hospital. He has been instructed only to go and see and say nothing. For I want to surprise them. Yes we've got to treat you both to that hospital as soon as we can on that account. I'll take poor Ardeline in my arms. Now go on Ardeline dear."

Penrod gently lifted the young sister and cuddled the sleeping child more closely, while Jennie commenced at the moment of the leaving Aunt Mary, the attack on the refuge train, and finished with telling her brother the thriller and almost unbelievable story of that adventure and ending up with that terrible experience with the two wicked women. Finally she reached the end. Penrod had made no comment, but the stern and anxious expression of his face betrayed his feelings. He knew the awful fate coming to those women but even if she would she couldn't avert it. Jennie paused.

"And to think," he grinned. "I was looking at you and Ardeline with my field glasses when you were crying in this afternoon. Penrod, Penrod. Oh Penrod. There was no end of that. I saw you plainly and Ardeline too and was so surprised you two despite the ages you had only tell you I acted quick. Lucky I had the whole force there. Poor little sister Jennie, I hope you will never more have to cry for me like that again. I cut me to the heart. That is why I attack like I did. When these Vivianites I guess you saw the whole attack coming. Those Vivianites may be little girls and boys but they are hard as nails and hard heads of them are no older than I am. You know I went to school with a fellow one day, and I was surprised to see him one of the Vivianites here now, and the fellow had the dandiest style I ever saw. When I spoke to him after the conflict he said it was a police from the government."

for a short shooting. He said she was a fine forger -- a woman with fine ideas. He said when he was home in his country child was qualified for the boy and if he could when they were about three years old and they learned many things, and know first and when they were about four, and learned a lot of other things when they were five or six. But they never learned things with weapons like we do."

Jennie nodded. "I'm sorry for those children, Penrod," she laughed.

Penrod suddenly thought of something. "Say, what's father going to do?" Dana said Jennie. "Are we going to spend our lives doing nothing in Pandora or are we going to move after De Preaesonville is recaptured?"

"Why I know father does not know yet that you and our sister are here, neither does your sister or James or Evans. Penrod is a minded thing. He ought to be here soon now. That is why I choose Hinderhines headquarters which is even father's now."

"Let's get him to go toward Doinda as soon as we can" said Jennie. "I've seen about all I can stand of these horrors. Pandora is by no means safe for any of us."

Penrod put an arm around Jennie's shoulders and embraced his dear sister while he still held to Angelina with the other who was still asleep.

"Jennie dear we will never be the same children again," he said sadly.

"Oh I'm home sick for my sister over at the hospital but I want to give them a surprising phone call before we go, and I'm home sick for Angelina State. I want to go home to Marcellus. I'm dead sick of this dreadful uncertainty and all you and the other are through sleep. We all ought to be where we belong."

"Poor dear Penrod," said Jennie. "I know how you feel, and how you felt when I and Jennie were lost so long. We all want to go too. But as long as the war goes on we can't shake the dust off of our country. Like that you know. We have made every one friends of our own side, all good friends here too, and you will have to keep in touch with the boys and girls. None of us can shake that you know. Besides I believe now our worst trouble now is over. We may have the killing times but not like we have. We don't mind that being pursued for we like excitement. We can't shake anything you know when our country is in danger like that."

"And of course not," agreed Penrod. "I just would like to go home and take you all with us and work up on good old Angelina State for a while. I've got lots of things to tell those fellows too," he said solemnly.

"Well we could go with the armies to Doinda and look for action if father is willing."

"Yes and your dear sisters at the hospital has got on the prettiest little baby."

"A what" said Jennie almost loud enough to have awakened Angelina but she did not.

"Why a baby" said Penrod. "A baby I brought to your sisters, the one I brought from the dead mother," and Penrod explained the details.

"Where is it?" asked Jennie. "I'd like to see it."

"You sisters have it," said Penrod. "I left it with them. They offered to keep the baby until some one adopts it. If they don't they will."

"Q baby you rescued," said Jennie. "So my dear sisters are going to keep it for adoption. Well that does seem almost the last straw. Earlier now victims of the enemy, of a bomb. Don't you suppose one of our friends would like to keep it?"

"No I don't," said Penrod firmly. "That poor woman has seven children, and her husband fighting in the battle of De Preaesonville was killed, and she is ruined. She will have hard work enough feeding her own. We have dozens of people over home and they are all going to have the privilege of helping to care for our little war-baby. I shall name her in honor of the Blessed Virgin."

"All right my dear virginity" said Jennie kissing him on the cheek. Penrod turned it, and then still holding her both went to the window and looked out Angelina now having been placed on a bed.

"I wish father would come," he said. "Is Jack Evans with him?"

"Yes," said Jennie. "Suppose I go and look for them. Penrod dear?"

"You will stay right here," said Penrod. "I don't want one of you out of my sight from now on. Jack Evans is with father. Father and Jack Evans caught the enemy when the Landallians were on the verge of victory. Father has been helping V. Evans and Hanson a lot here and the battle along the lines has been terrible. He has given all sorts of things to the hospital that were badly needed. Mr. Jerry the house keeper will send him in as soon as he comes. It is like father's tale to think that I rescued you and Angelina so beautifully."

"Beautifully!" gasped Jennie in astonishment. "Well you may say you rescued us beautifully, but the enemy who received don't think so. You made a dreadful attack, and my only regret was that I and Jennie were not in condition to join in it. A magnificent charge you made and the enemy had no show. I didn't expect that. What I thought when I saw you at a distance with your beautiful purity, and called so loudly your name was that you would only call the enemy, then I'd be as dead as a doornail and rescue me by a trick. I never even thought you had such a big cavalry force and all those boys and girls with you armed like that. That made you count with such a force."

"It probably was God's design to punish you enemies," said Penrod. "I was out several times that way but so no prospect of the enemy then. This afternoon was the lucky one for us all. I can imagine what your sister will look like when I phone them. I wish that confounded scout would come soon and report whether they were at the hospital or not. I wonder what's keeping him too."

There was the sound of rapid foot steps at the door. It was flung open and Jack Evans rushed in, closely followed by the enemy. Trouble and danger and expectation changed out of a point, and Penrod and his two sisters Angelina now awakened found themselves one by one in their father's arms and only to find to be there. Indeed, the enemy was not Penrod had told a great many things since the start. He had had to face war, and death and made some mistakes and all the crimes that stalk through a land at such times committed by villain. The Landallians after it had been accomplished what all the arguments, all the feelings, all the entreaties in the world would have never succeeded. The persecution of his daughter, the daughter's, and so on, and injustice to the enemy to have made him a dance-room to reach. All the fury of his nature had come against the enemy. That was why he was so readily shown the enemy's side. It was at De Preaesonville couldn't win a stick at a stick. There had been a close fight when his life had looked very poor and thin and useless. What was anything when he compared them to the needs of the dear holy children who they could have stayed home, were so loyal and true to him and helped him in the battle which he would have lost without the help. Superstition though else to have made a chance of war, and he humbly resolved to make the enemy know that he was really a man. And he kept his word. Thinking that his father would cheer the gently some sympathizers of the cruel women came to De Preaesonville petitioning in their behalf, but Jennie and Angelina had told their whole story and he sent them.

"Early father that woman that did kidnap us. It was the plot of Colonel Pike. The whole son of the general who had arrested us for crossing his territory to escape the enemy. Our heads are injured by what those wicked women did to us and they both told the whole details. There were when the petitioners came to plead for the sick woman the paper would not listen to a word."

"They'll pay, they'll pay," he roared. "They're a lot better than men who do the same. Women should be of gentle sex and be an example to the men. He they'll die."

In the meantime Violet and her other sisters had reached the hospital safe and sound. James and Jim had been sent to them to take care of them and that was why they were with them in the underground room when Joyce rescued the Professor and his family. Prince James was sitting up in his bed looking at the boys with his eyes narrowed and a puzzled look on his handsome face. Violet and her holy little sister knew that look and knew what was passing in their big brother's mind. He was quite silent. James had brought little Jennie in with him as though he dared not let her out of his sight. The two boys had said nothing about the rescue because Penrod charged them not to until the message came over the phone.

"We have been talking things over," said Joyce. "Of course the only honorable thing for Professor Otto to do is to go to Angelina. Aabria by the instant out of all that is by Angelina. He has no right to remain here and possibly endanger the lives of so many young people and himself too, and there is nothing that he can do for us. Some day probably we will want help and then we know that you will all come to our aid. Jack to the Professor's son."

"I have been talking it all over with our brother the good prince here and we have decided that the best thing for you to do as your father wills is to stay behind and accept a rank of officer over some of our boys about government. Wait," she said as Jack shook his head, thinking he was receiving an order not to desert him to himself buy our country in this dark neighborhood and stay here, in a line, and except by immediate flood and fire. Your older brother they say is at the front we know not where, and our two sisters are prisoners within the lines and Penrod too is only God knows where. You can see how we are maintaining a boy about London. Our own estates we are all in ruins. To be in here and protected by our country, and by being rescued with your father by me, you owe to our Country the one 655.

11 11116

...can do for him? ...and ... 854
If you are not a citizen we can make it so and make out ...
...in every way for ...ship. ...count ...made many like you. Think of us.
That chance have a little girl ... now in this ...icken land? We want you to go and ...it as a favor for us Jack. We will take the ... responsibility and I want you to take ...these ... jewels and use them for your expenses and education for you must go to the ...diversity of Boy Scouts in our very army have ... where Professor ... is in such ...a ... instruction and she held out a glittering handful of priceless gems.
"Go," said Professor Otto firmly. "Princess, you and young ... sisters will ...need all you have. It happens that I have plenty of money, and we live very simply
...and no there is enough and to spare for the children who we hope to take with us.
...there is for us plenty of money in ... and if Jack prefers to become ...a leader of boy scouts we while staying at Angelina's ... will keep an account ...of his educational expenses and at some future date he can repay what I shall ...deem necessary to expend for him."

"That is better," said the Princess. She turned to Jack.
"You will go and do it Jack?"
"Yes," said Jack (put in the black) Then sadly "but I wish I could see my elder brother."

"It is indeed hard very hard," said Princess Violet herself. "Our two ...
...sisters ... too seem lost to us for ever. We feel that he must be unhurt however, and I know that he will be so ... and glad to know that you are in a place of safety. So that is settled," she smiled.

A later ... After the Professor and his family were gone, Jack ... shown ...a room by one of the ... Violet and her sisters were left ...
...themselves. "I'll Violet herself had turned and made her ... solitary way ...to a large open window ... and there all alone looked away over the whole expanse
...of the city southward. For a long long time she gazed into the nightly darkness.
...There were streaming down her fair cheeks tears for such a kind of child that ...should not need to be there."

"Good bye my two beautiful good sisters," she said sadly. "Good bye my dear ...
...Jennie, and poor little Angelina who had always been an ...
...and my other ... sisters will come back to you when we meet in Heaven." She ...stretched her arms out in a most passionate gesture of farewell. Then Violet ...fading, the same as if she were homeless, country lass, sisterless, and ...
...slowly turned, and Violet went soberly to join her ... sisters who had gone to ...their room. The Professor and the others of his family had said good bye to ...the poor little Princesses and had at last started on the journey to Angelina's
...Athina. All of Calvernia, Abbeville and her sisters were plunged in ...direful gloom, given the neutral countenance close by were oppressed by such ...a sorrow that it was almost as bad as ...

"Oh I beg your pardon," said Princess Violet for disturbing you said at the ...orderly of the hospital as he opened the door of their room "put one of you ...
...wanted on the phone. It's an emergency call."

Violet turned white. She feared something now had happened to Penrod.
"I'll answer it," she said in a husky voice her heart suddenly falling as heavy ...as lead at this new blow. "he went slowly with melancholy step to where the ...orderly ... After ... to the phone he left closing the door
...he sat down and lifted the receiver. Hello

"Hello," she said feeling more frightened yet.
"Hello," came back the answer. "Is that you Violet. This is Penrod."
Oh what a relief she had, for his voice even sounded excited and not even as if he was in danger. No many so now in his voice either. He had expected a sad and catchy voice and yet there was no such sound.

"Yes," this is Violet," she answered. "Where are you Penrod dear? We expected you to come home. We got news about Jennie and Angelina. They are prisoners not dead. General Hindmire has them."
It sounded to her as if Penrod was laughing.
"I'm general Hindmire," then he laughed over the phone. "I'm at Hindmire's Hindmire headquarters. I've got good news for you. Jennie and Angelina are standing on each side of me as I'm speaking to you. I had to destroy a ... army of cavalry to get them though. But they are here."

"Oh Penrod dear," is that true? Violet fairly screamed in her excitement and joy. Please brother dear do not fool me please. It seems almost too good to be true."

"I told you Jennie and Angelina are standing on either side of me," came back the answer. "I'll prove it to you. They can talk to you themselves." A second later she recognized Jennie's voice and then Angelina's as they said "Hello Violet dear this is Jennie." Then came Violet's turn. "Hello Penrod dear," she said.
He attacked the ... who had us prisoners, and destroyed nearly all of them, and captured two ... wicked old woman who was ...
and General Hindmire. So go Violet dear and tell your sister ... Father ...
... Get your sisters on the phone. Hurry."

Nearly Violet did not need to be ... laid the ... carefully and ... down the hall ... room which was number ... 13, and which was indeed a lucky number to them now ...
... he went in quickly and said:

"Jennie Daisy, all of you," she almost screamed in her excitement. "Penrod is in the phone. So were Jennie and Daisy."

"What?" cried Jennie looking at Violet's excited and flushed face. "What did you say? Jennie and Angelina on the phone?"

"Where, where?" cried the rest in unison.

"At general Hindmire's headquarters," Penrod called up. He rescued him.
Oh sisters that is why he had that conflict where he slew so many cruel cavalry of the enemy. He told me all."

It did not take them long to reach the room, followed by James and Tim. Jennie lifted the receiver and said:

"Hello is that you Penrod dear?"

"No," came back the surprise answer of which a voice she recognized instantly. "This is your sister Angelina. Is that you Jennie?" Then came a lengthy conversation and Jennie's sisters could see by her face that the news was absolutely true. "We are coming to you and our dear sisters to-morrow morning," said Angelina. "The Doctor said we must wait up for the night and take care of our bandaged hands, where those wicked women struck us," she continued. "Now Joy lear there is one thing more for us to do when we come to-morrow morning. We have here our dear father, and Jack Evans too, and we have a safe conduct on the roads to Pandora. Father is coming too and he has arranged for Mrs. Jerry to go with us. We won't come by horse but by the Automobile which brought us to Hindmire's headquarters. Oh dear, ain't Penrod grand. He did what seems impossible. Jennie and saw him on the summit of the ... before the conflict and she called his name three times, and we expected him to just try and get us by a trick.

Oh Joy dear we thought only he and a small scouting party were there and when he and they disappeared we felt sure he was going to trail the cavalry, but oh Joy ten minutes later we got a shock. A wave of boy and girl scouts came rushing down on us on horse back from three directions, and they closed with the enemy before the Gladiolians could draw to make a successful defense.

We were taken ... immediately, and the conflict lasted only ten minutes but all that he ... done and the boy and Gladiolians did not lose a single one.
Penrod now is going to accompany us. I heard he rescued a little baby from its ... mother and that you have it there. We wanted to return to night but the general said it is safer to travel by day, and as a storm is coming it is better to wait and return to Pandora to-morrow. But sisters dear if you are so excited that you can't wait you can come down yourselves. You can not every thing ready for your departure if in the meantime the head sister of St. Joseph's hospital can arrange to get you here."

"Oh it's too bad," said Jennie. "The hospital authorities would not let us go so right. We will have to wait till you come, when in the morning do you suppose you will start?"

"As soon as the cars read," said Angelina. "Then Mrs. Jerry will be ready.
The conversation much further lasted for quite a while, and then when they had ceased speaking, Jennie slowly hung up the receiver.

"They'll start from Hindmire's headquarters and maybe get here in an hour," said Jennie. "Jennie and Angelina were on the phone, and so was Penrod.
Oh how good God is to us to give us such a daring brother as Penrod," and she hugged Daisy and Hattie in her delight, and the other ... sisters cried from sheer joy and danced around the room and doing other ... to show their delight.

Then their prayers of thanksgiving to God, ... with heart and cold feeling, not only for the return of their two lost sisters but for the fact that they have such a good loving, faithful and accomplishing brother. ... their relief had vanished almost at once at the good news and they had danced and cried from sheer joy, they were wholly astonished too that their brother had accomplished the rescue, while they that is Violet and her other sisters had been waiting for his return so they could tell him where Jennie and Angelina were. They remembered having heard of Penrod doing something awful to a large body of Gladiolians cavalry and of capturing what was supposed to be five prisoners, and some women among them with ragged children who appeared to be ... something. Then they while sitting happily and quietly by themselves noticed something ... The sky ... but far away to the south with the coming of darkness was assuming a molten iron color and there was a great cloud of probably pink smoke rising high in the sky.

"They flee to the window to look at it. They suspected what it was for Jennie had told the details. The camps which had been attacked and captured were still ... were still ... and all efforts of ... in Gladiolians had failed to check the fierce conflict. They had seen at night the glare of the fire around ... made on each ... when Penrod had made his dangerous and dashy raid, but this time those quaked. It was a fierce ... as they

"It would have saved ourselves. We saw the fire coming before it could overtake us. But as it came, despite the sufficiency of the flames, the fire was cold and the like was cold."

"But it surprised me that you said you were for a while when the thunderstorm came up," said Penrod. "I never knew you to be afraid of thunderstorms before."

"Jennie blushed but came to the mark frankly. "Those clothes we had on if getting wet would be a link 'n' a link" she said "we must under any conditions keep our modesty you know."

"It was Penrod's turn to blush but he said nothing more on that subject."

"But how did the women kidnap you?" he asked finally.

"I could only give a few details," said Angelina. "I believe too it was because the guards watching us, were not as watchful as they should have been and we might have chanced an escape too if we had thought of it. While we were sitting outside on a box one of the sentry's guarding us was nodding as if falling asleep. A rough looking woman came past, noticed us, and we turned looking as she did so at the house, the guards, and passed into the hall through the door. Then she approached us and a voice in a voice she tried in vain to make soft she asked what we were doing and who we were and why we were prisoners of the gladiolians. As we didn't like her looks, we would not answer, and she brought us a meal. I don't know what happened but without our seeing it she must have slipped something into our coffee as coffee is only what we could get to drink in the gladiolians' camp, for we drank the coffee. I saw her run back as if she intended to go away. I don't know what happened after that, we must have been drugged for when we awakened again we found ourselves lying down on a pile of dirty old rugs. From what Martha told her husband, she had drugged our coffee and when we fell asleep she had shaken the big sacks from beneath her dress and as early and cruelly as though she was filling them with a war at once she had shoved me and Jennie into either big crossed to one side of the company street with her heavy burden, and sat down to wait. When her two accomplices joined her so we overheard her say they were rapidly to the house in Dept. Depressionsville where a waiter had tracked us later it was a wonder we had not been smothered in those sacks. We felt as though we had almost been for when we came to we felt as if we were having a hard time to get to breathing properly again. When we did come to we were a dizzy for a while and at first to decide us she started treating us with a rough kindness which we wouldn't accept. But when we cried she beat us, at first making pains to let the blows fall where they would not leave visible scars or bruises. Then we wouldn't commit that sin she beat me, and at last Jennie but I beat her back. We showed her she was trifling with two wild cats."

"Good, you did right," said Penrod his brow dark.

"How do you suspect she must have drugged your coffee?" asked Tim, who spoke for the first time.

"Well it was after we drank the coffee that we fell asleep or we must have for after drinking the coffee as it seemed we awoke to find ourselves on the hovel and the woman and two gladiolians hovering over us. They said General Pinetree gave us over to them but I know we were kidnapped, for the guards who were supposed to watch us payed no more guarding us more properly. Those wicked women fairly terrified us. They were like real friends to us. The hideous one is not. Her sister is the other one but she's not so worse despite her looks."

"But I feel so horrified over their coming fate," said Jennie again. "If we only could-----"

"I suppose if you could you'd give the devil for what cruelty he'd do to you said Penrod. "If you wish you may forgive the fools, but that can't over their just punishment. Of course if you desire some change of the verdict and you are sure you are justified of it I could probably grant it, but then it would have to be imprisonment for the two in the Island Prison."

"But if you were you for all you have gone through I wouldn't worry about that. But a parent or a child and he would like that again, a thousand times than be in that foolish woman's place. To be burned at the stake is terrible, but I know it can't be helped and she brought it on herself. If the general had really put us in her hands she maybe we could have saved a little of that for the penalty but she kidnapped her."

"For a long time after this they continued to watch the incoming flow of the big fire, and then they prepared to go to bed for it had been enrods place to have in a moment early for St. Joseph's Hospital the not coming so as not to keep the other little princess in suspense. It was hard indeed to fall exactly the time of the hour that Violet and her friends went to sleep that night but they were so excited by the good news they were given, and so attracted by the sweet increasing glow of the big fire, and of their enthusiasm because of knowing who did it against the enemy that it was very late when they really fell asleep by themselves there ever they had been sitting only in. Then Violet through some reason or other though she never saw the incident herself, dreamed of seeing the way Penrod rescued Jennie and Angelina as if she had been actually there. She even dreamed of him and James taking Angelina and Jennie out of the way of the conflict, and of seeing the colonel and the two wicked women captured. Then all that scene melted away and she dreamed on that Jennie and Angelina were with her and her sisters again as if nothing happened and until she who was sleeping by the open window was suddenly awakened by a terrific crash of an explosion as if a big bomb had been exploded right in front of her face. What it really was however turned out to be a mighty crash of thunder, for as she aroused herself, the wind outside was blowing like a hurricane and a blinding dashing rain was falling. As the wind was in another direction more of it came in the open window but fearing the wind might change it a direction as it usually does she closed the window just as there came a flash of lightning that almost blinded her. He saw the long river like streak and its branches and it was followed by such a humming thunders that it thrilled her even though she was not afraid of thunder storms. Her sisters were awakened also by the clamor. They remembered Penrod had predicted of one coming, and while staying awake they had noticed the lightning in a great cloud in the west, but the storm broke much later than they had thought it would. They wondered whether it would sweep on toward the fire, and they could not help the feeling of hoping that it wouldn't. However it didn't extend that far, but not in such an emergency as to do any harm to the conflicting nation. It raged wildly with many of the loudest thunder crashes they had ever heard in their lives for the rest of the night so that they could not hope for any sleep, and soon they heard a report that the hospital basement had been flooded by the heavy rains to a depth of three feet.

It was a awful thunder storm, extremely loud and worse far worse than the two thunder storms during the time Penrod was making his successful hunt for little Daisy, and as fearless and as interested and as crazy over thunder storms as they were they were nevertheless some what relieved when in it finally began to let up, for it had made so much noise that they had lost sleep for the rest of the night. At the beginning the wind was so strong as to tear great branches off of trees, and blew in many windows of the hospital and other buildings throughout the city and flooded hundreds of streets enough to go boating with so much much rain and swelled the normal five to threatening proportions.

Penrod and his two sisters however had not gone to sleep before the arrival of the storm, for so soon as they just started to get ready for bed then the storm started to prove itself of coming, and was even fiercer than in Pandora and after its passage the whole Christian camp as far as you could see was flooded, and the soldiers routed out of their tents or down one or the other that in those whose tents were not blown away or crashed down on top of them by the winds.

"Josh Jennie for God's sake keep away from the window" shouted Penrod as an ear splitting shattering roar seemed to crash even within the room. "That lightning struck close. It was that tree."

The house keeper herself Mrs. Jerry was almost scared to death, not so much of the lightning as of the terrific wind which then was blowing in almost cyclonic proportions. Two windows went out before the gale in the room occupied by the three gladiolians' children, and as nothing could be done, they had to seek another room as the wind blew them in in like a spray cloud.

As for the two sisters Jennie and Angelina enjoyed the storm, and were thrilled by it, and by the fact that the fire flames did not dim down they felt sure the storm had moved the enemy's lines. It didn't in a way, was probably as fierce but the fire was of such proportion that the rain only made smoke and steam and had no effect what ever, though it did slack up its spread to a considerable extent.

But all the gladiolians' tents not hit by the fire were blown down and the camps of the enemy flooded also. The storm had broken at twelve o'clock at midnight and again until about six o'clock in the morning before it finally let up, and then it was after all going to turn out to be a dark and dismal day.

"I'm suspicious a little between my little sister and this weather," said Penrod to himself. "When your other sister was grieving because you were lost so long it never would stop raining. Now you are back with me and this storm. Now what I want to know is the motive the elements in sympathy with us or something. Did it celebrate your return by doing this or was it a vengeance for the sorrow of our disappearance?"

"Everybody says when we are in trouble our persecutors the elements go mad and Jennie and I'm afraid it is true. So even if close a have come to our rescue

"Better be a rain coat for you self and us" said Angelina. "The nurse says Jerry is ready to accompany us and so is father, and she said she has every thing needful for the baby."

"And oh Penrod describe careful Begged Jennie when you get your uniform. I insist that you don't get one too large for you like you did the last time. I declare we have half a mind to go with you and help you select one."

Penrod laughed.

"I have a whole mind that you had better for since you are back again. I hate like taking poison to have you ought of my sight a minute," he said patting her head. Then he turned to General Hindermine. "We will go as soon as possible general and if you can I want you and the aide de camp, the latter who seems afraid of water to accompany us. We won't be molested."

"And I believe that no one would dare hurt us now, or even detain us while Penrod is with us" said Jennie proudly.

"Put we will have to be careful just the same," begged Angelina.

"I know" said Penrod and--and--

"Hist, there is some one listening to us behind that door" whispered Jennie whose angel possession instinct warned her of that even though she had heard no sound. Penrod went quickly to the door he heard running footsteps following and quickly opened the door. The tall man was just running down the hall but at the sight of Penrod he slung a long dagger which he had in his hand directly at Penrod. While the prince nimbly dodged the flying dagger he had drawn his own knife and flung it in return and it imbed itself in the upper very breast killing him instantly. The man fell flat on his back, and Penrod as he stood there beside him was followed quickly by his two sisters Walter and the general while the aide de camp stood in the open doorway his face ashen. Penrod searched through the fallen foe's pocket and drew a long envelope. He tore it open and read it's contents.

"It's Francis Kellory, one of Hanley's spy ing cut throats" he said. "I guessed so but it was his life or mine." The orderly had picked up the dagger thrown at Penrod by the man. Penrod drew his own out of the mans chest and wiped it clean. His sisters were for a moment horrified but they had seen the man fling the dagger while it was fortunate that their brother had flung his knife simultaneously and aimed good as the man was armed with a brace of double barreled plainblin rifles. Besides a sabre. Penrod took away the weapons and handed them to the aide de camp.

The body was hastily removed.

"Don't tell your sisters about this incident or they'll be scared" said Penrod.

"We won't said Angelina when she had by now recovered from her horror and excitement. "Was he a spy for real? What does that note say you read."

"It's an order from Hanley to find for sure whether I rescued you and Jennie or not. Well Hanley won't find out from this one that is sure. This is what he gets for saving my life, and then slinging his dagger at me. I suppose he intended to attack you if he could. You can read the note you yourselves. I must prepare for the boat ride into Pandora."

"They said good bye to the others in general Hindermine headquarters and at last started on the journey toward Pandora. The trip through the wooded area was a thing to be remembered as long as they lived.

"Just the things we have seen coming out of the forest in which we have been lost would fill a book," said Angelina to the group within the boat (not the goat)

"I wouldn't want to read it," said Penrod suddenly shuddering.

"No I" said Jennie. "Oh boys you don't know how grand you look in the new uniforms you have on"

"What's the matter with our uniforms," said Walter looking down at the very short trousers and the very long purple coat he was wearing. "I don't see but what I am right but doesn't Penrod look cuty cute? Kind of Lord Fauntleroy effect."

Every one stared at Penrod, who looked himself over in surprise.

"It's all they had had at that confounded store we went to that would fit me. Why do I look more than a prince."

"I'm afraid so" said Jennie. "You are dressed more better than you ever were before."

"I don't see why I didn't just wear the things we had on" Walter complained.

"I guess not" said Penrod. "We would not look respectful after our uniforms were so torn up in that far away yesterday afternoon. Why Walter sees how dressy we are now. We look like somebody a bunch of em. We have got sample clothes from the best of Kingdoms in Europe. Europe. See how dignified that makes us. Take your self Walter you look as much a prince now as I do."

"But I'm not you Penrod" laughed Walter.

"Wow," said Penrod. "Excuse me Walter old fellow I didn't mean to be disrespectful to my self or you. We are all in the same fix as far as clothes go. Pen"

Jennie and Argeline look dressed up for a big party than one trip through a flood. "All the world is a little queen" he quipped "and then in a little queen."

Safe on board the small gasoline launch our party found that they were utterly tired out. They had had no sleep because of their excitement of the early part of the night, and then because of the sudden and terrific storm. While the drive continued onward with the boat they slept for nearly three or four hours, and then were furiously hungry. The house of the traveler went swiftly, without accident. Emperor Vivian himself sat with his three good little children, and they found him as always a most delightful and amusing companion. He had since they were first born developed an alarming fondness for his holy and brave little children and his two good grown sons. Penrod himself decided to commence a diary. He said he would never be able to remember every single thing that was happening, and going to happen and he did not want to forget it. Penrod planned to have an even an afternoon and evening with all the home Army pay and irascible with his sisters and tell them all that had happened.

"And you Jim and James who rescued my two sisters at the opening of the squabble will be Exhibit A" and he declared clapping Walter on the shoulder. The river voyage or flood voyage drew to an end as all voyagers will. As they were approaching within sight of the outskirts of the city and they were coming to where there wasn't much water any more and the boat soon would not be able to go any further in the distance they saw a lot of refugees of the battle of Depressionville on the firm land, and every body was packed up with what rifles they had been able to bring away with them during their flight. Every body at sight of the gasoline launch coming through the flood waters which was a novel sight to them talked and stared as the boat grunted on the firm ground. Because of so many people and soldiers about the landing seemed so full and confused, and as he stepped off with his father and sisters Penrod ordered some of the curious crowd to draw back to give them a place to set foot on firm ground.

"Come on Walter what's keeping you" said Penrod. "Get off the boat and come on quick. I can see it."

Penrod was shaking violently, and his teeth chattered. "What ails you Prince" said Walter speaking in English. "See what?"

"Penrod answered in Abbeonnanian Pandora. There's my other dear sisters are in the hospital" a dry sob choked him. "Oh" he said "I didn't know I felt like this. Hurry up old scout. Let's get out."

Voices sounded throughout the crowds of refugees, people stirred and hurried in different directions many carrying umbrellas so that it looked as if there were a forest of them and it was still raining badly and still grumbling loudly with the thunder. The sight of the beautiful little girls, stirred the crowd as a shock of electricity would have done. Penrod then got to one of the good ways and told one of the soldiers to send either for a bunch of horses or a passenger wagon. Walter went to join Penrod who crazy with joy waited almost impatiently for the riding conveyance. Before them especially Jennie and Argeline like the vision of an enchanted land rose the wonderful stretch of the city of Pandora.

Every thing went as smoothly as Penrod had expected. The trip to Pandora was without a hitch. Again and again though they were stopped by soldiers, and each time their identity and the proof papers acted like magic. Indeed they were more than once assisted on their way, or directed to short cuts. They took a good fast bunch of horses too and rode in state until they came to a big inn where they found good food and plenty of it. Then they ordered a big touring cart to proceed to the hospital and they found every available part of the car crammed with offerings for the wounded soldiers. The chauffeur had spent a busy morning talking to the horrified refugees and it is to be believed that the terror he had witnessed at and within the territory of Depressionville and elsewhere elsewhere did not lose in telling. So there were all sorts of offerings for the wounded, bread and dried fish, and cheese; and money, things longed for and often with heart felt prayers of pity. Indeed there were scarcely room for the passengers to sit to crowd in the car. Penrod took the wheel, and the chauffeur still the hero of the occasion, stood on the running board and waved his cap and called his farewells as long as as they were in sight of them. They reached the city of Pandora without accident but it was a long ride up to the hospital, and they even had to ask directions before they finally got there riding through partly flooded city streets with the rain starting to pour down heavily again. When they reached the hospital Penrod's wrist watch stood at twelve. Had it not been for the storm they could have arrived in the morning. In spite of that it had been a most wonderful trip.

Violet and her other sisters that morning after the first hearty breakfast they had ever eaten since their affliction started, did not worry when they observed that Penrod and their two other sisters did not come as soon as promised because they knew the storm would delay and they would not have been surprised if they didn't come until the next day.

Despite the rotten inclement weather that morning, and the distance the Church was from the hospital the little girls had gone to Mass before breakfast, and after first attending the much earlier Mass in the hospital chapel offering their thanksgiving to God with all their heart and promising Him many good things in return a promise which they always always kept. Not expecting that Penrod and their sisters or father wouldn't come back until probably late in the day they had gone out again to Church after breakfast and did not return until about ten thirty, and then awaited the approach of the dinner hour, while they told their brothers all about the good news and how Penrod had rescued them.

"Oh and O got so happy all of a sudden when Penrod told me the good news over the phone," said Violet to her brothers James. "At first I believed it was too good to be true but then Jennie and Argeline also spoke to me. And Penrod did it, Penrod did it. All" gabbled Violet her arms tight around her brothers neck. "Oh James, James dear I and my poor sisters are now so happy, but oh how sad we were before and now we are so happy again. Oh I believe it now, I believe it now, it is true as they say it seems as if Penrod can almost accomplish the impossible. I didn't know any one in the world could be quite so happy. And he captured two women who had been oh so cruel to them, and injured their heads. Oh it seems like it had been so long ago since they were lost and yet it was only twenty six days, and we were so unhappy about it we couldn't bear to even tell you. Rose Mary was here with us yesterday evening after the phone call came and she felt so glad she fairly screamed and danced when I told her the good news and said she would hug and kiss Penrod a hundred times when she saw him. It was such a relief to get such a phone call. Oh James dear I don't know what makes me cry but I'm so proud of our dear Penrod and Penrod, and so happy I don't think I quite know what I'm doing. We told the priest about it after the Novena services for the phone call really came before then and the priest said 'Thank God oh so fervently and blessed us...'"

"At first" said Joyce herself was early this morning after Mass feeling a little blue. It was after we came back from Mass and it was something Lizzie said that took it all away and I've been thinking about it all the time ever since. Well it was just after breakfast and I went into the pantry for a drink of water Sarah and Gloria were there, and Gloria Rose Mary's nurse said warningly that I shouldn't drink any of that water just now as because of the storm the water wouldn't be good for me. Of course I was awfully thirsty and didn't know what to drink, and I thought I'd take chances any way and poured out a glass of water I threw it out for wouldn't drink it under any conditions, and then took some milk. The lady Lizzie didn't know that we had already heard the good news and Lizzie said in the most pleasing way you could possibly imagine as she offered me another glass of cold milk;

"I would like to see you and your sisters when Penrod comes back this morning with two little girls you would give anything to see, and see how happy you will be then I heard of it last night. I guess you won't have long to wait from the looks of things. If Penrod isn't like one of your guardian angels I don't know what he is."

Now Joyce paused to note the effect of her story on her big good brother James was looking calm and serene he took his little sister in his arms and hugged her sympathetically.

"Do you know anything about boys being like guardian angels?" Daisy herself inquired of her brother after a pause. James shook his head.

"I've read about many many of them" he said "but I never really knew any. Penrod is a marvel, and a terror to the enemy. When you said he did yesterday will not be forgotten by the enemy."

"In stories they're generally very cruel to those who harm or try to harm their little brothers or sisters," said Catherine with a tone of unpreventive pride in her voice. "Oh James I should, and we do thank God for giving us such good brothers like you, James and Penrod. Oh God is so good to us and surely for His sufferings we don't deserve it," and poor little Catherine burst into a passion of tears.

"Oh please don't mind me" she sobbed half crying half laughing "I know I'm dreadfully silly, but oh I do love Jennie and Argeline so, and Penrod too and to have a wonderful protecting brother like this---it's it's all like a beautiful dream."

James, Vivian had both arms around Catherine in a moment and was kissing and soothing her as best as he positively could.

"Oh it's just good to see my darling sister very from happiness" he said the tears of joy streaming down his own cheeks. "Why the whole army by now I suppose knows it's really true. Your brothers and ours as well as so good so brave and so fond of you I don't believe he'd ever let any one be cruel to you and your dear sisters and---let them get away with it----"

"Extra Extra" came an interrupted cry from some passing news paper boy. "A massacre yesterday afternoon. Two Vivian girl princesses rescued by Prince Penrod Extra."

"Oh Hettie Hettie" screamed Violet "go out and get a paper hurry." And she fairly flew and was back again in a few minutes with a paper in her hand.

"I'm sorry," she said laughing happily though she looked too as if she was blushing. "The newsboy no matter what I said wouldn't take any money from me, and -- and -- he kissed me."

"Every body here loves my darling sisters and why wouldn't they?" said James as they glanced at the paper and excitedly read the whole details.

"Oh the way he found my two poor sisters he couldn't help it he couldn't help it," cried Joice. "He and all the boy and girl scouts destroyed a whole division of Glandelinian soldiers and Jennie and Angelina are really at Hinder-nines. Oh it is just wonderful. Oh I know a little girl who has a brother-almost like dear good Penrod, and she told us all about it. Oh he was a dreadful one day when a bad boy named Roger stuck his little sister. The bad boy was so scared he ran away after that. Oh -- oh Penrod is oh so wonderful."

"But goodness me I didn't think Penrod could do anything like that only a boy," said Prince J. James looking at the head lines over and over again. "I don't understand how Penrod could have done all this but he did."

"I couldn't hardly believe it at first either," said Joice. "Oh James how lovely it would be if we could have the chance to make for them a fine reception when they come to day. They couldn't come this morning for the storm no doubt delayed them. We enjoy the loud storm but we'd like better if it had come at day as we didn't sleep. All that noise kept us awake though we did watch the storm it was so exciting. Oh James dear how lovely it would be yet more if you and Genevieve didn't have to fight in the war any longer and could come and live with us again. And as old as she is Mrs. Jerry is so nice and pretty. Oh when they come we'll be oh so much more happier yet."

Before James could answer some one knocked first on the door and Violet and Daisy went forth to open it. It was Billy Brown himself come to see the little Princesses. He greeted the little girls in his usual unusual friendly way, and then they sat down about James bed.

"I thought you two sisters were back?" said Billy looking disappointed. "I'm afraid it was a false alarm and yet you look so happy again."

"No it wasn't said Joice" as Billy hastily hung up his rain jacket, and sitting down on a chair between the girls he drew Daisy to his side and she placed a friendly arm around his neck. "He spoke to Jennie and Angelina ourselves. The storm delayed them. There must have been a flood in camp."

"And the paper read a lot of it," said Violet and she handed the boy the news.

"There was a pause and Joice's arms had tightened about two of her other young sisters Hettie and Catherine, and when Billy spoke his voice though low, and steady was very kind for he was always a kind boy, and a crazy over-good little girl.

"It makes me feel good to see you little girls are happy again," said he. "I could you be more happier if they came here now?"

"Of course it would," said Violet. "Penrod done a dreadful thing to the enemy for what they did to Jennie and Angelina, and it served the Glandelinians right. I've read about wonderful boy and girl scouts in books, and I know a little girl who has a boy like that too. Oh Billy will you stay with us until Penrod comes with our sisters?"

"I'd sure be glad to," said Billy grinning as he read the news. "So Prince Penrod smashed that Glandelinian cavalry with only boy and girl soldiers. Gosh I'm sorry; a wasn't in that fight. I'd like to have struck a blow for you and them too, and no boy and girl scouts got hurt. That's better still."

"Oh Billy" said Hettie "don't you think you might persuade Penrod to join his boy scout troop --- he likes you very much."

"I might try," said Billy still grinning "but perhaps it wouldn't be of any use. I belong to the Tigers and might not be able to be transferred."

"Oh yes it would --- I'm sure it would," said Violet. "That is it would if you would tell him we told you to ourselves. You have been his friend and we too have come to love you so very much. If you want to have good adventure you could join the vivianites. They are all good ones too."

Billy laughed.

"You funny beautiful little girl angel," he said kissing the flushed face. "Yes I'll try, but suppose you brothers were to say he would only let me be in his troop on one condition, what would happen then?"

"What kind of a condition?" asked Joice anxiously.

"The condition that I should be his aide de camp."

For one moment, Violet and her sisters sat and stared in blank amazement, but Joice who was a little older and had caught the note of gladness in Billy's voice had already grasped the whole situation and flung both arms around Violet's neck.

"Oh James dear, and my dear best sister and friend," she cried half crying and half laughing "don't you understand what he means. He will be a boy scout in Penrod's Penrod's command and as an aide de camp."

"And when he comes here with Jennie and Angelina oh sisters dear won't you be happy?" said James.

"Happy?" repeated Violet "why wouldn't we be. We sure know it is true -- that he and dear Jennie and Angelina are really coming."

A few minutes later late Joice looking extremely happy now though her eyes were red, and with her smallest sisters Daisy and Hettie clinging to each hand, and followed by the others went out to meet Jack Evans who was coming down the hall with Hendro Dargan. At the sight of Jack Evans who was coming down the hall hand and springing forward threw herself impetuously into his arms.

"Oh Jack, Evans dear, Oh Jack Evans dear," she cried half smothering him with kisses. "Our sisters are coming back with Penrod. We are so glad, so glad -- I don't know what to do myself, I feel as if I'd like to fly."

And her sisters like happy robins crowded around Evans who kissed Joice and them heartily.

"How funny to think of how they were rescued, during a fierce conflict with the enemy so easily whipped, and by our little brother," cried Violet, clapping her hands, and skipping about the hall in the excess of her excitement and delight.

And what we will say to Penrod when he comes. Oh he is so good to us. He smashed the enemy and rescued my sisters easy oh what fun what fun, why were we not there to join in the fight. And she went off in peals of laughter in which she was joined by all the others as she led Evans into the room to see James her wounded brother. Evans greeted Prince James warmly for he was glad to see his great friend again and getting along so wonderfully that he was sitting up in bed.

At eleven thirty according to hospital rules a visiting hour was up and Violet and her sisters returned to their room with the intention to prepare for dinner. Violet being the last, had in her excitement and hurry forgot to close the door. They cleaned their faces and hands and straightened out their hair. When she stepped out she saw Violet suddenly turned around.

"He screamed with delight and surprise. How did they come in without being heard. There stood Jennie and Angelina right before her, and Penrod was standing in the doorway grinning with Walter Starling. He heard some noise and looking saw Joice and Catherine being held by or suddenly surprised by their father."

With a shriek of uncontrollable delight, the little girls near at hand seized Jennie and Angelina in an embrace of such fervent enthusiasm that they were for the moment rendered quite speechless, and believe me their father and Penrod and Mrs. Jerry got equally as loving a reception equally as loving a reception. It was such a happy reunion and Walter Starling enjoyed it immensely.

And with all that their sorrow gone they all were able that evening to partake of a very good supper in the dining room (the boom) for guests on in the hospital on the first floor. After the supper an Angelina and Jennie took turns in telling of their experiences from the time of the attack on the train until their rescue from the Glandelinian cavalry by Penrod and his boy and girl scout (pout) squadrons.

"And your cry of my name even at that distance sounded so plaintive and full of distress that it moved me like nothing else could," said Penrod. "But as I said before there had been no need of you crying out my name for I saw you and Angelina with my powerful glasses, and saw that Glandelinian officer strike you across the face with the sabre flatly, who was he?"

"I don't know," said Jennie. James and Walter killed him at the first onrush of the attack, as the officer made at us to kill us to prevent our rescue. He was the one who had the lock key to the locks of those round things but we lost him during the big fight."

"I wouldn't beef," said to go any where with Penrod now," said Violet. "He can do almost anything for us. Only," she confessed "He wanted to go to the woods to find you Jennie and Angelina too, and we knowing the dangers of those woods wouldn't let him for fear he would be lost and never return."

"I don't don't he would have been if he had a lot of knowledge of wood craft like we have," said Jennie. "We were not lost in the forest, we were really afraid to come out until we were sure we were free of the persecutors. We knew the woods well. We were in the forest quite a while before the forest fire overtook us and drove us to the lake, and so the papers said we perished did it. Who were the rangers who found those dead bodies I wonder?"

"The head rangers of the forest," said Penrod. "As they were the only two little girls found in the forest they thought sure it was you and Angelina."

"We escaped from the flames easily and quickly," said Jennie. "And the water of the river and lake in spite of the fire was cold and clear and almost chilled us at first after facing that dreadful heat."

"Are those two women Glandelinians that were captured and who were so mean to you?" asked Joice.

"I don't know," said Jennie looking at Walter Starring. "Walter was captured by the husband of Martha and his henchmen who were dressed like Glandelinians. Maybe he knows, for the women spoke only Glandelinian."

"I'm not sure what they are," said Walter, "but their faces don't look at all Glandelinian, but foreign and so does that woman's husband. They kidnapped Angelina and Jennie from General Hirsdale's grounds. General Hirsdale sent soldiers after them but they escaped."

"And you said you had no one to witness for you Jennie," said Penrod.

Jennie looked in surprise at Walter.

"Why Walter how do you know they kidnapped me?" said he in surprise while Angelina gasped in her surprise.

"I saw them, and so did Henry Ivan. That is why we trailed them, and then ran into their confounded trap. And then he gave the details of his experience and why the Women Martha wanted to poison him and his friend. And told how cleverly they had been tied to tables, and of their rescue too by the boy scouts. "So these two women stole my sisters even with the purpose to use for their own wicked schemes and even cheated the Glandelinians who sheltered them in their camps in the bar gain," sneered Penrod. "Treacherous snakes, treacherous to us and the Glandelinians too. Stole them from General Hirsdale's headquarters and beat my sisters up. Well Walter dear your testimony during the Court 'an shall to-morrow morning will be a surprising one indeed, a shocking one. It's a good thing one of you boys stayed awake long enough that night to overhear it."

"Do you think those foolish women will face such a dreadful penalty?" asked Violet, her eyes dilated in the horror of it all. "Such an awful death?"

"That's up to the jury and who composes the jury," said Penrod. "Father said early this morning that I am to be the judge, but the trial will be in a Tribunal in a building of this city, and the jury this time by his orders will consist of his staff generals. What ever sentence they'll decree."

"But if it comes about it'll be a horrible death for those women," said Catherine.

"Maybe so but they put their foot into it not me," said Penrod. "You know the law in this country exempt a grown person from the penalty of kidnapping in these times, unless the kidnapping had no evil designs. Then it'll be heavy fine or imprisonment only, but these women had wicked evil designs according to the testimony of Walter, and of Jennie and Angelina. The woman and her husband even double crossed the Glandelinian general Hirsdale by swiping my sister's under his very eyes. Then because they found they were hard pressed by Christian spies, the women decided to hire the escort of that caverly division, massacre, and bring them to Manley's army where they felt they could be safe from interference by the spies. I intercepted that move in the bud. I didn't capture the women. Walter James and Tim did and the generals double crossed him too who was killed by lightning in that storm last night. So he is out of the trial."

"Why was he struck by lightning during the storm?" asked Jennie who with Angelina had not held a single word about it.

"Yes indeed he was," said Penrod. "The sentries who guarded him were killed also. There were many places struck by lightning last night. It was some terrific storm."

"Oh I wouldn't like to be in his place now," said Violet, feeling dreadfully shocked. "Our blessed Lord died to save all souls and yet these Glandelinians won't repent and save themselves. Such an awful number of those poor miserable fools being killed in battle. Some body said to me once almost jokingly that if this war goes on for another couple of years there won't be room enough for all the dead Glandelinians in Hell. It is terrible."

"But surely it isn't our fault," said Penrod. "Even as good as you little girls are you cannot even by prayer and your sufferings bring the conversion of cruel Manley whom you said was long before the war your friend. Now he is an enemy that not only won't repent, but is so wicked, harsh and cruel, and have done such dreadful things that cannot with out sin be described of or written that all Heaven itself won't listen to your prayers for his conversion. If a man is in that situation then I'm afraid mostly all the Glandelinians under him and his Confederates are equally as bad if not worse. I'm afraid they do things that even in this life God seems to refuse to forgive them for. Think Hirsdale's bad luck about that lightning was a plan from Heaven. He was responsible for Jennie and Angelina being in the hands of those two cruel women and I believe God waited for that thunder-storm to strike back. But he was saved from a more horrible death which he would have received on the morning now. But what are we thinking of. It's way past our bed time and we are still reasoning up. That will father and y. And we want to get up early to-morrow to prepare for the trial."

"Since Jennie and Angelina returned I'm so happy to go to sleep to night," said Violet. "And my sisters are too. I can see that."

"Maybe another thunder-storm will come up and wake us again," giggled Daisy.

"You sure do enjoy the thunder-storms," said Penrod. "Some people are scared to death when it thunders and lightnings. But I don't believe there will be any to night, and it is not quite so sultry either and a fine breeze is blowing in through the open windows. That ought to give us a chance to make up for the sleep we lost last night."

The generals selected to be the jury in the Tribunal couldn't be on hand because of activities threatening again along the Christian lines, and they could not get off duty to be there. It was a sort of disappointment to Violet and her sisters for many good reasons they didn't always like jury duty. Most of all the boy and girl scouts too were so busy that only a few of them could be selected, and so Violet and her four sisters and seven chiefs of the boy and girl scouts had to serve on the jury if they wanted to see justice done in behalf of Jennie and Angelina who were the defendants. Henry Ivan and Walter Starring came to be witnesses.

Penrod was the judge and Emperor Ivan was to be the complainant. Emperor Ivan was the first to stand up and tell his own part of the story, tell of the loss, how Angelina and Jennie were missing, why, and of his sorrows and the sorrows of his daughters. Penrod though being the judge told then his story of the discovery and rescue of Angelina and Jennie and how he found them, and he showed the rings, with the chains attached. All the while the two women out in their places under heavy guard and looked quite scared. As wicked as they were, they really were weaklings and cowards.

Then Angelina and Jennie were called upon to give their testimony and they didn't leave out a single detail. They couldn't do so was to lie, and then the two witnesses gave their details, of the kidnapping, and of their trailing the kidnappers, and of their being caught, and all the other details until the boy scouts rescued them. When Martha's sister was called upon to give an account of herself, she would not stand up and say a single word.

"If you refuse to talk," said Penrod, "don't you know it'll go harder with you. You refuse to say a word in your own defense."

"I didn't kidnap the girls your sisters," said the woman shaking in her terror. "My sister Martha did, and brought them to me for fear of pursuit. I barged their hands up against the walls because they tried to beat my sister up for trying to make Angelina commit a sin."

"If I'd been there at the time you tried to make her sin I'd have done worse," said Penrod. "I'd have shot the two of you like mad dogs. What are you two Glandelinians?"

"No we are Germans. My name is Jane Zimmermann and my sister's name is Martha."

"What was the idea of kidnapping my two sisters when they were prisoners of General Hirsdale?"

"I wanted to get the reward that Manley offered for their capture and deliverance."

"But you double crossed the general to get that reward. He himself had no right to arrest them when they were only seeking shelter from a storm. I'll claim he had no right to touch them if they spied on him. His crazy generals and Manley too keep our camps alive with secret Glandelinian spies, not only try to learn intentions now but of poisoning my sisters. And you crown it all by kidnapping them with the purpose of using them for your own vile purposes. You did not kidnap them with the purpose of the reward. You intended to give Jennie to your sister and Angelina keep her for yourself and try to make them live the miserable lives you yourselves live. The whole details have been told to me. That was the idea of these?" and Penrod help up the strange neck rings and chains.

"So the little girls wouldn't get away."

"Chaining my holy little sisters as if they were the worse of felons ever known," said Penrod, his face very red. "You two are worse than the worst Glandelinians I ever met with. And your husband was complicated in it and so was another man. They were wise I suppose not to accompany you with the caverly for they must have suspected that was coming, having heard of me. Do you know that your doing is not a war act as you are foreigners instead of Glandelinians having admitted it yourselves. Your's is a vile crime, and don't you know that kidnapping of any children no matter who they are is punishable by death or by life imprisonment in this country?"

"But I didn't kidnap them from the National camps," said Martha. "I kidnapped them from General Hirsdale and they say the offense is only there and there for proved they wanted to abuse only children of Abbeinnia to get even as they called it With Our Dear Blessed God because of the suffering and hard life they had gone through since their own childhood. They had also been treated cruelly, cruel for they too when children had been kidnapped by some body in far away Russia Russia Russia and were treated as cruelly as any one would ever do to treat children. They were all right at first then and prayed to God to cause the police of Poland and their parents to find and liberate them from their kidnappers, but as it seemed he didn't hear for no rescue came they turned away from Him when they grew older, and when finally having the chance to run away from their tormentors they soon became the women they were. Jim and her sister were responsible for the deaths of a good number of children who were kidnapped by them, and who died under their cruel treatment. They got away with all that too because in that country the kidnapping was easy to be accomplished without hindrance or punishment afterwards. I suppose they thought they could do that here too, but they put their foot into it when they kidnapped Angeline and Jennie. They only said they wanted to send them to Manley, when in fact it was their purpose to keep each one of our beloved sisters and treat them as they had the other unfortunate children. Now they have found out what it is to kidnap Abbeinnian children, and they made it worse for themselves to kidnap the Abbeinnian children of the Royalty."

"Would it be justified if those two women repented before to me now and your sisters could have the sentence withdrawn?" asked James.

"That is up to our Government authorities. For that reason then we could suspend the sentence until they are reached I suppose but I could see it in their wicked faces they would never repent of their sins. They are too deeply sunk as you say in the Slough of Despond to get out. Their hearts are too hardened by sin and hateful ness to ever repent, for then them to repent would be a miracle. Violet and her four sisters were told never to tell it I know, not to any one, but they had the vision of an angel in the Jury Council room for I could tell that by their strangely transformed appearance when they came out so quick and decided the verdict. True certain reasons that angel knew the women would not repent and decided the sentence himself. No one can tell me about persons or person persons meeting with angels. I can tell that on appearance without them telling me. I'm surprised those women were not stricken by the angels, when they beat out two good little sisters for refusing to sin, but then many awful things have been done to all of them by the Glandelinians and nothing happened right away. But they met the most dreadful fates afterwards. My sisters told me. There's their enemy James Deldon for instance. Wanted by the Glandelinians as well as by us. My lotze wants him for stealing Jennie from his lines when the general had made out her freedom papers to give her back to Manley. That's a crime in even Glandelinia. If a child slave is set free by a Glandelinian general it is a death penalty for any one to steal them away to sell into slavery again. I don't know what he did to our side, but great rewards are offered for him by our own authorities. But he is said to be the main enemy of my sisters, and he also caused Violet to be accused of something she never did and that was of setting a big child slave place full of children on fire, and of concealing dynamite in her pockets when it was done by the same party who set the fire himself. Deldon knew, the guilty one, he hired that man to do it, and hired him to stick the explosives in her pockets as a proof that Violet was the fire bug. HE'd get the worse deal from us if ever he was caught again. But he always escapes."

Vivian Girls accomplish a great spying exploit.

VOLUNTEERS. VOLUNTEERS.

It was three weeks after the frightful battle of Arentburg Run or Glorinda, and the ravaging force at first for the enemy to win this great battle, was like the wicked expecting to merit his avenging. All seemed gone for the moment. The losses of the foe had been unspeakably terrific, horrible in killed and wounded alone, and great numbers had been taken prisoners.

Terrible had the losses of the Christians of the Christians in prisoners, greater than what the enemy had suffered, but as formerly as other times, as Hanson himself knew, the enemy were never able to hold any great number of prisoners, and during all the war up to this time innumerable Christians prisoners had made their escape, and returned to their Christian lines. The situation was indeed indeed seriously surprising, for the three vanquished Manleys. Their hopes of holding the Arentburg Run region was out of the question, and even the very first week after the battle, the whole remaining remnants of the shattered Glandelinian army, had retreated for the distance of 200 miles, and were still retreating with the conquerors in full pursuit.

Despite the harrowing experiences of the bloody battle, the Christian side was very joyful over the great victory that had been won and the whole Christian army was in high spirits. The Vivian Girls also, and all their friends showed their rapture over the great victory, having rapidly forgotten the harrowing scenes of the titanic conflict.

Violet and her sisters enjoyed the long and vigorous march, which had hardly been stopped as long as the wicked order of God kept on retreating. All that distance the pursuing Christians had kept the enemy running in a single oration of confusion, and thousands of Christians had been taken for every dash. It was the biggest and most headlong rout of the largest giant Glandelinian army in the war before. Bicknell had been separated for over fifty miles, from the main body, his army being scattered. He hesitated at the delay to the response of his resignation, which he had sent in, and in secret, glad that the Christians had been so victorious, he gathered as much of his army as possible, and purposely allowed himself to be surrounded, surrendered, and to stay away from the wicked enemies of God, he refused to accept a parole, which was offered, by General Evans who knew of his recent kindness toward Violet and her sisters. Shoenann's army was scattered like the leaves in a hurricane, and had been driven forty miles from Manley's army. Other various commands had been scattered just as bad, and many other divisions had been disorganized beyond recovery.

Many times during the retreat, the three Manleys had strove desperately to rally the army which was so widely scattered, but in vain, nothing could be done, and the retreat continued in the same hopeless panic. Manley had been driven within two weeks time to the distance of over eight hundred miles, in a continuous rout and with further losses, that was appalling, and by this time every division of the army, was within two hundred miles of the coast. Ten times the three Manley's in succession, narrowly escaped capture.

They had been about to give up all hope when unfortunately a new Glandelinian army under General Garfield Joseph Barling, stopped in the way and though they could not under any conditions, stay the Christian advance for the time being, they spread themselves as far with batteries and artillery, and fought battles of severe and savage character at Atina, Bauciu, Quicksilver, Chmarea, Bellington, Gibson Crawford, Crawford, Brendal, Mellans, Kimball, Teshney, Motrose, Hendricks at Glare, Kaufmann, Heddaran, Feltenburg, Bicknell, Allenberger, Glade St Glare, Glade St Glare, Adelo, Cantania, Candale, Gibbons, and Cockington that they managed to cover the retreat of the scattered armies under the three Manleys, but as yet there was no help for the three Manleys to help their scattered and scattered together again.

Even with their slight successes, it took very savage fighting with the wicked order, and the Glandelinians within those two weeks of severe conflicts occurring November 18th or starting that date I mean, suffered the horrible loss of 29,417,339, in killed wounded, and prisoners.

for Hanson's army, and all the others soon found themselves, far from all foes, and all along had their own line of war they had drove the Manley's clean out of Claverina, and Angolinda, and were waiting for the first notice, from the Angolindian and Abolomulan governments to rush their great armies into Glandelinda for the first and final issue.

In every one of these twenty nine battles, the Christian loss was in killed, and prisoners, had been 3,000,555 or over, but many thousands of the prisoners, had escaped, and thus increased the losses surprisingly. The war indeed was carried on in a surprising manner.

As a new army of Glandelindians confronted general Jack Evans, army, and as he felt through some reasons that nothing could endanger the little girls now, he decided to send them with all the other boy friends, to learn the intentions of the two Glandelindian generals. He sent them, and as he was soon to realize to the undoing of this Glandelindian army. Quickly an assembly the little girls prepared themselves for the interior and toward evening set out.

The Glandelindians in this new army did not know the Vivian girls as the others did, and they were readily mistaken for Glandelindian boy scouts. The Glandelindian general in command of the whole army also did not know the little girls, and thinking that they were with their boy companions boy scouts, sent by Manley, gave them the post important papers, concerning his positions, the extension of his line, how many men he had, how strong his batteries of cannon were, and the names of all his staff generals, besides his own name.

The little girls were able to go with their boy friends, from camp to camp, secretly writing down everything they detected, and then receiving a message to take to Manley, they set off toward his lines by rail, but did not intend to take the message as supposed, but to spy on him also.

After leaving the camp he however, and before they started, Starring was sent to take the important papers, to the girls to take them which he did, the rest waiting until he returned.

Then boarding a train, which was going toward the town town in front of which Manley's lines were concentrating, they reached, it in two days, and then leaving the town they sent off toward Manley's small army.

This small force had been only partially rallied along the southern part of the Glandelindian boundary line. Approaching the vicinity of the enemy's lines, the army halted to survey its positions, and as they were thus halted, who should come toward them, but the three boy scouts who resembled Starring and his companions, who had made prisoners of the little girls at Claverina.... The three scouts really recognized the party without doubt, but as the three boys started to dash away, all in the party opened a withering fire and brought down their horses. The three boys seeing themselves cornered, threw up their hands. The party rode up to them, disarmed the three boys, and tied their arms behind them. Finding papers on the three lads, others were made for the rest, and then the three lads were forced to lead them within Manley's lines.

"If you once open your mouths, or betray us, we'll make you know how you made us feel, when you treated us like dogs, at Claverina, when we were in Baldwin's camp as prisoners." Said Violet. "You tell the guards that we are the Vivian girls, and we'll show you like dogs. Forward."

The three boys realizing the nature of the little girls, obeyed without a word, and soon they were secretly within Manley's lines.

The three boys were then led to a solitary spot, where high grass grew, and here they were tied hand and foot, and left to lie there, and to await their rescue by any Glandelindian soldier, or guard who would happen to see them. They were not within the heart of Manley's lines, and they realized that they had to be careful. They were questioned by many soldiers, but not recognized, as they were disguised too cleverly.

Soon as they were passing down a company street, one of the little girls having a substitute message for Manley, a general rode up to them hastily. It was General Myloto himself, and he recognized the little girls, and their companions. But as fierce a fighter as he was, and a Glandelindian, he was human, and did not allow his soldiers to seize them, stating that he had recognized their favorite boy scouts, and lying, in saying that he never saw the Vivian girls, and that the children were some others.

It was evident that General Myloto was going to resign command as he had no hope of seeing the end of the Glandelindian war....

He stopped his horse abruptly and dismounted. "I recognized you spies." He said in a whisper. "But I do not care what you are going to do. But for God's sake be careful. If any of my wicked officers recognized you I will have to re-arrest you, and will have a tremendous time, in getting you out of their clutches."

He gave them advice and warning, and then remounted and rode away. Presently up came General Ambrose Fuller, he recognized them also. At his presence however, they suddenly dashed away and were out of sight, before any of the wicked and bad men saw them, and forgetting himself in his own excitement General Ambrose Fuller shouted: "SPIES IN THE NAME OF GLANDELINDIA! HA! HA! SPIES. SPIES."

"WHAT IS THE MATTER WITH YOU GUARDS! ASLEEP ON DUTY? THE VIVIAN GIRLS AND A COMPANY OF THEIR BOYSCOUTS ARE WITHIN OUR LINES."

There was a hubbub in a moment, and the company street was swarming with a stream of excited soldiers.

"Which way did they go?" cried one of the officers. "I do not know," thundered the frate general. "But they are in the camp. I'm honoring, murdering, and massacring children, but will not stand for any dog-dogged spies, no matter who they are. They are in the camp and must be captured, but not molested and roughly treated understand!"

A search was immediately started. Squads of men examined every portion of the camp, every possible place for hiding, while many others wandered into the woods and fields, and so rigid was the search, that if the little girls had really fled the camp, they would have been captured without delay. But their hiding place was literally in Ambrose Fuller's tent, and as he came to be discovered there, it could not get him to raise the alarm, when the whole party covered him with pistols.

"We are fir friends of yours, and we know your recent kind, ness of you toward us, but nevertheless we don't care to take any chances at all." Said Violet. "You no doubt would not have us shot, but nevertheless you yourselves are warlike in the hands of Manley and so we don't take chances with even you. We have paid you an unexpected visit, and call the searchers you may do so if you wish, but before we are captured, you will not take us children alive. You have once been good to us, but by your commands we have heard you utter just a moment ago we believe you have changed, and so do not trust you any more. Boys tie him up quickly."

The order was obeyed. The general desperate as he was, being too wise to resist the children when he knew as well they tied him up, and gagged him, and fastened him on the bed, they set two boys to watch for the Glandelindians, while the rest sat to work reading the contents of the tent.

They found a number of important letters which they took possession of, important documents, giving the details of the intentions of the three Manleys, how far the separated Glandelindian armies were still scattered, and of the strength and positions of the scattered armies. Ambrose Fuller in the meantime tried to work himself loose but of no avail, Violet and her sisters having tied him too firmly.

The important letters the little girls gave to Starring, and General Penrod, received something else, while the other boys got the remainder, and the little girls dispatched them to make a getaway, and bring the important papers to the Christian lines as soon as they got separated from them.

Then the two boys who were on guard, seeing the Glandelindians approaching the tent, gave the warning, and seeing that the coast was clear, in the rear, they quickly scrambled under the tent and made toward a building, a couple of hundred feet from it.

It being exceedingly dark, and it is possible for the approaching Glandelindians to see the fugitives. The children ran into two guards however, who would have yelled, but the boys threw them down by tripping them, and then hit them with the butts of their guns, rendering them senseless. The lads with the important papers, managed to secure four horses, there being four of the, and off they raced madly for the rear of the army's line.... They passed safely without detection through the whole camp, but racing past the sentries so widely they were heavily fired upon.

Two of the boys were dismounted, but the other two hastily held their comrades onto to their own horses, and shooting down all that dared to pursue they managed to escape through the line of confused sentries and raced down the road through the open woods....

This incident caused such excitement, that the Glandelindians were fully aware that there were successful and most dangerous spies among their lines. The soldiers who had been approaching Fuller's tent went in and finding him tied up, released him. He was so mad and humiliated over the affair that he blamed all of these spying parties, declaring that it was from their lack of watchfulness, that the spies had been able to surprise him and that under no conditions would he lead or direct the pursuit, and search, and he did not give a care if they were never caught.

"And he said: 'If you capture the children bring them to me. If you do anything out of the way to them I'll make you wish you had never been born. I They are spies, and it is right before God Almighty to shoot them as spies, but just the same I'll allow no children, no matter who they are to be murdered in cold blood. They are prisoners, remember, prisoners, and not dogs understand!' And under his breath he muttered: 'What a damn fool I was to expose them. I simply forgot myself that's all. And now there is no telling, but that they suspect me as a wicked enemy, and so may treat me as such. For my part I heartily hope they get away, because if they do get captured, they will be hanged like mice. If they run into my path again I'll allow for my mistake. To harbor them who are doing their best to defeat the wicked Manleys, whom I hate myself, worse than a poisonous snake, is no wrong or treachery, and I could not have committed treachery toward God for exposing them. But I forgot my self.'"

In the meantime the little girls unknown to him, had hid between his tent and the one adjoining, not being seen in the darkness, and had heard all he said. They had realized it was almost impossible to reach the house quick enough to escape capture, and so had taken refuge between the tents, determined to fight to the last should they be discovered. They were confident now that Ambrose Puller was just the man they had held the opinion of. They decided however to avoid his men at all costs, for they knew that Ambrose Puller was more treacherous and would not obey his commands. So as soon as they knew the coast was clear, they hurried quietly and quickly toward the building, having rapidly changed their disguise, appearing now asurchins, being dressed in rags, having secured these clothes, out of pullers tent, which a shirt was used by Glandelinian boyscouts.

They reached the building, showed their passes, to the guards, and were admitted into the house. At this time the three Glandelinian boyscouts had been found, tied hand and foot, in a field of tall grass, and the news of this discovery passed through the Glandelinian camp and the Glandelinians were more elated than ever.

The officers were more determined that the spies must be taken, that the soldiers will be held responsible if they do not capture them as soon as possible. A bunch of men soon came up to the house, the officers demanding of the guards:

"Have any boyscouts gone in here?"

"No" Was the answer, "But eight ragged Glandelinian children, were here, and as they showed a pass, we permitted them to enter the building."

"Why you doggone Jackasses, those were the spies."

Thundered the officers. "They have changed their disguises, and even fooled you guards. If they have escaped I'll hold you guards responsible. Forward boys. Twenty of you men surround every exit, and lower window of this house. I and the rest will go in and search for the spies."

His orders were soon carried out, and a quicker than it takes to write it, there was two men at every window, while the officer and the rest of the men went into the house. But they had been too late. Knowing that the place would be surrounded and searched, the little girls had immediately left the building by the cellar trap door, in the rear, and had gone to a part of the camp where nothing of the excitement as excitement was as yet known, and having rechanged their uniforms, were not recognized. They managed by moonlight to take in every detail of the camp, writing down the number of tents they could estimate, and strolling among the batteries, secretly counting the guns as fast as they could, taking them by the forties, and soon had a sufficient number down, when they were approached by three artillery officers.....

"What in the name of Neptune are you children doing here?" Said one of the officers sternly. "Get away you boys or I'll have you punished."

The little girls hurried away, but when the officers were gone, they returned, and counted more of the guns. Then as the officers were approaching again the little girls hid under one of the big guns.

"I thought I saw those boys here again." One of the lieutenants said. "Do you know Bob, I'm suspicious that they are not Glandelinians, boyscouts, but spies!"

"It's true." Said another of the officers. "They are boys exceedingly pretty pretty, and it's unusual to find such beautiful boys. I think they are the Vivian girls."

"You don't say." Cried another lieutenant. "If it is so, we had better get the men search the batteries for them."

The officers at once hurried off and gave the orders. Violet and her sisters however did not wait for the men to begin the search but scampered away into the darkness.....

The the Glandelinians however saw them, and open opened fire, the lights of the many flashes revealing the fugitives darting behind a row of trees and open fire in return.

"Turn some of the cannon of on those trees." Shouted one of the officers. "That'll get them."

Violet and her sisters heard the wicked order, and in the darkness skipped away, to some other part of the camp, and when the foe fired without result, and then searched for the little girls, they could not be found, and the officers and the soldiers, were flabbergasted beyond what we can even think. Now the fun really began. While over 100,000 Glandelinians were searching everywhere possible for the little girls, they were on the pose of Glandelinian boyscouts entering general Gueban Manley's headquarters, which was in the middle of the camp.

They had managed to slip into the room where they observed the Glandelinian generals together in conversation, and hid behind the large portiere hanging in front of the big windows.....

"It's surprising how these christian dogs licked our armies so thoroughly." Said Gueban Manley. "It will be a long time before I or my father and brother can ever engage the Abbeismians again. And our armies are so scattered that we don't know what to do. If the other armies can hold out so successfully in Galvelinia, we may yet be able to revenge our terrible defeat. But we must keep our mouths about the weakness of our condition.....

Evans is confronting general Linx's army and if he only knew his strength he would not stand there long, and it would be a matter of with general Linx or Lynx. I am only 20,000,000 strong, all my other divisions are widely separated, and mostly without resources. My brother John Manley has an army over 45,000,000 strong and Father only has a company just now of about 1,500 men, and is going his best to recover the scattered divisions. So it is seen what a condition we are in. He says dogs yet though, if we hold out, and if the armies which are still in Galvelinia succeed in holding off the other various christian armies, all will be well. And my examining this map which I tore out of a geography, I have discovered a way to frustrate all these dirty christian dogs. General Garrison, and his brother Jemite, are concentrating along the northern extremity of the Aronburgs gun. The ph the navies and warships which we hold in Galvelinia, are in possession of the Abbeismians we have extra strong navies at home, and these we can send up the various rivers, and bombard the christian so dogs from their positions.

If successful we could then try and retake our lost fleets, and if successful in this surprise enterprise, also sent the whole combined to retake McWhirther and recapture Vivian Wokey.

Simultaneously we could send strong armies on land them, and have them assault Fort Marousian and Gibraltar by rear.....

"It's a grand plan" Said general Leo Costello which had put in such a hurricane storm of artillery at Aronburgs gun, but it is risky and if unsuccessful will result in a series of horrible disasters. The strongest Abbeismian fleets are swarming like fish in the bay of Vivian Wokey, and general Evans and Everette True are concentrating all along the landside with forty divisions of Abbeismians, all Concentinians, and to force this great line of 400,000,000 men and 1,500,000 field artillery is a hazardous difficulty. Besides we are not sure if we'll succeed in full filling our plans. The Vivian girls despite the efforts of our men, and officers, are still at large among our camps, and will learn everything."

"They will be caught don't you worry." Said Gueban Manley with a snap of his jaws. "They could not get in here anyhow as the house is too well guarded, and if they did get in, escape would be entirely impossible.

But never mind about them. It's my plans I want attention to. I propose next to withdraw my shattered armies, southward, set word to the king that Glandelinia is threatened with invasion by the Abbeismian and christian dogs, and beg him to organize armies by draft to repel the trespassers. If the king can mobilize the men and have an army of about 556,000,000 men in three months the christian dogs won't progress far in their invasion. I can tell you no matter how many they are against us... The main thing we sorely depend upon, in case of invasion is the strongholds of Progenia or Titantic Fair, a series upon series of fortifications built by the Glandelinian government which took eighty years to build, and which extend for two hundred miles.

These are series of fortifications in a circular form, with a wide space of fifty miles, the entire circle being about two hundred miles round, with a strong fort for every mile. Every city which had been attacked during the first invasion of the christian dogs are now guarded by new series of forts added to these, and so no matter if all our armies are driven from Galvelinia, if Titantic Fair holds out Glandelinia will never be conquered.... But this Christians do not know the strength of these forts, or they will besiege them and harass them till they fall, and will not attack them recklessly as we hope. Each fort is armed with fifty big guns, that throw shells for over twenty miles. In the combined forts, there are other guns numbering over 300,000 in all. They are also surrounded with six lines of sentries, also mounted with heavy cannons. The only way we can fool the Christian dogs, about the fortifications of Atlantis Fair, is by publishing in papers, stating apparently as it would seem, one each other, that the fortifications are very weak and could not hold out against a single assault. Christian dogs are sure to secure these newspapers, and they will spread it among the Christian armies, who will then not suspecting their real strength, attack with recklessness, and we can bring them down to annihilation. No doubt the greater number of us will be thrown against these fortifications, and with these disadvantages, the strength of the Christian dogs will be so badly impaired, that we could end the war just where we want to and show the Christian dogs that wickedness can win any time we want it in spite of the help of all in heaven. "U"

Violet and her sisters had in the meantime wrote down separately all that general Johnson was saying, and thought it the most desperate and peculiar plot of the entire war. The last sentences of Manley however they did not write as it was blasphemy. From where they were, they could see every one, of the wicked glandelinian generals, and every outline of the room besides. There was besides Johnson Manley, Black Brooks, Josephine Jensen, Adelaide Garbo, the new Raymond Richardson Federal, Leonida Helmondia, McKnell, Leonida Helmondia Regina, and twenty other superior officers whom Violet and her sisters had never seen before. Johnson McWhirther was also there, being among the twenty and so was the second general, Jingerand. The table at which they were standing, or sitting, was covered with a large map, which Manley now proceeded to examine. For fifteen minutes he was silent, then he continued, in a more lower tone, which however the little girls heard plainly:

"This is a map which shows the many principal principal seaports of Gl Galvandia closed against us, by the dirty abbeasimians. This is our greatest menace. With this blockade on we could not land fresh armies by either the west or north of Galvandia, and by the south we would have to march them, which we have done at the outbreak of the war, the Christian dogs having stopped all running of every southern train and Northern and eastern lines as well.

If we could get our armies transported up the great Angelinian and Grindia rivers, we would accomplish wonders, but if it could be done, I do not think it could be accomplished without serious loss in lives and ships, as the rivers are patrolled by abbeasimian and Angelinian warships. Now the only way out of the problem is, to strike down all opposition and--"

Violet accidentally upset a vase standing on the window sill, and it fell to the floor with a crash. At once the glandelinian generals were aroused, but before they could make a rush toward where the sound came from, the little girls were out of the building and away into the darkness, having leaped out of the windows which had been open.

Though not having seen them, one of the officers picked up Violet's ribbon, and from this they knew who had been there, and felt sure that all their well made plans were useless. To organize a searching party they did not, knowing it was impossible to capture the little girls.

"It's all off!" said Adelaide Garbo. "It was the desperate little Vivian Girls. They would dare anything to learn our intentions. To capture them is impossible. The war is lost this is all there is to it."

Josephine Jensen said nothing, neither did the others but they looked disconcerted, while Manley alone who commanded the guards, for not being watchful was furious, and he blasphemed God and uttered the vilest defiance against Him and all the living creatures in heaven, and stated that if he had the power he would bring all the devils to fight the Christian dogs and God too. He alone was bound to have Violet and her sisters captive captured, and ordered the whole camp in his vicinity to be scoured for the spies.

But all this availed him nothing. Indeed the brave little girls felt considerable safe any way. They had outwitted their enemies since they entered the camp a number of times, and they were surprised at it themselves. They proceeded on cautiously in the darkness. There was a series of rifle flashes and the little girls heard the whistle of bullets. They were discovered and now again the camp was discovered to be aroused, and expecting the sharp shooters to open fire again, the little girls stood behind the trees.

"Did you men see them?" cried a voice.

"Yes," was the answer from a soldier.

"We fired but did not hit them," cried another.

"They're in hiding somewhere," shouted a captain. There was a hubbub of voices, and a number of figures strided past the trees behind of which the little girls were standing.

"It's strange but they are gone now," said a lieutenant. "They are impossible to capture," cried a second lieutenant. "We cannot find them in this darkness anyway."

The little girls stayed in their hiding places until everything quieted down, and then started away slowly, stepping from tree to tree, halting at every sound, peering about cautiously, and seeing to it that their automatics were well loaded.

They had gone only a short distance when a sharp challenge started them to more caution.

"Halt who goes there? Friend or foe?"

Again Violet and her sisters stood behind trees with their own pistols drawn.

"Halt in the name of me Neptune who goes there?" cried the voice again. Violet and her sisters remained perfectly still.

"I say who in the name of common sense goes there?" Again cried the voice. "How many times have I got to repeat the challenge. It's the most detested luck us glandelinians have any more. First it's spies, then it's secret excitement, on account of their depredations, now it's some disgusting plattering fire, and now it's some disgusting creature in hiding. Corporal of the guard number one. Corporal of the guard number one. Corporal of the guard number one."

There was the sound of many feet and soon a swarm of glandelinians appeared.

"What's the matter?" cried a sergeant.

"The Vivian girls must be around here somewhere sergeant," cried the sentry. Violet and her sisters heard some other voices cry out simultaneously, "For the love of God go to sleep will you."

"Go to sleep your self," cried the sergeant. "There are spies around here. What are you hollering about?"

"There is no doubt that the spies are trying to get through the lines and escape," cried another voice.

"Are let a fellow go to sleep will you?"

"Well go to sleep you poor fool who is hindering you!" cried the sergeant. "Then he continued, 'We'll have to double the guards at this section. The little devils must be caught at all costs and--'"

"Aw go to sleep will you?"

"Go and see who that boom is!" cried the sergeant angrily.

"The men did and soon returned.

"Aw it's only a parrot," said one of the men laughing. "How it got into the lines we know not." And he produced it.

There was a roar of laughter at this.

"I'll double the line of guards at this section," said the sergeant examining the parrot. "I'll make it absolutely sure that they cannot escape."

Then a full silence once more. For a few minutes over the parrot Violet and her sisters had fought a desperate battle with themselves to keep from bursting into an outright laugh. As soon as they recovered, a after laughing quietly to themselves Violet said:

"We cannot escape that way. If we tried to do so we would be shot down."

"We'll have to seek some shelter somewhere and wait until all the excitement we have caused is over. It's hopeless to try to get away just now."

"It doesn't seem possible that we could fail to go through the rear door!" asked Jennie.

"It does!" said Hattie Hattie. "We must be sure you know for if we are ever captured by Manley's glandelinians we will go to heaven before the proper time, and before we could full fill our mission for Angelinians cause. We must keep free under any conditions."

The little girls slowly began retracing their steps and finally reaching an unguarded tent and finding it empty went in.

"I guess we're safe here for a while," said gathering.

Now nevertheless here they decided to stay for a while and examine the words of Manley they had taken down.

Then they crossed with the other notes they had picked up in his headquarters and other things besides. One was a letter which ran as follows: ; ;

"Your excellency: King diandian; a
All the generals of our various glandelinian armies cannot account for the rightful number of christians prisoners who have escaped during the entire war. All those who had been captured after every battle escaped, not some, or a great number, but all, going about one hundred thousand per month or weeks. The vietnam girls have also liberated a great number of prisoners, mostly christian dogs and chil ren, and so probably are to blame for the escape of many hundreds of thousands of prisoners, per week or months, after every battle fought, won or lost.
The battles were over the entire number escaped from or after is as follows/
Cedernine,
Franklin Pierce, a Nadge grane, Francis-tianta, Sub Sunbean Creek,
Francis S. Ithadina gun,
De-whither and Ardolburgs gun,
Little glordina francelanna,
Big-gilthool/Big Bethel,
Je Hine Jen de vietnam,
Himmer Hill,
Jennie Under and Jennie cry,
Erminia gun, and galverine gun,
Pantonburg, or grahame lane,
Big Lighthorn Lanning, and Easter starring.
At these these battles the glandelinian armies ha decaptured many millions of prisoners, and after that none had remained, having all escaped and re turned to the christian lines. Your excellency if you don't listen to the aid soon all is lost."

General Phabum Manley.

This letter was quite important to the little girls, though of no importance to the christian generals and so they decided to keep it. They looked over the other contents and had just finished when it stopped in two glandelinian privates. Though taken by surprise the little girls were not caught napping, and at once covered the men with their automatics and said:

"Throw up your hands men. Your hash is cooked."
The men obeyed sullenly, and violet said:
"We are both cornered, you have cornered you and you men have cornered us, but nevertheless we are bound to escape and shall, and if you make a move toward us we'll shoot you down without mercy. Step to the rear of this tent, no not outside but here in side the place, so we will have an open door way to go through without hindrance."

"You little heads are the most dodgasted christian children that ever stepped into the earth," said one of the glandelinians.
"Well what ever you think of us we should worry," said violet as the men were obeying the command. "No names hurt us no matter if you called us devils. Only we're liable to live up to the name if you roll with us. Now then sit on that cot, that's right I see you men are not fools, and are handing us your guns, a cartridges. Now sit on that cot and if you make a move toward us you'll get shot."

The little girls now so slowly made for the door, but the glandelinians thinking they saw their chance, made for the little girls with a rush, intending to grab them, but the little girls fired without hesitation, and severely wounded the two soldiers, one in the arm and another in the leg. They fired at these parts so purposely as they did not wish to kill them in cold blood. Not daring to remain and take any chances, the little girls and through a cornfield. The corn though old was high, and as the wind blew through them swaying the stalks it made a loud swishing sound, which almost unnered the little girls.

"We must be cautious here," said violet. "There are too many enemies about, and there is no telling what will happen."

"But we are not through with our mission already," asked Jennie.

"It might as well be finished," said violet, "We have the enemy too excited to continue our deep depredation too long, and if we stay within manleys lines too long we might be captured, and slaughtered like cattle in the slaughter houses. And we don't want to be foolish."

"That's right too," said pathwine. "We have found out as much as we possibly could and now all is well."

"And when grane got all these documents won't he open his eyes though," said Jennie. "I believe we have made the big east haul ever in our lives. We never captured such important paper, and learned such information before."

"And maybe they will not dare accomplish their schemes after they know we found them out," said Gertrude Angeline. "If y they do so in spite well then they are the biggest fools that we have ever known. But I am positive they will try it nevertheless. Manley is bound to frustrate us, I know and he may have another plan contrary to the ones we have found out."

"You're right too Gertrude," said Angeline. "And so all the other christian commanders will have to look out."

"If we could locate our fathers army all would be well," saidaisy.
"I saidaisy," then we could give him these plans, as grane really wished to do himself if he could. But then he is too far away."

As the moon came out the little girls felt safer, but for a time they remained hidden in the cornfield, for they observed too many of the wicked glandelinians and did not dare to take any chances with them. Some were already already ploughing through the fields in search for them and the little girls knew to it that their guns were in proper condition and got ready to do some fancy shooting should the glandelinians discover them too soon and arise the alarm. But though thousands of the glandelinians were in the corn field and in the woods and other fields all around searching for them, none of the evil soldiers came near violet and her sisters, and so for the time being they felt safe, but nevertheless they did not venture out of the field as yet but kept in hiding, and conversed lowly among themselves.

"I see they're bound to capture us," said violet. "Oh how I wish some of them would come nearer and even discover us, so we could do some shooting and show them that to on tire us alive now adays is impossible." And she laughed quite quietly.

They watched the glandelinians who were swarming about, prodding the ground with their bayonets, some swarming upon haystacks, and setting others on fire to make more light, and though they heard voices among the glandelinian soldiers they were talking too low and the little girls did not know what they were saying. But presently a sergeant came a loss to their hiding place and they heard him remark:

"I don't see wh we should as spent the whole dodgasted night in hunting for those dingbusted centepedes, and snakes. They've escaped and there is no dispute to it."

"But Manley says that he will take our heads off if they get away and we did not try to prevent it," said another private.

"Oh hang Manley," I do really wish those doggone vietnam girls would stay where they belong and not make us all this work. We have a persecuted them that is true, and probably they deserve persecution, but just now we know what they are and we would rather give up the whole dodgasted war than have to run and dash after them again. I hope for one that they did escape."

He and the other spokesman came right upon the little girls but they covered him with their automatics.

"We have heard your conversation," said violet. "And we appreciate it to know that you and your companion have wished to give up hunting for us. Well we'll give to that privilage. First though hand over your weapons."

"But you dodgasted little heymas we are--") "Not a word out of you," said violet. "We will not argue with you. We are not going to make any delay either. Do as we order, or be shot down."

The two sergeants obeyed.

"Come along with us," said violet. As she and her sisters cut off some cornstalks with their knives which they had also carried with them.

The women obeyed, and as soon as they were at another point they were bound up by the little girls, the children the using the bayonet hands of the soldiers. Then after gagging them the little girls placed the corn over the sergeants to hide them.

"Now you can stay there until we have escaped altogether, or when the men find you." Said Violet. "Lying there until they do find you will give you a good rest, and grant your wish. Good bye."

And off they skipped.

As they proceeded on cautiously they came upon a batch of glandelinian soldiers suddenly but, not being seen, the little girls did not worry, and remained hidden until they passed.

"They seem bound to get us if it takes till doom's day to do so." Said Gertrude Angeline. "How many of them do you suppose there are of the wicked glandelinians?"

"I couldn't tell." Said Joyce. "But there are thousands of them out in the vast cornfield alone. They are searching for us no doubt, for we have aroused the whole camp. The best we can do is to make straight for the christian lines, and not try any more depredations for a while."

"But we have lost our bearings and do not know which way the christian lines are." Said Jennie.

"That won't hurt." Said Angeline. "As long as we escape the desperate glandelinians all will be well."

"It does." Said Nettie. "Suppose we would be lost in the enemy's country, and in the woods with thousands upon thousands of glandelinians scouring the whole region for us. It certainly looks serious. We have thrown ourselves into worse worse peril than we believed we would."

"But we got to get away and that's all there is to it." Said Daisy. "If they see us now they would not try to capture us for they know that is impossible. They would shoot us without warning, and probably a thousands of guns would be fired simultaneously. We are in from the frying pan into the fire. Here comes another swarm now. They are reinforcements entering the cornfield at another quarter. And they look'd to be horsemen."

Indeed the glandelinians were making the most desperate search for the little girls that had ever been made before. They were not leaving a stone unturned, and the only way the little girls kept themselves from being detected, was by keeping on the move, watching, every batch of glandelinians, and preparing against any surprises. Should they be discovered, why then then they would stand their ground to the last, and shoot down every glandelinian that would come too near. But desperate as the search was none of the glandelinians except the two sergeants, whom they had overpowered overpowered had observed them yet, and so the little girls felt safer. But nevertheless they were very cautious, watching the movement of every cornstalk with the alertness of a cat, and every time to they thought they saw a man approaching, they would get ready to shoot without warning.

To take chances with these glandelinians was like taking chances with the same number of ferocious tigers on the hunt for their prey. It was the worst situation that the little girls had ever been in before, but nevertheless they were cool headed, not excited, and kept themselves hidden among the thick mass as much as possible. Incessantly they watched every movement of the distant searchers, the swaying of the corn, and was alert to every sound possible. Once when the moon went behind a cloud, they felt more nervous, for in such dark darkness a batch of glandelinians could spring upon them unawares, and murder them without their chances of giving any possible resistance.

Once when the moon was hidden for an unusual long time the little girls had been startled by voices, and heard the wild swishing of the corn, and then at this moment the moon came out, and though not seen themselves, they observed four men, all scattered searching closely among the corn, and one of them was a captain.

The glandelinians were fairly combing the cornfield for them it was evident, but it was a miracle also that the glandelinians had not been successful in finding the little girls.

The most astonishing part of this great war did not happen in Calvernia at all. There has been of course already predicted, the wholesale destruction of towns, villages, and forests, and bridges, farms and so on but it was nothing compared what other nations suffered who took part with the Angelinean nation against glandelinia's rebellion, in fighting for the retention of Child slavery and their own freedom from all christianity.

The Nations of Hickencille, Blonlinia, Abyssinkile, Protostentia, Condensencia, United States, and Normomdia were the nations who took part with Angeline and Abbisannia. Of course they were too far away for glandelinia to also fight with but she did worse without warring at all. She declared herself in a state of war with these nations, and it is true many of these nations had soldiers of great numbers fighting in the Abbisannian armies but nevertheless glandelinia had a way which she had seen was more effective than sending troops across those damnable seas to war with them.

Agents and the glandelinian gaminian members were sent to these nations and they did things that was astonishing to behold.

Since the war had reached to its fourth or third years duration it now being near the point of Gloriana the reports that were astonishing were as follows,

I. Blonlinia -- 300,000 factories, institutions and mills burned to the ground by glandelinian incendiaries who were not captured.

II. Abyssinkile. -- 900,000 factories alone burned to the ground within two years.

III. Angelinea. -- Factories destroyed not numbered, but not a one remaining that was not burned.

IV. Normomdia. -- Nation almost paralyzed as all her factories throughout the whole country wiped out by firebugs.

V. -- Protostentia -- Factories throughout three years burned down by fire bugs by the hundreds.

VI. Condensencia. -- Factories all wiped out, costing nation a hundred trillion dollars to rebuild them and greater expenses to run down the thousands of fire bugs. Owners many committed suicide over their loss.

VII. Abbisannia. -- Two hundred factories burned, big lumber mills set on fire by hundreds, oil fields burned, and biggest forests fires in world set by fire bugs destroying a score of towns within three weeks time. Abbisannia main sufferer.

VIII. United States. -- Factories menaced and some burned but nothing unusual going on as factories are too strongly guarded. People of this nation have more common sense and know how to wipe out all firebugs who start such troubles.

IX. Hickencille. -- Cannot account for the destruction of all factories throughout whole nation. Over two thousand fire bugs caught and put to death but does no good at all.

It indeed seemed evident that the glandelinian nation was bound to have revenge no matter how she obtained it. Many of these firebugs were arrested in Angelinea, Abbisannia and Angelinea in the northern section but their punishments which was extremely severe did not cow the remainder at all and only brought on assassinations of policemen detectives, and others by the score every certain day. Glandelinian agents were indeed active throughout the whole world doing all the possible damage they could, and there was many a time when a resident was not even safe if it belonged to any Millionaire who sided with the Angelinean cause, or her allies.

On account of these firebugs the biggest fires in the world especially among forested mountains and valleys raged in the western country of Protostentia and Hickencille and also Abbisannia, although no forestfire were any more reported to be raging in Angelinea.

These constant and fearful depredations horrified all the christian nations, and though all efforts to bar suspicious characters from the docks were made it seemed futile. At New Orleans (Angelinea) a one hundred trillion dollar fire was set by glandelinian fire bugs which spread at such a velocity in burning that the very buildings of the city caught fire, and it took about nearly all the fire departments in the whole section of that part of the country besides those in the city to stop the progress of this gigantic conflagration.

Of single fires it was one of the biggest fires ever known in the whole world and the smoke it made was seen two hundred miles away from the scene. It took five weeks to subdue this conflagration but nevertheless the firebugs had been caught by the Abbisannian arson commission Gemini and condemned to death by crucifixion.

A little later after this conflagration broke out another one started in New Orleans (Abbisannia) which made a $10,000,000 loss and cost the fatality of fifty lives, of which four of the number were firemen who fought desperately to subdue the flames. In all cities all over the world in the christian nations the fire departments were constantly busy every day in the year fighting fire after fire until they wondered why the firebugs did not try to set the very world and heavens on fire at the same time.

CHAPTER TWO.

THE VIVIAN GIRLS ARE CAPTURED. THEY OVERHEAR MORE CONVERSATION. THEY SEIZED IMPORTANT PAPERS, AND ESCAPE FOR GOOD.

At this critical moment, the wild sound of galloping horses could be heard, and glancing back the little girls saw a swarm of horsemen riding at break neck speed toward them. The little girls at this time were at the end of the corn field, which was fenced in at this point, and over the fence the little girls went, a fence too high for the wicked glandelinians and their horses to get over. The horsemen were frantic at the escape of the brave little girls, for the high fence was made of nothing but barbed wire and the little girls had climbed to the top and jumped down into the cleared field beyond in ten seconds time.

The horsemen fired furiously in an effort to shoot the little fugitives down, but without avail, and the little girls returned the fire and actually dismounted eight of the glandelinians and wounded the leading lieutenant of the party. A swarm of infantry who had also been in the cleared field looking for the little girls dashed up, some climbing over the fence themselves, or going through the gates and starting in pursuit firing incessantly. But by this time Violet and her sisters had reached the opposite woods, and were again behind trees. But nevertheless they were still within the enemy's lines. They found themselves once more in Ambrose Fuller's camp. They were surprised indeed and did not know what to do. They realized the extent of the glandelinian army, apparently small as it was, and that they were flabbergasted. They were now hard pressed by the searchers on all sides, and realizing their danger the little girls decided to try their best to escape from the enemy's line, by a shorter way, and race for the Christian lines as soon as possible.

Seeing in the darkness the wicked glandelinians swarming everywhere, in search for them, they climbed the trees and hid in the foliage. At this moment General Ambrose Fuller came riding up.

"You fellows may as well search for a pin in a hay stack," he said. "For you'll not find them. So why waste your time. If you could not find them before you never will now."

"But the dodgasted little lubbers came here just a moment ago," protested one of the officers. "They came across that dingbusted field yonder pursued by Hanley's men. We saw them."

"Oh all right," said Ambrose Fuller in disgust. But mark what I tell you, you'll never catch them that's all. And he rode away smiling and grinning to himself.

It was fully five minutes before the glandelinians dispersed, and then when all was silent, and there was no one in sight the little girls came down.

But as soon as they reached the ground they heard some voice cry:

"Quick boys wake the captain from his nap up. General Ambrose Fuller from southern Glandelinia is here ain't it."

There was some mumbling without any wording distinguished, and then came a command:

"Lively ye swabs, and make er fast. We'll make a trap for the gun-doolzed little vivian snipes."

There was a few moments of intense silence and then the little girls heard some one say:

"Aho captain, all straightened out as a shark's tooth. The vivian girls if they come this way will be caught in the net."

"Then came the answer;

"Chust de same, Senor, I look sem over. I am what you call Missouri."

There was a few more moments of quiet then they heard some one say:

"Such a smile. He must be havi ng a lovely dream captain."

"Well shake him up. Was the answer. We got to get this trap finished. And Mr Missouri can't wait all day."

"Bah zat what sey all say." Was the answer, and then came the exciting exclamation "HDMEL. What issa mit the ground!"

"Back up you boob!" Cried a voice. "You'll get stuck stuck into a trap set for the vivian girls."

"You want you should give a look in general." Exclaimed another voice. There was further silence then some one roared;

"Quick George, quick. Go get ze ropes for this trap."

"Aye, aye." Came the answer, and some body else cried "Beter I go mit. Fritze is such a bungler. But remember no excitement eez permit, or ze finish eez over for the trap will be discovered ain't it."

"If the little lubbers get caught in this they will get the cleaning of their lives." Said another voice. "They have become voicer, and voicer, and one more monkey shiner from them, and bing in the nearest, death chail in. Any way dot comes from this foolish round the fields racing for sem. And if we ever capture the ding swizzled runts I giff them a war and spying fever vare sey don't suspect."

"Stop stop, you must not be excite." Cried another soldier somewhere closer by. "Gramba he have got ze ropes entangled around me instead of the stake. OO such a life with such dumblocks. And who's the fish wh wot swiped my knife --- wot. Off'n this trap we're making the whole parcel o' pirates wot ye be."

There was a few minutes of more silence, and as the little girls were wondering what was next some one started singing;

Oer ze sand ze sun is creeping in my dear old desert home,
Where ze camel he is sleeping,
I go back no more to roam,---"

"Aw cut out that singing you boob, and do your work." Said a voice that sounded like the captives. "And what did I said about the line of ropes vot. Hit you around mr fazata we coul make a man of the moon. And the next time ven is more singing like that without orders straight in the guard house in."

"Haw haw you ain't the only smatr smartieres." Cried another voice, "Hey get out of that trap, you want it should get gespoilt. Hans pritze stop that befl befoolizing do you hear it."

"Oh hang your old trap." Cried t another voice in answer. "And didnt. I said it look out for them ding busted kids called the vivian girls. Never nefe naffer in this world iss it safe."

"Well so they are preparing a trap for us thought Violet to herself. "Well we are to sly to be caught napping."

"If we are wer going to escape this camp I wonder when?" Whispeder jenne laughing at the series of their own experiences, and over the funny way the glandelinians were talking. "Wahwe overo excited them so that they are not overlooking anything but the tree tops"

"I hear more men approaching." Said Violet....

It was true. Through the darkness from behind the nearest trees, they saw three officers approaching. Whether they were generals or lows, in command they could not tell very well in the darkness, but nevertheless the little girls decided to surprise them and secure their cartridges to add to their own. As soon as the officers were near enough, they heard one of them say:

"The general is waiting to took me to the mask ball captian, and when you iss gefixed major come over und I make you interduced ain't it."

"Yes, yes haw, haw ven I get find you von't know it's I'm." Answered the major. "But you ought to have seen one of the child slave prisoners I have. OO such a eater. The whole bill of fare she gobbles. Ah me how vunderful iss a good appetite."

"Chase und how vunderful is a gas bag also." Said another of the officers. "And brave captines. Zecostume which ye will get, he eez beyound compare..."

Violet thought to tantalize the glandelinian generals who were talking so funny and so picking up a rock throw it hitting the, or in the face.

"J. SOMBRERO, PALMETTO, HEY." He cried. "Who does it. Hey!"

"What's the matter cried one of his companions."

"I got hit with a rock. Somebody threw a rock."

Another officer received some mud in the face;

"HI SI" He exclaimed. "Loafers who ever him iss. S Zevhiskaris."

he i eez make hopeless hand wots more, him no ostler to no blooming mile."

As soon as the officers were near enough, the children sprang out, and surrounded them. The officers unfortunately uttered the loud exclamation which startled the glandelinians who were at work at the trap;

"The little brigands. Vanouse out from zizz vicinity. He surrender for ziss children. :? Neverarie."

Though the little girls succeeded in tearing the cartridge belts from the soldiers they had to run deeper into the darkest part of the camp followed by the wild cries from the men of;

"Shoot them, soak them, fire on them little guttersnips, get after them, Out with you men and after them, catch them before they beat it."

The little girls who were just then hiding behind some trees, with their at automatic drawn heard other rackets, a sound of clackety, clackety, startled them, a cry of pra-a-a-a-a-a-a-a-a-a, ga-r-r-r-r-r al. Together boys fire away a perfect barrage, Assassinate the blooming little blighters, Raus, stop ye little devils on ze spot, and lubbers on such a night We might have known who was the luisy vuns and so on, and men giving the sounds of Puf-f-f-f-puf-f-f-f-f passed dangerously close to the little girls brandishing their weapons.

One man passed so close to Violet that he did see her, but before he could raise the alarm or bayonet her she hit him on the head with her pistol and as he fell some one who saw him cried;

"HEWEL, CORPORAL KAZINK ALI-BAZAZA ISS VENTING DOWN."

"More dirty work of them lubbery swabs, the vivilian girls but vare are they!" Cried another voice, and some of the glandelinians halted to pick him up. At once all the searches came running up.

"We have been robbed by one of the spies." Cried one of the officers. "They have taken our cartridge br belts."

"Where have they gone?" Cried one of the other leaders, who was directing the searches. But the glandelinian officer did not know, and could not give any directions.....

It was evident to the glandelinians that the fugitives were more daring, than eve, despite all their persecutions, and they were really apprehensive at the problem, and the difficulties of capturing the little girls also and the leaders of the wicked glandelinian trop troops did not know what to do. The search however was on with redoubled energy but no trace of the child spies could be found. Every where the glandelinians searched, even many climbing the trees in an effort to locate them but it was of no avail. Where they could have gone to was a mystery. At this time the little girls had been hiding in Ambrose Muller's headquarters and though not a glandelinian had any idea of it, it was discovered by the little girls that Jennie alone was missing.

"Where's Jennie? Where did she go." Cried Violet softly.

"Why she was here just a minute ago---right by my side." Said voice.

"Oh Jennie, oh Jennie cri" Cried Violet, but there was no answer. "Oh Jennie. OH JENNIE, where are you?" She cried again but of no avail.

"Gee I hope we have not lost her---we'd neve regain her in this crowd of wild glandelinians." Said Catherine while she and all her sisters looked alarmed.

"Where can she be?" Said Nettie.

"I don't know but I'm sure she's lost." Cried Violet. "And if we do much shouting the glandelinians will hear us and get us before we can be prepared. And it will be just like the gray coated scamps to have seized her no doubt when we were fleeing. What if she is killed---we would never know---and how could we ever find her in this crowd of searching glandelinians we have just left. Oh Jennie Jennie, Jennie dear where are you?"

"But there was no answer."

"I'm sure she's gone." Said Nettie trying to be brave---little Jennie, who had been standing right by voices side, and disappeared. Some of the lg glandelinians must have gotten her."

"It's awful to have this happen, and just at this most critical time when we need her the most." Said Little Evangeline. "Oh dear, oh dear she's been kidnapped, stole n by the glandelinians, know. What if she was murdered in cold blood by the wicked glandelinians and we would never see her again."

Just at this moment when the little girls were about giving up all hope Jennie appeared with a pocket full of oranges which she gave to her sisters and stating the cause of her absence.

"I was in the cellar looking for something to eat for me and yo she you" She said."

"And we thought sure you had been taken." Said voice. "Thanks be to god that you were not."

It was already ten o'clock in the night, and the little girls all being hungry went down to the cellar, and helped themselves to everything they could find, and examined their pockets full of bullets, which they found in a drawer, and took the two valuable revolvers they saw there, there being at the time no one in the house. The little girls helped themselves to everything they saw and then hearing footsteps below now being on the top floor, they hid under the beds in the generals' sleeping quarters.....

In a few minutes, twenty five glandelinian generals came into the room opposite. What the generals were saying the little girls did not know, but nevertheless they were bound to find out, and what ever the cost. Violet and her sisters opened the bedroom door as cautiously as possible, and tiptoed across the hall, and then hearts beating wildly with excitement, they made the long and painful process, toward the room toward which the generals had gone.

Without making a sound they reached the landing of a stair case and stood there for a moment beside a big old clock, listening to the muffled voices or a sound or of voices below. Half way near the room a flooring board creaked sharply. All sounds from the room below instantly ceased, and for a century of minutes, the little girls crouched against the wall, scarcely daring to breathe, their pistols ready for instant use.

It was a duel of silence. The only sound was the measured click click-click, click-click of the old time clock on the landing.

After a few more minutes in intense quiet, the murmur of voices continued. The generals felt it was perfectly safe. How could it be possible for any spies to get into this house, infested with many poisonous snakes, left there to guard any exit or entrance which alone would not harm the soldiers, of or the officers? And that very afternoon the generals had come around to the back door had it securely fastened, and the windows also so that no one could get in that way, and the rest of the building was well watched. The glandelinian generals should worry.

The little girls were soon behind the portieres, and listened to the words of the wicked glandelinian generals.

"Well." They heard Hanley say, "As I was saying before, when interrupted by the noise, of the creaking floor, that though those vivilian girls have discovered my intentions, I will not change my plans nevertheless and we'll do so as we proposed at any costs, let the dirty christian dogs know it if they wish. We could rush our troops as fast as possible by warships and tramp transport boats up the great mainie Run river and move on McWhirther."

"But your trying to plan something impossible." Said one whom the little girls recognized as Ambrose Miller. "To capture the great seaport of vivilian picky now is impossible. If you propose to do so your exom exolency you might as well try to capture the moon. It's impossi le--- tell you and will cost a needless sacrifice of lives. We got one lesson at Aronburgs Run and I believe it is a enough. If you propose to do this some especially without proper equipment, and without the advice of your brother John Hanley I'll step out of it if I have to lose my command."

"Very well." Said general Hanley. "You may step out if you wish I'm not stopping you." But if all of you were to go and leave me, I would not abandon my plans. "I wish to defy of God and the vivilian girls and show them that I never turn from a purpose even if it is discovered. So why kick against it? I'm fully determined to do so and so I will tolerate no interference, if you wish to resign your command do so. I will be glad to accept it."

"I did not say I was going to resign my command." Said Ambrose Miller. "I said I would step out of your scene that's all and that I would do so too come what may. I said nothing about resignations."

"Aw what's the use of fighting over it?" Said Jesipine Jensen. "Maybe we can accomplish it if all the remaining glandelinian armies in Calvernia stay their own and do not be driven out like we were. What's the use of giving up so soon. Hanley is doing it right. He knows when to frustrate the enemies of our country."

a good deal stronger now. And another of those generals to look out for is Gyverette true and iviania. With these out of the way all would be well. And maybe we would have better luck if we could get rid of those ivian girls who are the main cause of all our trouble-----

"STOP. STOP. SPIES. SPIES. SPIES." Came the sudden cries from 1 without, and it was taken up from everybody on the outside, as it was thought so sure that the fleeing ivian girls were seen. The generals at once rushed out of the room fortunately not seeing Jole violet and her sisters. There was a few minutes of quiet and then the generals came back with a disappointed look in their faces.

"They will never capture those spies," said de- Adele-ge- Garbe. "Those ivian girls called violet and her sisters are the most desperate of the christian children that any of us have ever seen. If we do capture them we can never hold them. What is the reason. I've been in favor of them sometimes, but I do not like their spying on us and would give anything now if they were captured. They could at least be held and held in a place where they could not escape from until our purposes are accomplished, and then when all is well and done, then we would release them somewhere, where they could not find their way back to the christian lines until the war is over. That would be a better plan than murdering them, and which if it was done would only cause our utter ruin. They say if the ivian girls were slain, it would discourage the angolinians, but it would not discourage them any more than if they were winning the war right at this minute. They would only be worse because they would desire revenge for the deed."

"You are probably right," said general Jesipine Jensen. "The angolinians think a lot of the ivian girls, and I do myself in some ways because I admire their bravery, but then a spy is a spy, and they at least deserve to be held as such until we can find it convenient to place them somewhere else where they will not be able to do any further spying. But to massacre them would be our undoing."

"I would not heed to such plans," said Manley. "It's my opinion that we would have better luck to have them little brats out of the way and nothing else, and that is by destroying those little gutter-snipes. They have caused us the worse of trouble and I will not tolerate their interference. They are worse in their ways than a true treacherous snake and I would tell any one that too, even God himself."

"Well," said Adele-ge-Garbe. "But it is exceedingly dangerous to do so and would bring the vengeance of heaven down upon us in a way we would not realize. I for one will leave them little ivian girls alone, and no matter what will come of it I will see that nothing is done to them in case they get captured, than what I just proposed. I'd like to see any of my men murder them, and they would go up on the cross as sure as our Lord did him self. And I mean it too."

COMP

General Federal who had been sitting by a small round table with his elbow on the top had been precipitated to the floor head first, as a part of the top of the table gave way, and thus for the sound he made. The general was enraged and he cried:

"Of all the dod-rotted luck. First the peculiar noise, then the moosis, then the dod-gasted excitement about escaped spies, and now this ding-fool9-ding-fool9 table."

At this moment with a swish the portier behind the wicked glandelinian generals parted, and they swung around every muscle set for a rush, and hands at their pistol holsters. Just inside the curtains, stood eight of the most beautiful little girls and children dressed in boyscout uniforms who had ever faced them, the brown figured boyscout uniforms splashing the blue draperies. From ramb-rumped hair, to firm a small feet, every line of the little but sturdy figures of the supposed eight little boys radiated complete, furious, and wild defiance. Their blue eyes flashed in indignation and their jaws were firm and square. "You have discovered us too quickly despite our caution," said violet coolly. "But every one of you glandelinians are our prisoners instead. Sit down in your chairs."

"Aw g'man out of here," commented Ambrose fuller rather at a loss how to deal with such a situation and being very reluctant to that Manley was with the officers, at this occasion.

"We will not and can not obey your command, as perhaps Manley and the rest of his officers will not let us unless we force them," retorted Jennie. "Ambrose you are a better general than we thought you were, and regret the way we treated you in your tent. As for the others, and for Manley, they are no friends of mine." The little girls produced their automatics from behind their backs and leveled them at the wicked glandelinian generals who were grouped near the table.

The glandelinian generals recognized the ugly blue things, which were leveled at them. They knew that the little girls could do some shooting and they were worried. They glanced toward their own revolvers which lay on the table, and took a step toward it.

"Don't you go for those guns," cried the little girls quickly. "If you intend to disobey do so, but we can shoot quicker than you glandelinian generals can, and a number of you will be killed."

The dull blue automatics held by the little girls at arms length was now pointing directly at the men.

"Hey," said Jesipine Jensen backing away, "point those things the other way. They might go off. What do you want us to do anyhow?"

"We want you generals to sit right there until I get three of us up to you to your chairs. That is what we want you to do."

Manley himself became threatening.

"If you don't surrender yourselves as our prisoners," He began, advancing and scowling fiercer fiercer, "I'll break every bone in your bodies you damn little guttersnipes."

"Stand still." Came sharply from the small figure in front of him and the glandelinian general stopped short. "We mean business we do, and if you advance toward us another foot we'll show you if we are guttersnipes or not."

Their little voices were meant to be thunderous but it was angelic and childlike childish enough in that big dining room. For a few minutes they all stood watching each other. Manley and all the glandelinian generals were thinking how ridiculous it was for them to be thwarted by the little daughters of the great christian general, and the more they thought of it the angrier they grew. Kids like them spoiling the entire war for them. It was exceedingly humiliating and tantalizing.

"We've fooled around here long enough," Manley decided suddenly. "I'll give you little snips just one minute more to surrender yourselves, to us, and if you are still out stubborn by that time, why we'll tear you to pieces that's all."

He took his one hundred dollar watch from his pocket and glared at the little girls. For the seconds that followed the little girls could hear their hearts thumping with the excitement and joy at the dismal discomfiture of Manley and his wicked generals. They did not waver in the least, and not only stayed their post but fought a desperate battle against the dark fire to burst out laughing.

Slipping his watch into his pocket, Manley with a fierce blasphemy rushed forward. Five steps he took, the other generals stepping aside in knowing what would follow. There was a quick bark, there was a ringing crash as a cut glass vase on the sideboard burst into a thousand fragments, which sped tinkling in a dozen different directions across the plaid polished wood, and a cry from Manley as two bullets hit him in the left shoulder. The little girls had purposely fired at random, not wishing to kill him in cold blood wicked as he was. White to the lips and twitching galvanically, the glandelinian generals instinctively raised both hands over their heads, while Manley stopped short nursing his wounded shoulder. Fascinated, they could not take their eyes from the muzzles of the weapons which never wavered, and kept steadily to a point uncomfortably near the pit of their stomachs. Then things began to happen. Glandelinian soldiers rushed in others began banging on a door, and a startled exclamation burst from the lips of Ambrose Fuller as the little girls leaped through the open windows, and rushed away with glandelinian soldiers swarming after them, and firing away like mad.

Just as he and all the other glandelinian generals were also rushing out Ambrose Fuller wondered to himself:

"Do they grow all the kids in the Angelinian Nation like the vivian girls. I never saw braver children, and hope they do escape."

THE VIVIAN GIRLS LEAVE MANLEY'S LINES AND GET CAPTURED BY ANOTHER GLANDELINIAN ARMY.

Again it was found impossible to find or locate the vivian girls. Again Manley had been frustrated and he was at a loss of what to do. The little girls in the meantime, knowing how fierce and furious the glandelinians were now, decided to leave the camp entirely having learned and discovered all they wanted to know. They passed one company street after another without being molested but as they reached the outskirts of the enemy lines, and found it difficult to proceed, they at once hung back gripping their guns. Their eyes suddenly bright, they tried to probe the darkness. Standing near the edge of a thicket, their forms in the silhouette and glare of a camp fire, they could see a large group of men in gray. They went down on hands and knees and slowly approached. The men were talking together quite boldly. They were talking loudly to make themselves heard above the noise of the rain which was now falling heavily, amid thunder and lightning, which the little girls enjoyed profoundly, and now and then the wind streamed their words back to the brave little vivian girls.

"You planned it just right general." One of the group smiled. "We could easily get a great force of men to move around the rear of your army, and to make it better for us, those christian dogs never dreamed that we could drag a one hundred a battery of one hundred and fifty pound and ten guns over to the top of that hill facing general your center."

"And if they had looked they could not see the battery, as it is hidden by thick undergrowth." The general replied. "It was a slick slick manner how we got the battery up there." Then the voice lowered to a snarl and the little girls who were creeping nearer could but catch disconnected words:

"I told sm--- they'd pay --- general white wings.... Vivian girls once beat us with a hoe--- yes they did the--- little--- devils." And they all called the vivian girls the vilest names, and blasphemed most horribly.

Violet and her sisters did wait a second more. They raised their automatics and their eyes were true and their hands steady. There was no remorse no mercy in their motion. They crawled forward noiselessly. They realized the peril indeed but nevertheless they were bound to take the chances. Forty armed officers in the strength of youth, were the number against eight little children. And the little girls knew that if they backed out now, they would go off and vanish into the shelter of the pitch darkness, before they could possibly hear any more. So the brave little girls began to creep forward with their revolvers ready for instant use. But the glandelinian officers were at this moment on the alert, they whirled and caught just a dim outline of eight creeping forms in the gloom. Their pistols leaped from their holsters, and they fired four times, the darkness being stabbed by dazzling flashes, and seeming to rock with the sound, as the little girls let loose their automatics in answer. Every one of the shots of the little girls went home. The general who had been speaking felt them like hot brands piercing his shoulder and side, and he with seven other officers went down in shuddering heaps. The general in spite of his wounds slid back into further darkness and in sliding back the shadows utterly hid him.

"Did you get the blasphemers?" Whispered Jennie.

"We all shot a man." Said Jennie. "I saw eight drop."

And then out of the utter darkness, into which the eyes of the wicked glandelinians could not pierce, the glad voices of children broke loose. Loud and cheerful it came.

"So you thought you would get us did you you desperate child assassins." Cried Violet. "You can't see us and we can see every one of you. Every blasted one of you hold up your hands."

The glandelinians again leveled their own guns.

"Up they go I say" Cried Violet more sharply,

"Or every one of you drop."

The glandelinians could not see the little girls, nor locate them exactly by their voices, so they raised their hands.

"You fools" Cursed the wounded general. "Rushed them. There are only eight."

"Just try it won't you?" The triumphant voices answered him.

"All of you will never get a one of you, --- though we are eight against you thirty two. But I promise you that eight more of you will die or be wounded first, before you can make a rush--- it's impossible for us to miss you at that short range looming between us and the lights ahead. Don't move a finger you bloodhounds. You will insult us and blaspheme poor God will you? We can let you know that we'll revenge it."

"Rush them, rush the little fools." Another of the leaders said with a series of curses. "Then he was visited with an inspiration. "Listen ye little dogged devils." "I'll give you just six seconds to give yourselves up as prisoners. As we cannot see you, we it is true cannot reach you with our pistols, but there are six of us armed with detonational grenades, and if you have not yielded by then, we're going to hurl them in the direction where we have heard your voices and kill every one of you. It only takes one little motion, and you'll be blown to pieces before you can shoot."

"It was a long second before Violet and her sisters answered. It seemed they were losing their fight. There were thirty two against eight.

It would be long and long before they could escape the enemy's lines it seemed, and they dared not rise and expose themselves. For they knew that if they did the glandelinians would open fire again and shoot them down like dogs. And if they surrendered themselves they would be massacred anyway.

Remembering themselves that they were also in the darkness spots the little girls decided to crawl away and not yield. This they did and soon the glandelinians fired again futilely, and all of them not shot down stood crouching.

Seeing that all was quiet the wicked Glandelinian generals started searching but they could not find the little girls to their disgust. In the meantime the little girls reaching the outskirts of the enemy's lines found it difficult to proceed. The sentries were as thick as fleas, and to pass these without being discovered was utterly impossible in the extreme. They could not bribe the guards either, and so the only means of escape that they saw was to make a desperate dash and to fire to the right and left as they did so. Even to make this dash was hazardous as there was chance of their being shot down by the infuriated guards but they would soon or risk that than be butchered when risking capture.

As they came nearer one of the guards they heard him singing:!!!!!!!!!!!!

"In my dear Glandelinian cabin far away,
With its Krnokatks and Dobrudji bright and gay, Where there Gsoohiklx and the Glas shine so brightly in the Zams"

"Listen to that gink song." Said Violet with a smile "I wonder what language he speaks when he sleeps."

She happened to say it accidentally too loud and the sentry heard it but not knowing who was speaking, and thinking it was one of the Glandelinian boyscouts he shouted;

"G'wan, you little fat pussy faced piece of Limberger cheese. Wait'll I get ye alone, and I'll spank you good."

"Here is something fishy about dot business." The little girls heard another voice say. "I bet dot loud speaking came from a spy or one of the Vir'an Girls sergeant Herzegovinia."

"Suffering cats." Is dot ro." Came the exclamation. "Five t'ous- and Sacre Pesetan- six million, two t'ousand Sapristis. We must lay on corporal Me estarine Vazooopritch, we must lay on and capture the little devils, and then se Manly y se shake se hand wiz us."

Another guard suddenly saw one of the little girls and shouted;

Snuff'rin' Krxvosopitz wot 'O!' There they iss."

"Ah ha vot did you said it?" Came from the corporal. "Heavens look how many of the guards there are."

Whispered Jennie. "We certainly can't pass them."

"There is something like a steep ravine near by." Said Joice. "I'll have to take off some of my outside clothes and make a rope of them, and let you little sisters of mine down one by one to that nearest tree, top and then I'll try and make a run past the guards."

"All right Joice dear." Said her sisters in answer. "I'll see the only way to escape."

Joice proceeded to do so and soon as the short rope was fastened to a tree and dangled over a tree top down in the ravine the little girls all of them managed to climb down, but they were startled to find guards here also. But fortunately the little girls saw a chance. Near the first line of guards was a string of grenades stretched across the tree, no doubt which the Glandelinians had intended to use in case of a surprise attack by the Angelinians. The little girls having matches with them, and knowing that these grenades go off by fuses, secretly lit them and lighted every one of them quickly and then awaited developments.

"Bang." Came the first report and at once the guards were in confusion. Bang, BAM, BAM, BAM, bang, BANG. BANG. BAM, POP, Bam) Bam-i-ty BAM, BAM, bam."

There was a wild confusion of explosions, and the guards ran hither and thither in the wildest excitement, some crying out;

"Great scott me coat tails on fire, HELP FIRE, PUT OUT THEM FUSES!" Others hollering "Hey out out that noise stop them damn things."

Finally when all quieted down and when the little girls were beyond the ravine they heard some one say;

"Hey you little devils have gone far enough. Give up your guns and march over to the side of the road. And what's the matter with you rascally boyscouts! ARE YOU CRAZY. Can't you read the signs? LEAVE THESE GRENADES ALONE!"

You went through the whole camp causing the wildest excitement, and those grenades you touched off we could hear for a mile. We'll torture you little devils for life."

Whoever this fellow was the little girls did not know, but they hid in a dark spot, and prepared to make a rush.

To make a rush altogether was suicide for then they would be too close together, and be a fair mark for all of the guards, whom they knew who were excellent sharpshooters. Each little girl planned to separate at a wide distance, and to make the dash simultaneously, and to open fire with both pistols as they did so. It was a bold and desperate plan, but when accomplished it would insure their escape. So the little girls separated to the distance of fifty yards, and then waited for the signal from Jennie who planned the wild rush. It was a minute however before she was about to give the signal and then came the voice of the angry sentry who ordered them to march to the side of the road. In answer Jennie gave the signal, it sounded like the call of an owl, which her sisters and even Gr Gertrude Angelina understood. They answered in a chorus, and then made the dash, opening a withering fire on two sides as they did so.

The bewildered guards delivered a wild salvoes of rifle shots, to which the little girls responded furiously. Twelve of the sentries dropped, the little girls were unharmed, and fired again and again, the Glandelinians answering with a terrific rattling of musketry, that made a fearful noise in the quiet night. Balls flew and screamed a concert past the little girls but still they were untouched, while twenty more Glandelinian guards were down. The firing was resumed with redoubled fury by the Glandelinians as many troops swarmed up on hearing the rattling of the sentries' rifles, but the little girls were quickly out of range, and all they knew of the firing was by the myriad of rifle flashes.

The whole camp at this section had been aroused, every man rushing to the sentry line and starting to open fire, for not expecting at first, that it was a surprise attack of the Christians they did not take it for anything else. It was some time before the real cause was known, the sentries unable to see in the dark having suspected that it was the escape of a bunch of Christian soldiers who may have been prisoners within the camp. By the time the little girls were about a quarter of a mile from the camp, and it being too dark and realizing that it was too late the Glandelinians did not follow the little girls. They hardly even then believed it was the children at that, for the firing had been too general as over a thousand muskets had been fired in less than half a minute time, at the worse of the firing, and how could they escape through such a thick line of sentries, and all of them firing like that? Impossible they thought. It was a surprise attack to all, and they had believed that they had beat off the Christian assailants....

The children had by this time gone far beyond the camp and were safely beyond pursuit. However in the pitch darkness, as it was now getting cloudy, the little girls could not find their way to the Christian lines, and believed themselves lost in the wilderness.

They trudged on in the dense darkness, and now again it was beginning to thunder and to lightening, and the rain to pour in sheets sheeted torrents. But this did not worry them, as long as they succeeded in escaping the enemy, and finding the railroad lines once again.

"We are certainly lost in the wilderness and may not find our right way until morning." Said Violet.

As they continued to travel through the unknown ground they were startled by a sudden challenge, and then before they realized what was up, they found themselves surrounded, and roughly seized. Whom who their captors were the little girls did not at first know, but they were handled and shaken as roughly as a cat shakes a mouse, and angry voices exclaimed;

"We'll teach you to run away from the child slave mills, you dirty little guttersnipes."

"Are they little runaways?" Cried another.

"Soitnly, but I wish you would tell me how they came to get a hold of these gods foot. They may have killed some of the men youngsters."

There was some lights flaring at this moment and the faces of the little girls were plainly seen.

"I don't like the faces of these eight little boys outd."

Said another of the guards. "But just the same they may be child slaves who have runned away."

"For retaking them you see can now get on good yolms with the general." Said the first spokesman, and him and youse will again be foim friends." And he chuckled.

While the Glandelinians were thus talking the little girls made a break for their freedom.

1938. "HEY ATOP STOP." Gried the Glandelinians and they rushed forward in a swarm and rapidly overtook the little girls, onscatching Jennie and saying

"Aha my fine hold, now I've got youse

The little girls were seized again and led off roughly by their captors, and as soon by the glare of camp fires the little girls soon realized that they were prisoners among a strange horde of Glandelinians.... under general....., Hildreth. Zimmermann. Leavson..... They had been mistaken by these Glandelinians as escaping child slaves and so these Glandelinians not knowing the true character did not place them under guard at all, but led them to the interior of the main line and forced them to go into a tent. At first Violet and her sisters did not know what to make of this.

These Glandelinians did not act as those under the three Manley's did at all, neither like the Glandelinians in the other various Glandelinian armies.....

Not even a guard was placed in the tent, or in front of it, and no further attention was paid to them by the other wicked Glandelinians!!!!!!

But nevertheless none of the wicked Glandelinians would speak to the little girls.... and all gave them scowling threatening looks. In the meantime general Leavson got this note from general Ruebaum Manley;

"To general Leavson;
Commander of reinforcements coming to my aid against Evans;

Be on your look out. I have discovered that the dangerous..... Vivian Girls have escaped through my lines, and they may be heading toward your camp. I advise you to be on the lookout for them, and have your camp well guarded so that they cannot get in or escape if discovered. You don't know them but you will if they ever surprise your troops."

GENERAL RUEBAUM MANLEY."

P.S.... THERE ARE EIGHT OF THE LITTLE GIRLS DISGUISED AS BOYSCOUTS."

The general looked malvolent; and wicked.

"By Neptune." He exclaimed with clinched fists. "I've got those little brats now I'll be bound."

He at once dispatched orders for the little girls to be dragged out of the tent and slaughtered right then and there, but he had received the note and the little girls were gone when the women sent to do the work came up to get them. Seeing that chances was easier than supposed, Violet and her sisters had decided to take the opportunity, and so as soon as no one was looking they slipped out of the tent, and into the quiet quiet company street. A tall wooden house was in sight, and this they made for reaching a wide corn field before they were seen, and just as the soldiers sent to murder them, discovered their escape, and aroused the camp. In a moment unknown to the little girls this cornfield was swarming with soldiers searching for them. The rustling noise of the corn stalks swayed by the wind then blowing at first startled the little girls, and this made them hide suddenly.

They were just in time for a small group of Glandelinian privates approached.

"So the little snips were the Vivian Girls in disguise." Said one. "It's funny we didn't notice them before. And now they have escaped. It's strange."

"And yes and what's more strange about them is that if they are armed, armed we'll never get them, even if we discover them." Said another. You heard our commander say to be careful didn't you. Well that means business when he gave that command. Those Vivian Girls are more dangerous than a dozen escaped soldiers. They never miss a shot. So look out and shoot them, before they discover us. We must see them first. If not well have to drop to avoid being hit that's all."

"But how did they get away?" Asked another man they having stopped at this point.

"The camp or tent was not guarded, that's the reason." You see they were mistaken for runaway children from the child slave mills, and so were not guarded. I should think they ought to be guarded too."

"Just the same it was a mistake." Said a fourth man. "But how in the world can they disguise themselves so cleverly. And how many of the Vivian Girls are there for rear? First I heard there were only four, and we have captured eight of the little girls."

"There are only eight altogether." Said the man who had spoken first. They don't always operate in their spying expeditions together. Sometimes only one will do it, sometimes, three are spying on us, and at other times all of us do it. I have to admit that enemies though they are, and I though I hate them worse than a poisonous snake, nevertheless I do admire them. They know the consequences of spying on us if caught, and they care not. Bravery is not in them. It is downright recklessness. They fear nothing no matter if it comes to a spider, a mouse or a rat. The daring exploits they have accomplished throughout this war is a amazing. We have been sent to look for them now but I know we'll never catch them, or neither will we either find them. And I'll assure every one of you my comrades comrades that general Leavson and some others will be spied upon yet."

"Had not we better warn the general?" Advised one of the men. "Then he would be prepared, and if they tried to spy on him he could catch them red handed..."

"Yes I think one of you men had better go back and warn him telling him that the little spies have gotten away, and though we are scouring the fields for them, they are nevertheless hiding in the tent and enter his headquarters, to spy on him."

"I'll volunteer to go back and warn him." Said the first spokesman, and off he raced, almost colliding into one of the little girls as he passed their hiding place, but failing to discover them. He immediately went to the general's headquarters, and being ushered into his presence saluted and said;

"Your excellency, the little girls took advantage of their lack of guards to watch them, and have gotten away before we reached your tent their tent. It is not this that is alarming, it is something else. General for the sake of your country be on your guard. They'll spy on you as sure as your own general. They have eluded us though we are making a rigid search for them. Colonel Bainer for your information." Said general Leavson.

"But to be on my guard here would be futile. I have important words to give give to my officers, and as there is an old abandoned house in the field younger, close to the large cornpatch I'll use it, and the little girls will have the difference and the fastest they may have taken refuge in the building you mention." Said his assistant general, Berner. "If you go there you'll have to be careful."

"GOOD-CAST THE BLOOMING LUCK." Gried the constable general. "Then turning to the colonel he said;

"Have the building surrounded by a your men. And sent in a large party to look for them. Don't allow a single room to escape your searchers."

"I'll do so, but they may have escaped the building." Said the colonel excitedly. "Have you heard much about the Vivian Girls?"

"Indeed I have." Answered the general. "And enough to know what it is to allow the dangerous little snips to get the better of me. I'll have the place ransacked for them."

The colonel returned to the batch of men, gave an order, but it had been too late. Seeing that the coast had been clean once more, as the men had went on when the colonel went to warn the general, the little girls had again gathered courage to venture forth, and soon they reached the house unseen, and slipped in by the rear. Unexpected by them however the building was swarming with the Glandelinians who were searching for them, and once or twice in the little girls were almost discovered. Nevertheless they found a good hiding place, in a large dark room, and kept themselves concealed as long as they heard the shuffling of feet and the low murmur of voices. What saved the little girls was that the foe had been searching the building before they entered it, and so as this dark room had been searched at every point, the Glandelinians did not return, and some passing the door was heard to explain,

"We have looked in every room in this building, and it is perfectly evident that the Vivian spies are not here. So it is safe for the general and his officers to have his conference unobserved and without interference."

"Oh is that so?" Thought the little girls. "Well we'll see."

Soon all was quiet. Finally as the little girls were about to emerge from their hiding place, in stepped a party of high general in chiefs, and though Violet and her sisters had never observed these Glandelinian generals before, being complete strangers to them, nevertheless the main one was general Leavson..

All of them had their uniform coats bedecked with medals, their hats were of the Mexican make, or rather they resembled some of general Villias staff, their coats shaped like long greenish gray robes and each coat was banded with a rope of many various colors. Every man of them was a fierce not in looks but in character and fury as Satan himself, and walked toward the center of the big room with the majestic bearing of a party of great kings of the middle ages. Leavason looked very much like Villias, his staff looked like Villias under leaders, and every one wore a fierce dashing mustache. When they halted they lit the lights, and proceeded to go over the contents of the papers found littered on the table. For a time they were silent, only looking over the sheets of paper, writing as if they had done nothing else all their lives, and ending with a furious flourish of the pen. Finally after an hour of this motion, they straightened out everything neatly on the table, and then began at once into a lengthy conversation.

"It's a shame," said one; "How the armies under general John Manley, his brother, and father, suffered such a disastrous defeat at the great battle of Aronburg Run. His defeat has already caused a complication of disasters. All of his great divisions have been scattered and driven far apart from one another, and neither of them have been fully rallied as yet and are in great danger. As for their reuniting, I don't believe they ever will."

"But how in the world did they come to be defeated?" asked general Leavason. "It's true the christian army at the start was much larger, but the three Manleys, had better men, better arms, and three times more artillery, and better positions."

"I believe I know the reason," said general Franklin Evans. "You see as I heard it was General John Manley's plans to have the whole christian line attacked simultaneously by his self, and his father and brother. Well the whole christian line was attacked simultaneously, but at the beginning Federal did it all, and was beaten before general Huebman

Manley who was then advancing could arrive to his assistance. If it had not been for the pugnacious resistance of Vivian's center Huebman's advance would not have been delayed, and he could have prevented general Zimmermann and Evans McAllister from sending large troops to overwhelm and crush Federal to atoms like they did. Another cause was from the long delay of their father Johnston Jackson Manley. He arrived in the afternoon, but he claims he was delayed on account of the regions of McHollester Run and Made Evans being being unapproachable on account of the christian artillery which was putting in a storm of shells over the whole region as thick as a snowstorm of confetti at some ball or basarr. And if Jackson Manley had at once seized the McHollester Run immediately as he had been ordered to do, and stormed the ridges adjoining the Carnation called the White Rose and McHollester ridges and captured them, before the christian dogs could have crowned their horrible batteries there, he would have won despite the delay of the other two of course Jackson Manley was no fool, never intended to be, and obeyed the command but could never gain an inch of ground in any of these locations and made a perfect flood of blood and dead men for the horrible attempt, a sacrifice unheard of before. Hanson's desperate and pugnacious stand between Ophelia, Eva St. Clare and Chamberlaine also was the cause of it for every charge of the Glandelinians there was cut down annihilated, in a worse seething inferno of a battle ever seen before, and a thousand volcanic orators, in all their horrible scenes could not outdo the sublimity of the battle inferno at these points.

And the last reason was that either of the three Manleys were unable to take possession of the Vivian hills. If they tried to do so by sending forward one great wave of men, but the generals called Hanson and Robert Vivian hurled one half of their entire forces in a hellish counter charge, cut the wave into a thousand pieces, and drove the remainder over that inferno and field of blood and massacre for the distance of twenty miles in a headlong rout, and beyond rally. Had the three Manleys been able to throw their forces forward simultaneously instead of being delayed by such terrific resistance the christian dogs would never have won, would never have gotten possession of those most important ridges, and would not have been able to concentrate their strongest forces along the Gallies and McWhirther Run. And they would have been driven from the McHollester woods entirely and a serious break here in the christian line would have ended it before the battle could have become so horrible and caused such a wholesale loss on even both sides. It would have been better for them as it would have been for us."

"I don't doubt that all this is true," said general Leavason. "But nevertheless if general Black Brooks, and Happy Hooligan accomplish the purpose they have set out to do, all will be well. The Abbeismian army 160,555,000 strong under general Everette True is advancing to retake Big-Girlknool, and if Black Brooks and Happy Hooligan frustrate him, we will be able to make a successful stand ourselves against the christian armies under general Jack Evans, and enable the three Manleys to regather their dissipated armies. It's the purpose of the two christian Vivian generals, to prevent the three McManleys from regathering their widely scattered forces from ever making a junction with one another, and to keep them down as they are now. If those two christian dogs succeed our beloved cause will be lost, and we will be vanquished like frightened sheep. And indeed it is a dreadful state of affairs we are in. The christian dogs are upon us like an overwhelming flood, and there is now immediate danger that they will make a great and destructive invasion. These christian dogs are mad clean through over the frightful destruction our former superiors caused in their country and Calverindia, and there is no telling what they will do if they once start to overrun our beloved country. Since the defeats of the three Manley's at the battle of Aronburg Run our country is at stake. We must fight more harder to uphold its cause."

There followed a few minutes silence, then another of the generals said;

"That little rebel called Annie Aronburg when ten of our most worthy generals are responsible for in her death, must be a peculiar child. The Angelinians are infuriated at her assassination, and the assassination of so many children, whether slain in their own homes or in child slave plantations and mills. It is to this that I give the reason of the pugnacious character of the Angelinians. Of course we ourselves have not been engaged yet, but nevertheless I've heard how savagely those Angelinians, Abby Abyssinkilians, Calverinians, Concentinians, and Abbeismians fight. No matter how cautious we are when we do make an attack, our losses have been unspeakably horrible. Hanson, Evans, Robert Vivian, Williamsburger Zimmermann, Vivian, and general Roswell Buster Johnston, are the most savage fighters of the whole christian nation. But just now it appears as if general Jack Evans is the worse."

"He is," said another general. "He thrashed the three Manleys in succession, at Moriaty, Marie Osborn, and other battles, and though at first disastrously beaten at Cromer Andread, he finally caused the capture of the city and the whole army defending it, with all their munition stores, artillery and supplies of every kind."

This conversation was very interesting to Violet and her sisters. They saw that these Glandelinian generals realized the strength of the mighty christian armies, and also of the fury of the Angelinians when they were aroused. They listened to every word that was said by these Glandelinian generals. However there was no important plan involved in as yet and as soon as the officers left the little girls emerged from their hiding places. There was a large round table in the room, but everything they looked through on the top of the table was no importance to them at all.

There was a mantle shelf on the west wall with a jar standing on the top. The jar was made in the shape of a crook. They discovered something hidden in the crook, and Violet standing on a stool, took out the papers, that bore in gilt letters signs that they were indeed important plans and documents. There were twenty oblong sheets, almost resembling immense twenty dollar bills of American money, though each sheet was over a foot long and a half wide. Writing in gilt letters was on the other side of each sheet.

"What do you know about these papers?" said Violet as she and her sisters looked them over. "My goodness but they almost make me feel sad. They tell the location of every christian army, their most important positions, by word and map, and if we do not keep hold of these and do not make a get away, those rascally Glandelinians will bamboozle our armies."

"I know what we will do," said K. J. Jermie. "We'll take these to general Evans, and he'll send them to papa or uncle."

They were just about to make for the windows, when they heard approaching footsteps, and fearing that they would be discovered, the little girls hastily crept deeply into their hiding places. Soon the same officers came back. There was several moments conversation, then one of the generals said:

"I have a bunch of papers in this crook on the mantelpiece that should ever the three Manleys get in their possession it would be to the entire ruin of the christian dogs. I'll fetch them, and show them to you right now."

He advanced toward the spot, took down the crook, looked into it, and then cried:

"My gracious they're gone."

In a few seconds all the officers and even the privates, were hunting for what had been in the crook. The main general, that is Leaverson acted just crazy; the others were acting much worse, some were just gazing in circles, and so were the privates. Violet and her sisters realized that it was in vain to sneak out just then, for the now excited, alarmed and enraged Glandelinians would surely see them, and with wild yells leap on them all in a bunch. The Glandelinians were frenzy stricken over their loss, and finally became convinced that they had been spied upon. When the realization of this burst upon the wicked Glandelinians generals their fury knew no bounds. At first they believed that it was some man or christian soldier who had spied upon them, and so orders were at once given that the camp and all its immediate vicinity should be secured. But when no spy of any kind could be found, general Leaverson firmly believed that he had been tricked after all, that the Vivian girls were in the place, or had been, and that they had stolen the most important papers.

"It's the Vivian girls. It's the Vivian girls," he shouted. "They have been here after all, in spite of all my precautions. To outwit them seems impossible. But by gad they must be captured. General Franklin see to it that no one is allowed to pass out of the lines no matter who they be."

The general rushed out to obey the order. Violet and her sisters had in the meantime observed all the excitement of the Glandelinian generals, and as the soldiers and officers finally left the room, the brave little children proceeded to leave the building as quickly as possible. They had to be careful however as the Glandelinians all around now were watchful, and there was danger of their being seized.

They were bound at all costs to keep free from the Glandelinians and so saw to it that all their automatics were well loaded. To leave the building just then seemed impossible, so they stayed quietly where they were. Guards were now placed in the room.

"We are cornered," whispered Violet. "It seems impossible for us to escape just now."

"So it does at that," said Jennie. "But just the same if they do discover us they'll never take us alive."

"You bet they won't," said Joice. "But just the same we'll have to be careful, and not expose ourselves."

"Maybe we can slip past the guards and escape through the great corridor of the building," said Catherine. "Any way if the guards see us we can fire our automatics."

"No the noise would arouse them," said Hettie. "If we rush out all together we can take those guards by surprise and bind and gag them."

This they decided to do. Lifting up the satchels, the little girls cooked their automatics, and at once rushed out of their hiding places, to the surprise of the guards, who found themselves covered by eight little ugly blue things. There were twenty of the guards, and only eight of the little girls, but then twenty M Glandelinians were no match for eight automatics, and they nicely placed their weapons in the middle of the floor and threw up their hands, while Violet and Jennie bound all except one.

"To this one Jennie said:

"We are bound to get away and if you wish to save your worthless life you'll tell me and my sisters the exit unguarded."

The soldier pointed to the fireplace as he being gagged but not bound was able to use his arms. They now bound him, and leaving the room they stepped out carefully into the corridor toward the end where the fireplace the soldier pointed out to them was located. Seeing no one just then, they proceeded on tiptoeing their way toward the fireplace. But as they peeked out toward the main section of the corridor, they were startled by seeing seven guards standing in different positions. To escape this way was impossible. They proceeded toward the open door of one of the other rooms. Six Glandelinian officers, were sitting beside a table, smoking cigarettes, and playing a game with cards.

They had decided to jump out of a window, but again their plans were frustrated, and they had a narrow escape from being seen by the Glandelinian officers. One of the officers, playing cards, who was a captain, was heard to say:

"Dod! gosh the luck. I have a hand hand again."

"Another of the Glandelinians was he ard to say:

"If I lead the kink I betchaderlife, he trumps with the ace." Before the brave little girls could pass this room there came a loud pounding at the rear door. At once the little girls hid in a vacant room in the darkest part of the fire place they observed there. One of the guards who had looked it after the departure of the frate and worried general Leaverson returned to open it again. The little girls had stepped into a chamber that had a window at the farther end. The servant had some trouble in unlocking the door, the knock being repeated more loudly.

Still he had trouble as the lock would not unfasten, and at that moment the knocking again sounded, this time with angry violence and fury. Finally he succeeded in turning the lock, and a moment later there came the sound of men rushing in, and then the voice of general Blagdon crying loudly and angrily:

"What in the devil has come over this house sentry g. Gen. H. Gerard that it opens easily to Christian spies, like the Vivian Girls, and stays closed all this time against the loyal troops of Glandelinia? Are you trying to harbor those spies you darn fool!"

Before the astonished guard could reply, one of the officers who had been with the rest in the adjoining room playing cards, appeared, attracted by the noisy arrival of general Blagdon and his officers who were with him. This officer who was also a general appeared to be about sixty, but he carried his tall figure stiffly erect, and his eyes were bright and keen. He held a hand of playing cards, and his face wore a frown over the sudden commotion. Behind him in the doorway appeared the other Glandelinian officers who had been playing cards with him, these last standing on their toes to see what was the disturbance.

"What is going on general Blagdon?" demanded the old

Glandelinian general.

"A very remarkable thing general Valier," replied general Blagdon. "Eight christian spies, who are children, was discovered by myself and these officers through one of the windows of this hall. I saw them passing or trying to pass your room. I also saw them try to slip up twenty guards in the room they escaped from. It is they who have found refuge in your headquarters, and stolen general Leaverson's most important plans."

"WHAT?" cried the old general. "My headquarters shelter them dirty little christian spies. You seem to be walking in your sleep general Blagdon, for not shooting them down where you saw them, and I could have you held responsible for your failure. You must get them, or I'll expose you for not shooting them down on sight. How did you discover them in the window?"

"Why general Leaverson told me about the loss of his plans, and as we approached the building we saw the footprints of eight children from the mud on the porch. The same feet left marks of mud on the porch, to your very door, and there are no marks leading away from it. It is true we did not fire on sight, for the reason that the little devils saw us and slipped out of sight. More over I'm no new officer, and I'm from Manley's command, and have served in the war from the start as a lieutenant to the commission of a general. From this I know the little devils."

At this point general Leaverson hastened down the stairs, at first nonchalantly, but on approaching the foot, gave a look of wonderment and surprise at the scene in the hall. They all saluted him and he asked:

"Why what has happened general Valier? What is it all. You officers?"

"And now," cried general Blagdon excitedly, "I know the spies have been here since I left the place an hour ago. General Leaverson you have been spied upon."

"What spies?" demanded general Leaverson turning red. "And I in here? Impossible!"

"Yes your excellency I saw them," cried Blagdon. "And this door was locked before the guard admitted me, for I have heard him unlock it. Does not that show that no one could have come in before, and that the little devils were the ones who locked it. We officers never look out our own selves out, and doubtless the little spies found the door unlocked when they arrived."

"Well, well," said general Leaverson, "The question can be easily settled. Let your troops search the place general Blagdon. I certainly don't wish to have those spies lodged in my headquarters. And I'm bound to recover those important papers. Don't leave a room and any place in this building overlooked."

"Thank you your excellency," said general Blagdon his eyes flashing triumph, while the little girls stepped back into the chamber, from the doorway at the landing.

The little girls did not dare to close the door after them, lest its creak, or the loud noise of its latch might attract the attention of the Glandelinian officers in the hallway below. Violet and her sisters had seen that some of these officers, once belonged to Manley's command. Blagdon gave some instructions in a low voice to an under officer. The latter led four men into the rooms opening on the hall, while Blagdon, and two of the troops remained where they were as a guard to the great doors at the hall's either end, and placed guards to surround the building. The searching party next went below the stairs. These presently came out empty handed, from the lower regions, and hurried upstairs, passing unnoticed the open door way as they went. After several minutes they returned disappointed of their prey. Every room but the one with the open door had now been looked through, the searchers having doubtless been ordered by Blagdon to leave that one exempt. He had probably hoped that the fugitives might be found elsewhere. But now realizing the fact that they may be there, he commanded to the under officer:

"Search that last room."

Violet and her sister beyond the threshold, ran to the window at the chambers further end, and tried with might and main to open it, but it would not yield to their strongest pressure. Not able in the darkness to learn how it was fastened, the little girls despaired of finding exit by means of it, so they returned to their place near the open door, determined to create confusion by firing should the searchers come up to their hiding place.

This general with his searchers started for the place, there was a volley of shots from the Vivian Girls and the general and all the men who started up the steps fell wounded and disabled. Again again the soldiers rushed up the steps firing in return, but the little girls held the way for a few minutes, with the deliberate fire of their automatics that no one could reach the top of the steps, the rear soldiers being obstructed by the men who fell dead or wounded.

The other Glandelinian soldiers now hesitated, and general Blagdon, who was preparing to lead the charge himself looked puzzled and annoyed. He knew the fury of the little spies when cornered and he did not like to make any further sacrifices. Blagdon stood defeated, at a loss, the remainder of his men making swift charge up the steps, having seen their comrades drop in frightful numbers, and falling down the steps in all kinds of positions, retreated backwards to the front door, and lieutenant Gerard who was among the wounded arose to a sitting posture and regaining his breath, nursed his wound.

There came a knock at the front door, and as the guard opened it in walked general Franklin. This general looked around in surprise.

"General," spoke up Blagdon, yet half breathless, and nursing his second wound. "There is serious resistance here. The eight little spies have been discovered in this house and when their hiding place has been observed, they have shown resistance, and shot all these men down killing six and wounding twenty five of them."

The little girls finding themselves trapped, decided to try the rear of the chamber where there was an open window but found underneath a number of guards. Also under every window of the place, and other exits they saw Glandelinian soldiers standing on guard.

"They certainly have the building well guarded."

Said Catherine. "The best we can do is to make to the roof. There we may find a chance for our escape."

"But how can we reach the roof?" asked Violet. "There is no way to it that I can see."

"How about the chimney flue?" cried Joice. "Maybe we can climb through it to the roof."

Violet looked up the flue. She saw that escape that way up to the roof was easy, but that also they would be pretty black, when they got up. Nevertheless up they went, slowly one by one. Just as the last one worked herself up the officers and privates came into the room. They saw nothing of the children, or any symptoms of their climbing up the flue, so the officers had no idea that the children had been in this room, and escaped through and up the chimney, and wondered indeed where they went. When Violet and her sisters reached the roof, they were as black as an ace of spades, from the soot and looked like little little soot beauties. They glanced over the low wall surrounding the roof, and saw that they were twenty feet from the ground, the building only being two stories high, and low stories at that.

A tall tree stood at the right of the building, but it would take a daring leap to reach the nearest branch as it was ten feet from the edge of the roof.

"Our hash is cooked if we don't succeed in escaping from this roof," said Evangeline. "The Glandelinians will discover us far up here, as here we cannot be hidden long long."

"We must make a jump for that branch," said Violet. "It's our only hope. And we can do it."

They decided to try it.

"We must jump one by one," said Joice. "As all of us cannot do it at one time. As the branch will not hold us all. It would precipitate us to the ground, and then even if not injured, we would be captured again. So one at a time sisters. Remember."

Joice decided to make the first leap. So running back a few paces, she dashed forward and gave one leap. Her aim was accurate, and she successfully grasped the branch. It swung in a way that was menacing but it did not give way, and as she climbed hand over hand she saw a number of officers seated at a round table below her playing a card game. As she reached the trunk, she climbed down unseen. Jennie followed, then Violet and little Evangeline. But as Gertrude sprang for the branch as and grasped it, it gave way with a loud whip like snap, and both the brave child and the branch crashed down on the table and officers, bearing down ten of the officers, causing uncontrollable confusion among the rest who scattered, and upsetting and smashing the table around which they had been playing poker. All of the Glandelinians were driven into consternation, by this unexpected occurrence, and before they could recover, Gertrude, who was unhurt, dashed away and out of sight in the darkness, but for the three other little Vivian Girls, escape seemed nil. That nearest branch had withstood only the one.

Four of the little girls, and when Gertrude took her chance it failed to support her.

Three of Violet's sisters were still up on the roof, and now the wicked Glandelinians were thoroughly aroused as to the situation, and a general hubbub aroused as it was realized that the spies had escaped by means of the roof.

Fortunately for little Hettie, Catherine, and Daisy, their presence on the roof was not yet known by the Glandelinians, or otherwise presenting a fair mark up there they would have been riddled by bullets.

They watched the movements of the excited Glandelinian soldiers, saw the men run up with strong flashlights, and lanterns, and other officers approaching, and inquiring the cause of the din and commotion. The soldiers had picked up the overturned and broken table, and gathered up the cards which had been scattered all about, and one of the men gave answer.

"As one of those dod-gasted Vivian Girls, with a branch from down on top of us from this tree. They not only spy on us but spoil a game when we are at the most exciting part. And it was that one called Gertrude Angelina darnn her. I recognized her despite the boyscout uniform she wore. And she was black as an ace of spades all over."

"This must be looked into," said the officer grimly. "Our general has been robbed by those tricky little spies, who are mere children, and so that one was one of them. See that the others do not escape. Since you say the one who fell on the table with the brace branch was black with soot, then the little devils, have escaped through the chimney flue. I'll immediately organize a party to go in search of the one who escaped."

The officer issued some orders, and soon he was rushing off with a swarm of men who were detailed to search for the fugitives. In the meantime Hettie, Catherine and Daisy did not know what to do. They were confident however that their sisters would escape. But now Violet and her other sisters did not intend to go off without Hettie and her two sisters. While the searching Glandelinians were swarming all around, swinging even their rifles to make sure of getting their victims, Violet and her sisters remained hidden behind some trees, with their pistols drawn. They were within plain sight of the house, and saw their little sisters on the house roof. As soon as most of the wicked Glandelinians were out of sight, they stole cautiously back toward the house, and tried vainly to enter again, but every door was fastened.

"How are we going to rescue them?" whispered Joice. "We cannot get into the house again as every door is fastened."

"But we got to," said Jennie. "They must be rescued. And before those searching for us return."

"I see a long coil of rope hanging from that window," said Gertrude Angeline. "If we can secure it we'll succeed."

Jennie pulled on the rope and down it came. Violet and Angeline secured it, and unseen by any one on account of the darkness, the little girls dragged it forward, and fastened one end firmly around the trunk of the tree. Jennie unrolled the rest of it, made a noose out of the other end. Then finding a piece of paper lying on the grass, Jennie tore off a small piece, and then writing this:

"Hettie, fasten noose to chimney. Other end fastened around the trunk of the tree. Escape to tree by rope."

Jennie."

she fastened this to the noose, and then tossed it successfully to the roof.

Hettie who had been looking for some other way of escape, heard a swishing noise and something landing with a slight thud on the roof, and as she glanced back, and saw the twisting rope she gave a low cry, and seized it. Reading the note, she obeyed its directions, and in a minute all of the little girls were together again, just as the number of the Glandelinians reached the roof by means of the skylights. The soldiers reached the roof just in time to see the last fugitive disappear in the darkness.

Going on in the darkness the little girls passed safely through the enemy's camp, and soon headed toward the wall crowned precipice that overlooked the Mc-Whirther Run which also ran through Glandelinia. The little girls prodded on through mud and darkness, past near and distant Glandelinian camps looming through the darkness in the distance, keeping a lookout behind them, and up and down what slight hill is they mounted and descended, past near and distant churches, monasteries, seminaries, gardens, fine houses, and mean houses also possessed by the Glandelinian troops and officers, and came eventually to a long and low rampart, near a large Glandelinian battery, ten miles long and consisting of a thousand guns from which the precipice fell steeply to the narrow strip of the lower wooded regions that lay between the cliffs base and the great Mc-Whirther Run....

This large rampart, which could avail mainly to shield the batteries, that commanded all approaches to the series of Glandelinian camps, was as easy of ascent from the inside, as it was not expected that any one would have the nerve to attempt leaving the upper great camps by the almost perpendicular precipice of more than two thousand feet. Yet such was the wild intention that Violet and her sisters had formed. The attempt on the part of the fugitives seemed the more preposterous for the fact should the little girls accomplish the almost impossible feat of safely descending the cliff, they would be but find themselves in the lower camps, which was defended at either end, and closely guarded along the river edge—unless they should traverse the face of the cliff diagonally, so as to arrive at the base outside the northern barrier of the Glandelinian camp.

The little girls knew that the artillery of the enemy encircled the upper portions of this Glandelinian camp on its high sections, while the lower portions lying against the precipice, needed no other defense than the promontory itself. It was neither practicable nor necessary, that walled batteries should run down the promontory's side, hence the eight little Vivian girls finding themselves on the steep declivity, between the upper and lower camps had a way of exit open to them, provided the little girls could traverse obliquely the face of the great cliff, and could avoid observation from above or below. This way of escape recommended itself to Violet and her sisters, because all outskirts of the camps would not be watched for them, and because it would bring them directly to the place that would insure their complete escape.

Violet and her sisters knew that the rampart overlooking the great Mc-Whirther Run would be just as strongly guarded, but nevertheless they decided to take the chances. Slinking at a distance past the right flank of the great and grand battery, whose overworked sentries were shivering in the chilly rain still falling, the little girls found a place where a platform enabled them to mount easily the rampart.

Across this immense rampart, more immense than they had expected, Violet and her sisters crawled, making out through the darkness, a line of numerous sentries, who paced several hundred feet away from each other keeping up a sharp outlook but failing to see the little spies. Looking out over the outer edge of the rampart, their heads turned giddy, for a moment at the sight of the precipice which at this point fell sheer almost 3,777 feet, to the narrow fringe of houses, and the gloomy river below.

But Violet and her sisters chose a spot where there was ample footing at the ramparts base, turned about, looked out that the guards did not see them, backed from the rampart, hung for a moment by their fingers, and dropped to the chosen place. Their fall softened by what deep mud lay there. The main thing they looked out for was that not a misstep would be made that would precipitate them into the horrible depths below.

The little girls immediately turned their faces toward their distant destination, and peered through the darkness, for what projections, and great indentations of the cliff might serve their progress. They thanked their stars for the evidence soon afforded them, that their adopted mode of escape, was within possibility, perilous though it might be, and then for the thick darkness which shielded them from the sight of the Glandelinian sentries, and for the glossiness of the mud, which now and then helped them to adhere to the cliff, for the irregularities of the precipice were such that the lodgment of the mud had endured here and there on its steep face.

These irregularities gave the little girls footing and enabled them to proceed downward. Many times they slipped, tearing their boyscout uniforms, and scraping the skin off their knees and elbows, but each time the little girls kept their wits, and availed themselves of the first stopping place that offered. The descent was a work of four hours, so cautiously did they have to proceed, so carefully to pick out their next footing, so often to regain their breath and rest. At last they passed beyond the blockhouses guarding the main chain of Glandelinian batteries, which together constituted the outer barrier of this end of the lower camp. They had descended to the depth of 3,560 feet, and in the light from the blockhouses, and camp fires, they could see lines of sentries pacing from the cliffs foot, and along the edge of the swift river.

Some minutes more of desperate effort brought Violet and her sister past the top of some sort of a stockade, which also formed the outer barrier, and the exultation of this success almost intoxicated the brave little girls. They let themselves slide down what remained of the cliff, heedless a like of the sharp projections, and of the Gargolian militia housed behind the long line of stockades and batteries.....

As the little girls stood at last in the narrow way between the great swift river and cliff, restraining an impulse to shout with glee, they took the sheets of paper they had captured in Leavensons headquarters, from beneath their shirtwaists, and putting them again into one bundle tied them firmly, and then Violet took possession of them.

Suddenly from over the top of one of the stockades a rattling volley of shots was fired, but none of the little girls were hit, while simultaneously a gate in the stockades was thrown open, and many soldiers strode forth while again at the same moment many tall forms sprang out from the shadow of a broken line of rocks, far in front of the little girls, and yelled:

"HALT OR WE FIRE!"

Violet and her sisters were not too entirely sure they might not indeed elude the bunch of Glandelinian soldiers, from the rocks, and the stockade, but nevertheless, they drew their own guns, opened fire, and darted behind another line of rocks just as the Glandelinians answered with a clattering clattering roar of musketry. As fast as Violet and her sisters fired, the soldiers though dropping at every shot, increased so tremendously, in numbers, and shortened the intervening distance so speedily that Violet and her sisters saw that they must catch them in a few seconds, that nothing could stop the advance of so many. The idea of capture, when knowing the results of capture in the hands of these Glandelinians became intolerable to them. A kind of madness arose in the little girls making them determined at any costs not to fall into the hands of the Glandelinians who were endeavoring to surround them, and so when they felt themselves almost in the grasp of the foremost, they wheeled aside, and plunged headforemost into the swift current of the great Mc-Whirther Run. While the water gurgled in their ears they jubilantly pictured the to themselves, the many Glandelinians standing baffled on the shore, and cursing the luck that had robbed them of their prey.

Soon rising to the surface, Violet and her sisters struck out at random, using both arms and legs. Whither would this swim in the dark lead them? The little girls scarcely cared, now that they had accomplished their mission; their one wish was that it should not diminish their triumph, by delivering them up to the foe. All at once something black loomed up before them, a large dreadnaught, whose lights the little girls had not taken to heart, or to be so near, and whose size they could not immediately make out. As the little girls turned to swim away from it, they heard a voice can call out immediately over them;

"Eight children swimming in the river."

They pulled away, but they heard other cries, became aware that a boat was being sent after them, and then felt themselves caught up, and drawn by the hands of men into the boat. The little girls were too bewildered to answer the few questions, that were asked on the way back to the warship. But as they landed the little girls on the deck, they realized they were on a Glandelinian dreadnaught, but its crew must be unacquainted with their faces, hence they dared raise one last desperate hope of completing their escape. As the little girls stood on the deck surrounded by the crew, that had brought them from the water, they were approached by two officers, one of whom ordered them to stand forward, while the other remained a little aloof in dignified immovability.

"I beg you will put us boys ashore sir," said Violet somewhat excitedly and forgetting for the moment that she and her sisters were little girls, having said this to the officer who addressed her and her sisters. "I had just left the region of the stockade younger on a mission for general Manley. We fell in with a reconnoitering party of soldiers, who assailed us without reason, regardless of our uniforms, and escaped by taking to the river. May we be landed on the other shore immediately to go on our mission without delay?"

"What papers have you to show for this account of yourselves?" demanded the officer, scrutinizing the little girls.

"I had general Manley's pass in my hand when I and my companions were attacked," said Violet with no outward falter; "But I must have let it go in the river. But my companions have the same kind of passes and can show them to you. I had no other papers; the message we carry is a verbal one."

"A message to? To whom?"

"To general John Manley."

"Why this is fortunate," said the officer, turning to the other group of officers. "I'll have you little boys placed ashore immediately."

And he did so not recognizing the children in the least and again the little girls had escaped. It was a narrow escape at that. The little girls traveled onward in the darkness until the approach of morning. As they were nearing a hilly region, they were startled by a roaring and droning noise that is made by aeroplanes, and looking up toward one certain hill, saw ten beautiful Blengiglomean serpents, flying in the sky above the hill. Outlined on the top was a large swarm of Glandelinians and the men in possession of a big gun was raising it to fire at the great and beautiful creatures which were all Tuskorhorians.

"If those fools fire on those serpents there will be a most horrible scene," said Jennie.

But just then there came a thunderous crash from the gun, followed by a violent explosion high up in the air among the foremost of the cruel Blengiglomean Serpents, and the little girls thought sure that some of them would come down mortally wounded, and almost screamed in horror and pity as they shaded their eyes.

However the Blengiglomean serpents were indeed hurt and it was their private feelings at that, and not any injuries from the shell. And I should say they did come down. Three of them. It was all over in about a minute.

Thirty of the Glandelinians were killed as the largest of the serpents making one headlong swoop tore his tail through the column like a tornado, making a cornfield, wrecking the gun simultaneously by tossing it two hundred feet into the air with the tuskorhorians on its head. As it passed on a spangled winged creature, made a almost simultaneous swoop, striking down the remainder of the column of the right of the hill with a crashing blow of its wing, and mangling them all horribly. The survivors realizing now the fury of these creatures fled like frightened sheep, the great serpents pursuing the rascally devils clean to their camp and not satisfied with the damage already done, the creatures swooped through a good portion of the camp and did not discontinue their attack until a thousand guns were wrecked, three thousand men being killed, and 10,000 injured, and nearly 100,000 tents overturned and torn up.

Violet and her sisters had witnessed the whole scene, having been almost shocked by the tremendous barking roar of the creatures after the shell explosion, and saw the three bigger ones, make a descent like the funnel of a tornado, saw the dash among the soldiers; the gun sailing high up into the air, the tail of the big blue and yellow one tear through the column on the left, saw a horse and tree with rider go down, another horse with rider rear on his haunches, and then also plunged down the hill like a descending barrel. They saw the spangled serpent strike the repeated blows with his wings roaring most frightfully all the while, saw the remainder of the re-confused masses retreat like sheep, and saw also the cyclonic attack upon the Glandelinian camp. Not daring to expose themselves to the eyesight of these infuriated Blengiglomean serpents in their gray uniforms they hastily took them off revealing their own clothing, and changing the form of their hair, rather risking exposure among the foe, than have the Cramecian Tuskorhorians mistake them for Glandelinian boy scouts like the little one did during or after the battle of Franvois Atlanta.

The whole camp had been driven into confusion by the attack, the batteries of gun guns crowned the summit of the precipice having been hurled down into the river by the enraged serpents, and dead and wounded strewn the company company streets like if there had been a terrific battle raging.

Out of the whole ten serpents that had been flying in the air, only four made the attack, one being a pink one and who had been the first assailant, who had crushed the thirty men under its huge serpentine body.

As soon as the excitement was over the little girls having changed changed their clothing to their normal wear, emerged from their hiding places cautiously as the serpents were still hovering about, flying around performing huge circles, and making a great clamor. Reaching a creek, and unobserved by the creatures the little girls washed their hands and faces as best as they could, though having to do it without soap as they had none, and then they boldly ventured forth.

One of the creatures observed the beautiful little girls, and it was the one who had tore its tail through the Glandelinian column so furiously. It hovered far above them following them where ever they went. The serpent evidently knew who they were and did this with the intention to guard them against the wicked Glandelinians who may try to capture the little girls as the Glandelinians were scouring the country for them.

Soon the little girls reached a railroad line, and seeing a freight that had stopped at a water tank got on unseen by any one but the Blengiglomean serpent. The trainmen had seen the attack of the serpents, and being christians had declared that it served the rascals right for firing on them without provocation.

Soon the train pulled out and after it was going thirty miles an hour the serpent still following hovered lower, and now the little girls attracted by the loud droning noise heard above the roar of the train were conscious of the presence of the great creature, and though wondering why he was following them they nevertheless felt no alarm, and believed it was for their good.

"My won't Evans be surprised when he sees what we seized from the Glandelinians," said Violet placing her arm around little Jennie. "We had to suffer so much on account of these cruel Glandelinians and so why not strike back and spy on them all we want."

"You bet, and we will," said Jennie. "Our night work indeed indeed will spoil the whole war for the rascally Glandelinians!"

"Let's look at the papers again," said Joise.

Soon all of the little girls were occupied in looking at every sheet of paper. Every one was a plan either in map form on a twenty dollar frontal design of writhings of the most importance to the christians. The most important of all ran as follows;

"To the Manleys of Glandelinia;

It is true you have been worsted by the christians at Glorinia, but if you will follow out these plans, that are placed on these sheets of paper revealing money, you will not only regain your armies that have been so widely scattered but you will also, be able to outwit the christian dogs in every way possible, will be able to crush the mightiest christian armies, will be able to capture the dirty Vivian girl without further trouble, and their parents and other relations as well, and put the whole of the christian nation under the power of Glandelinia. Through all out through our soldiers, and ourselves, we have successfully bound ourselves to a work of irreligion. We have extinguished the lights of heaven, and if we can help it they shall never be rekindled. We have shown the papists, and toilers that heaven contains nothing but horrible chimeras."

"Such awful blasphemy!" Said Violet. "Well we'll soon show him whether the heavens are filled with chimeras."

"What are chimeras?" Asked Jennie. "They are related to the fable dragons are they not?"

"They are dragons themselves going under another name, but dragons with more than one or two heads. It's because of the numerous heads that they are called chimeras."

Another which they found of importance was also as follows:

In garrison at Glandelinia the capitol city:

77,399 Fusiliers.
2,234,000 Royal grenadiers.
2,122,554 in cavalry/
222,888, artillery, fr fire-workers etc.
3,234,567 Glandelinian militia.
9,876,554, Ovarians.
4,000,000 Seamen/
5,876,339, Masters, men of vessels, and sailors.
3,500,000 marines.
1,200,000 Artificers.

32,354,454.....Total.

Indeed the little girls were surprised at the findings they had made. They realized that they had frustrated the enemy in everything they planned, and had captured the most important series of plans that they had ever captured in their lives. They congratulated themselves on it and only wished that the train would reach the Christian lines before evening. The day was clear and warm, and as favorable as they had wished it to be.

After three hours of riding, the train stopped at a wayside station, and the little girls were soon startled by hearing voices say:

"Yes Mr. Breakman we are sure the little spies are hiding on your train. The children are known as the Vivian Girls. I'm sorry to have your train stopped like this, but duty is duty, and we must get the little rascals before they reach the Christian lines."

"Very well Lieutenant you may search the whole train. There are many empty box cars on this train and they may be hidden any one of them."

The little girls heard footsteps approaching the car they were hidden in, and crouching in the darkest corners of the empty boxcar the little girls awaited the searchers with beating hearts. Three men came to the door and looked in. Fortunately for the little girls the boxcar was a thick iron one and so they were well protected by bullet proof iron. The door itself was only open three inches. The men saw the little girls and said in a bullish tone:

"So you little devils are hiding in here are you? Come out and surrender yourselves this minute."

"Yes us little devils are in here." Said Violet with as much sass as she could assume. "Will you wait until we come out, or will you dare come in and get us?"

"You little saucy gittersnipes will be shot if you do not obey our commands." Said another of the men. "You have learned important things from the Glandelinian generals ye little snaking spies and thieves and have stolen the most important plans. We want you and you'll have to give yourselves up do you hear?"

"Yes we are not deaf." Said Jennie, and then adding as she saw them starting to push aside the sliding door:

"I'll drop every one of you if you dare open that dorr door."

And all the little girls drew their automatics. With startled exclamations the Glandelinians were about to dash away when again Jennie cried:

"Stay where you are you rascally blasphemers and enemies of God. You cannot dash away from us as fast as we can shoot quicker than you expect.

You wanted us so now come in and take us. We are ready."

Indeed the Glandelinians did not know what to do. They had come to capture Violet and her sisters with the intentions of not bringing them back to the camp as spies, but had the wicked intentions to murder them in cold blood and found themselves trapped.

"How many of you men are there?" Asked Angeline.

The men were silent.

She fired at them, but at random, and still a bullet lodged in one of their shoulders.

"Answer me and if you refuse this once again I'll kill every one of you." She cried angrily.

"We are the only ones here." Was the answer.

"Jedoo and on Catherine." Said Angeline. "See that coil of rope in the corner. Tie them up." Then turning to the men she said:

"You may have the pleasure of opening with the door and come in on a pleasant visit."

"You are;-----"

"I said come in didn't I?" She coldly exclaimed. "I'm wasting my breath, and I need it."

As they knew she would fire again, and this time with fatal effect they obeyed with pouts, and ugly mumblings, and the little girls tied them hand and foot and then gagging them left them lying in the center of the car. The little girls fearing more trouble left the car and surprising the engineer ordered him out of the engine.

"We are going to run it ourselves." Said Violet. "We know by your looks that you are not in favor of the foe cause, but nevertheless you have been weak hearted to allow them to stop your car. But never mind. We'll allow you and the firemen to remain. But on the condition that you'll allow one of us little girls to run the train within the Christian lines, and to leave the calaboose behind with the other car which we came from far to the rear."

The engineer and firemen were flabbergasted.

"What?" They cried excitedly. "You little girls run this engine? I'd like to see you do it?"

"All you will have to do is allow us!"

"I'll bet you all this money in my hand here that any of you little girls cannot run this engine." Said the engineer.

"I'll take the bet." Said Violet also producing the money she had with her.

"That's a go." Answered the engineer. "George go to the firemen uncouple that car with the dirty old Glandelinian skunks. And lose no time either."

This was done, the good breakmen who alone were free doing so willingly having been overjoyed that the little girls had tricked them, though not knowing who the children really were. After ten minutes of switching the calaboose was placed back as the request of the little girls, who operated all the switching themselves each little girl taking turns at the engine.

If the engineer did not drop from sheer excitement and astonishment, he surely must have felt like it.

"Where in the name of heaven did you little girls come from?" He gasped his eyes opened wide with his bewilderment.

They revealed their true identification. When the engineer realized they were really the Vivian Girls he was only too glad to do anything for them, and allow one of them to run the provision train into the Christian line herself.

"I refused to say anything to the fools." He said. "And I did not stop the train for those three Glandelinian skunks. I had to stop as it was a station where I intended to unload some stuff. They surprised me and I tried to make me reveal where you children were. I saw you little girls get on this train and that was the reason I started off so soon from that region. But now I'll not stop at all. Afraid of those Glandelinians, if I had told them where you were you would have been surprised and killed. I told them I knew where you were, but that it would take only God to make me tell. Any of these breakmen will tell you so. They knew too but though they led the rascals they took their time about it and made the Glandelinians speak as you would hear them and be prepared. And you were."

"I beg your pardon then for our mistake." Said Violet as now the materials were unloaded. "We did not know it."

"Do you know where the location of general Evans' army is?" Asked Jennie.

"No." Said the engineer. "But there are so many Christian armies near that I can't fail to run into any one of them."

The little girl now had the train going full speed but now all danger from pursuit was over for they were now within the regions of the Christian lines. After riding for three more hours the train slowed down at another station and to the surprise of the little girls, soldiers in purple were swarming on the platform. It was Evans' army. Corps....

Then the girls got off and were received by the soldiers with joy. The little girls know whose men they were, because of the designs on their shoulders. Every man has different designs on their shoulders, so that returning troops either from field or city hospitals or from far loath could distinguish their own commands from others.....

The little girls asked some of the soldiers to take them at once to general Evans headquarters.

"Certainly," said colonel Sanders. "But we did not expect to see you little girls back so soon. Were you not even detected?"

"Oh yes we were, but never got caught by Manleys men," said Catherine. "We had exciting times though, and escaping got captured by general Levedons men who at first thinking we were runaway child slaves, only placed us in a tent without any guards to watch us, and to his undoing for we spied on him too and secured some of the most important plans."

An army carriage was called for, but as none was found the colonel decided to take the little girls in a auto car. As soon as it arrived and the little girls got on the colonel gave instructions to some of the soldiers on the stations as to where to put the provisions that were to be landed from the train and then away they went for the christian line while all the soldiers within sight cheered the little girls as loudly as they could, tossing up their hats and firing off muskets.....

The soldiers assured them that it was a long trip to general Evans headquarters, and that if they wished they could stop at the colonel's headquarters and wash and clean themselves up.... They were delighted with this proposition and gladly accepted it. So within a half an hour driving the colonel's headquarters was reached and the little girls were brought in. They were ushered to the bath room, and here they took a hearty bath, and a good clean rub bing down. When they were ready to proceed, they were hardly recognized by any of the soldiers, and the colonel was flabbergasted at their appearance.

"Why what a change," he cried.

The journey was now resumed toward general Evans headquarters, and after riding for nearly three hours somewhere they a soon arrived there. It was a very handsome structure made of granite and brick, absolutely fireproof. It had a very magnificent veranda and extended along the whole front of the house. The machine stopped in front of the main entrance and the little girls got off and were led inside by the colonel the guards making road for them. Evans however was not in, but the general in charge sent a message to call him.

As they were waiting in came general Roswell Buster Johnston and, two others who were strangers to the little girls. The little girls arose as he approached them. He only looked at them for a moment and then passed on into the other room with his two generals.

"It's funny he did not speak to you little girls," said the colonel. "Has he done anything that makes him keep from you?"

"I don't know anything about it excepting that he has avoided us since we gave him a calling down when he mistook us for Glendolindin boy scouts, and threatened to thrash us if we did not reveal our true identification," said Violet. "Since then he never comes near us. I have called him several times but he stays away. I'm going to talk to Evans about it and find out what is the trouble. Whether Roswell is angry at us or what?"

Roswell heard this however though she did not speak loud enough, and came upon them abruptly as if to raise a cain and said hastily:

"There is no need to tell Evans, he knows all about it as I have told him. You left my tent after your character was really discovered as if you had become my enemy over that mistake. It was for your good that I was so strict. Suppose you had been the boy scouts instead, or that the other children had been the real Vivian girls. Come what may, either my death or loss of command I will not before God and all in heaven take any chances. It's you little girl who have turned me down, no angry inclinations on my part at all, and since knowing your wicked feelings, and knowing and believing that you did not want anything more to do with me I have kept a distance and have done so. I told Evans about this while you were away last night, on your spying trip, and if you do not forgive my mistake don't let him see you as your spying work will not benefit you any. He's as angry as a bee and has notified general Vivian of your coldness to me."

"It's your own mistake," said Violet. "We realized the mistake and had no hard feelings toward you what ever. You have been too hasty in your complaints to Evans and it will not benefit you anything either general Roswell Buster Johnston. And if that's the case I'll allow no one to get these but general Johnston to secure these plans for I'll withhold withhold them. Go to your room general Roswell and don't speak to us on anything like that again."

"I refuse to go to my room," said the general. "I'm going to stay here until general Jack Evans comes. He'll speak to you in a way that you won't expect."

Violet and her sisters arose and went out of the building.

"You must have misheard," understood them general Johnston. "Said general Rudolph. "They did it is true leave your tent in that fashion but it is the way they have walked out of every other place, for I have seen them do it. They as the colonel says have some very important plans which they risked so much to get from the enemy, and you know that no matter who the commanding general is these little girls have the authority to withhold them from us if they wish. It's Evans that need these plans most and now because of what you told him they will not give them to any one but Hanson. So now we are in a fix. With out those plans Evans cannot advance without defeat and disaster and defeat. And if you have angered Evans against him they'll give no information whatever."

In the meantime general Evans having gotten the message was hurrying toward his headquarters. The colonel who had escorted the little girls met him.

He saluted and said:

"Your excellency it is too late. Roswell suspects as he says he told you that they have unjustly wronged you and that you are angry with them; and they will not give you up their information and papers they captured. They are heartbroken."

"You don't say!" cried Evans with a wicked look in his eyes. "And mention in the news I receive it. And colonel you surprise me indeed. Here is Roswell Buster Johnston right with me. He never was in my headquarters all day. And he never told me anything about the little girls to anger me."

"Well that is indeed peculiar," said the colonel. "I--" "Damn it there is a rogue that is impersonating me that is the trouble," said Roswell. "I talk like that about the Vivian girls. I have never spoken to them since that day I made the mistake but it is not through my fault or theirs. I've been kept so busy that I could not see them. Bring them back colonel."

The colonel raced off toward where the little girls had went while the two generals having the house surrounded entered.

Roswell reminded himself.

The little girls were brought into the place. He gave a pretended shrug look at the little girls and then said:

"I wish to see general Roswell Buster Johnston about his complaint over the Vivian girls. Orderly bring him."

A general such like him stood forth with his two unknown officers.

"You have had trouble with the Vivian girls have you not?"

"Yes was the answer. "They have hated me since that day as I told you before. And because of the mistake I made."

General Evans looked at the poor little girls. He gave a certain signal and to their surprise the original man stood forth. The impostor for such as he was recoiled a step or two, and stood for a moment as if suddenly petrified, his jaw moving spasmodically without producing any speech. The other officers with him looked flabbergasted. Roswell had stepped out from between the curtains, and the surprised and astonished little girls now stood looking forth from the alcove, surprisingly watching for what terrible thing might next occur.

The impostor and slanderer recovered himself, and made for the door.

"I must not forget to tell you it is locked," said Evans coolly.

"It is true that you depend on your cronies to make a rush with you, but if you did I should kill you like a dog. Do not look incredulous. I know that despite your false looks and uniform that you are a scoundrel Glendolindin pirate prince or general, and that your two helpers are your staff, with probably a large Glendolindin army behind you, and that these little Vivian girls are the hunted like dogs hunt the fox by your dirty tricks, and that the children are the least powerful in your dominion. But at this moment we are on father time, with just what powers nature gave us and God bestowed upon us, except that I'm fully armed and you and your spies with you won't dare use your weapons if you have any."

The three men looked at the door. Evans sword, at Roswell Buster Johnston, then at the Vivian girls.....

"Treachery," he said, in a voice deprived of strength by his feelings. "I'm the real Roswell Buster Johnston and he over yonder is the impostor! If I was not the original how could I know of the offense of the little girls which I told you about?"

"Your highness may recall," said Evans, that I heard no word about any offense at all of the little Vivian girls. Did that little you just now told me the plot you were forming to seize the plan from the little girls at your first opportunity, and the peril which you may have tried to trick them into exposing the honor of a sovereign Glandelinian prince? But sir this is waiting time and talk. It rests with you and your two companions to admit your selves as prisoners peacefully or be shot down in this very room."

The three impostors looked bewildered. It seemed an unspeakably incredible that a rolling Glandelinian general like himself, with his two assistance assistants which had planned disguises so well should be so helplessly placed in his own captured palace now in the hands of the christians, but a second glance assured him--that this was no drama--that the locked door, the surrounding guards at every window and exit, the sabre in Evans hand, the scowling faces of the generals that had come in with general Roswell Buster Johnston and Evans, and the acute expression on Evans face were very actual facts indeed.

"I will never surrender myself on the verdict that I am a spy," his highness said at last. "But I'll surrender as a plain prisoner of war since you christians have cleverly discovered my plots and disguises and characters."

Evans gave a short laugh of derision.

"Can I not get it through your thick skull," he said. "That I am the one in position to offer terms? You sovereign prince of Glandelinia, an Angaliniann are told have absolute power, but you seem to be very stupid. In my country we are quicker to grasp a situation. So you see that, to make the blood of a Glandelinian prince when caught within a christian general's headquarters is no more sacred than a dog's. You say you are not a spy? Humph. What brought you and your two companions here. You may have known the intention of the little girls and intended to trap them by your accusation." And now Evans flanking his sword before the Glandelinian Landgraves eyes continued:

"There is also present. If you do not surrender within a minutes time as a spy my orderlies will pick up something stretched on the floor. You see that each moment we lose is dangerous to you, because being hairy as I am it brings the possibility of interruption. At this moment there came from the door one of those creaking or straining sounds that seem to occur unaccountably."

"Then what do you request?" asked the Glandelinian Landgrave, trying to conceal by his best pretense of dignity, his inward rage and his alarm.

"I request nothing," said Evans with a smile. "I demand nothing. I merely offer to arrest you as a sneaking spy, and will withhold you from the penalty of death, on condition that you give yourself up without dispute."

"Very well I agree," said the Landgrave with a readiness that made Emid Evans laugh again.

"Of course you do for you think you can break the condition, and finding an opportunity break away from us, and cause my officers to raise the alarm, and make our men have the trouble of making a permit, and probably pass our guards before we can do anything to stop you! I must provide against that."

"I give you my word of honor, neither to leave my guards, nor cause any alarm."

"It seems one needs better assurance than the honor of a sovereign Glandelinian prince prison," said Evans. "I would never trust the words of you Glandelinians in the uttermost depths of hell."

The three Glandelinian spies saw that there was nothing to do but to give up as they were ordered to do that the jig was up, and so this they readily did, and they were marched off by the guards.

"It takes more than such disguise to fool me," said Evans with a laugh as he took Violet and Catherine on his knee. "Now in the world did that impostor get into my headquarters. I recognized him deep in his clever disguise, and have known that man since I was a boy. It was an attempt to frustrate you little girls and prevent you from bringing the war to a speedy speedy close..."

Violet and her sisters told him all the y heard during the conversation they heard and then showed him the papers.....

Evans was elated and surprised over the find of the little girls and praised them highly over it. They told him of their experiences, of what they had seen when foolish Glandelinians fired upon blingblamenenn serpents and of their escape on the train.

"You little girls are getting more wonderful every day you spy on the enemy," said Evans. "And I have good news for you little girls. General Vivian and his brother are advancing again the foe along the boundary line. They are planning a pigmatic move against the fortifications of the place on called Titanic Fair. And also the great place called Titanic Fair also.".....

"You and papa are very lucky," said Violet. "Why don't you look over those important papers I gave you. The plans and strength of both places are given there."

Evans gave an exclamation and looked. One of the sheets which he looked gave the folios following:.....

The strength of the fortifications around Titanic Fair is as follows, first at strength, location etc:

Distance between forts.....Five miles.

Number of forts.....100...

Number of each garrison of forts singly.....1,000,000.....

Garrison of all forts combined.....7,000,000,000

Number of guns on forts combined.....500,000

Number of trenches around single fort.....100.

"It's a good seizure, but now since it is known that you little girls know and have the plans of these fortifications the Glandelinians will strengthen them," said Evans. "It is no doubt that the Glandelinians will attempt all you say, but there will be no reckless charges on those forts by our armies if I can prevent it. We must war n all the generals who will endeavor to make the invasions."

THE EXCITING CALVERINIAN CAMPAIGN

BY THE OTHER CHRISTIAN ARMIES!

THE SERIES OF BLOODY BATTLES BEGINNING ON DECEMBER 1TH AND ENDING FEBRUARY TWENTYFTH.....

A PERFECT 80 STORMS OF BATTLES WITH VARYING FORTUNES OF

BOTH SIDES. WHAT ARE THE SERVED GLANDELINIAN VICTORIES BUT MOUNTAINAIN THEIR LOSSES.....

Though of course general Manleys army had been scattered into many parts and driven clean out of Calverinia there remained other great armies of Old Glandelinians under various commanders which were quite as menacing. The worse of these were in western Calverinia, and though they learned the fate of wicked general John Manleys armies, their courage and fury was not cooled or stilled, and these Glandelinian generals decided to show the world that it will take more than any of the worse and strongest christian armies, with all the friends to back them up at that to drive them out of Calverinia. There were a great number of the Glandelinian armies, and twice more of the christian forces.

The majority of the Glandelinians here were Omurian Kurds, the whole swarm of christian armies operating against them were the fierce and dashing dare-devil Calverinians.

For many days the Glandelinian armies in and around Warren, had watched the movements of the Christian armies under general Jimmie Vivian. The Glandelinian army under general William Mc-Gann had received large reinforcements, these being led by the three old time commanders of great reputation: General Germaine Fielding, Rodney Cannon, and Break-in-the-head. The kind readers may judge of the surprise of these old time Glandelinian generals, to find their armies hemmed in by what they termed a bunch of dirty Christian dogs a rustic rout, with calico frocks, and fowling pieces.

The series of Christian armies numbering separately about five million had come passing through the various ruined western towns, in independent divisions, under their own leaders, and well supplied with provisions.

The Abbieannian troops were under general Henry Francis Ward, general Stark Hanson, led the Calverinians/Putnam Johnston commanded the big division of Angelinians and Green Franklin the divisions of Dandobians. The artillery consisting of forty thousand pieces, was under the control of the venerable general Greatheart. Opposed to the well disciplined Christian army was a motley army of about 10,000,000 Glandelinians and only could rely on success through their experienced commanders, the main one who was Germaine Fielding.

It was rumored that the Christian general Jimmie Vivian intended to seize and fortify the hills around Warren the first fortification line around Titanic Fair, and in order to prevent this disaster, some of the Glandelinian generals proposed that they should take possession of the hills themselves, and though the more cautious were opposed to the enterprise, as it was really extremely hazardous, and knew it would provoke a general and bloody action, and that they were deficient in ammunition and guns, the fearless Germaine Fielding felt confident with proper reinforcements, that his men could not fail of success and within twenty four hours all the hills were seized first, and a force of 5,666,000 occupied them with over five thousand big guns.

Early daybreak revealed to the astonished eyes of the Abbieannians the strong redoubt that had sprung up so suddenly on the hill tops but without waiting for orders, the artillery officers let loose their batteries upon them in a general cannonade, and so fierce was the firing that the soldiers in the Abbieannian army were aroused.

THE BATTLE OF WARREN

THE battle now had begun just as it was feared it would. A force of about 10,000,000 Abbieannians with their arms and provisions for twenty four hours started the advance. Pepper Necklace Neck was strongly guarded by the foe but the Abbieannian wave crossed it with ease cutting away the Glandelinian wave that opposed them. The slaughter was cruel but on they went. From the heights the Glandelinians saw and heard the wild bustle of the Abbieannian onslaught, and during a bustle of preparation heard the heaviest firing far to the right, and a sudden salvoes of explosions. The Christian batteries were finding the range and yet their own were not allowed to respond as yet. Repeated messages were sent to general Fielding for the promised reinforcements by reinforcements. General Bladde hurried toward Candridge to urge the demand in person and was killed by the explosion of a Christian shell. Fielding hesitated lest he should weaken the main division, for now it seemed as if the whole Abbieannian line was pressing forward to the attack and the firing now was something awful.

Stark Reed and Body Lice, with their divisions were ordered to the relief of Indigestion Prescott and his hard pressed soldiers, but they could not hold their ground despite the terrific resistance they offered, and the first line of redoubt at this point was carried and Prescott fell mortally wounded. All the while the main Abbieannian batteries kept up an incessant cannonade to cover the charge of the Abbieannian wave. General Vivian discovering that the Glandelinian positions were stronger than he anticipated sent to general Nansen for reinforcements, though already the Abbieannian wave had sprung forward with a fury and ardor that could not be denied, the indomitable spirit of the men ploughing through the rain of shot and shell, breaking already the first strong line of defenses in the valley, storming their way across the canals, capturing the line of machine guns on the opposite side, and rushing forward like a wave of hunters on a chase. It was a terrific Abbieannian charge indeed.

In the meantime while the Abbieannians were advancing so furiously below the Glandelinians strengthened their works on the hills, and formed series of rustic breastworks, piling post and railfences behind stone fences and breastworks and filling the spaces between with new mown grass.

Those below withstanding the violent attack of the Abbieannians were cheered by the arrival of Breakinew who appeared with over 500,000 men and as he marched he made a rapid movement, a part of his force battling with Putname at the Franklin Ford, and a part joining Greenia behind a fence breastwork. General Warronia who had recently been appointed major general, but had not as yet received his commission arrived with more troops. He came as did Pomeroy Francis, and now all these forces joined in the resistance.

About half an hour after the attack began the Abbieannians had forced aside all opposition below and confident of an easy victory advanced up the hills, one division of 3,456,765 men under general Greatheart, these swarming up the hill under a storm of shot and shell, to assault the main line of redoubts in front, while the other under general Howing, advanced against the breastworks, in order to gain the rear and cut off the retreat of the Glandelinians. The Abbieannians as they advanced gave forth fierce and most terrific yells and kept up an incessant discharge of musketry charging like the Americans did in the battle fields of Europe.

The only sound issuing from the Glandelinians was from their batteries but the hubbub caused by the shells did not daunt the Christian columns. When Greatheart's divisions came within forty paces of the Glandelinians in the redoubt, those retreating having already reached the shelter of the works, the graycoats in the redoubt leveled the ir masks and prepared their line of machine guns and then came the command of the main commander here who was Body Lice: "FIRE AND GIVE THOSE CHRISTIAN DOGS HELL."

The whole line of redoubts streamed with the musketry fire all because hidden in smoke. Then it cleared, it was seen that whole lines were cut down, several mangled Abbieannian columns were falling back, but urged on by their officers the remainder still came on. The Glandelinian troops allowed these to come nearer than before but received them more warily. The carnage was dreadful, but still on came the remainder. Pigott on the side of the foe was killed, a portion of the gray line was retreating, and at the same time Howes division was retreating but Germaine Fielding hurried reinforcements, and these at once stormed with fire, and a fierce conflagration added to the new horrors of the scene.

The Glandelinians poured in their reserve fire with the most deadly effect, and the two divisions that had been retiring was now being rallied. On came the enemy also toward the breastworks firing with the regular fury of men who tried to mow all down in their path, the red coats being so near here that man could be distinguished from man, each by his face, though all the countenances had in common the fierce contorted features of the ferocious Abbieannian veterans.

The enemy were now dangerously near to the Glandelinian breastworks, though nothing now was heard but the fierce roar of musketry and machine guns to the right where the redoubt was, the trobling beat of the Abbieannian guns the crash of cannons and exploding shells, and the singing of the storm of Abbieannian bullets in the air. Then along the whole breastwork there was a flash a thunderous crash of musketry and cannon that shook the earth, there was great gaps in the long scarlet lines, many redecoated soldiers lay on the ground in various positions, many writhing and grimacing, the thousands perfectly still/hundreds pierced and bleeding, many without visible wound. Those still still afoot were however recovering the formation of their lines, and again the still unbroken scarlet lines rolled forward though many fell plunging to earth in the face of the terrific Glandelinian fire.

The Glandelinian troops knew that the Abbieannians were somewhat impeded in their charge by the bodies of dead and wounded comrades they had to step over, that the officers had to do some threatening and sword pricking and striking to persuade the Glandelinians not to leave the works even in the face of such great odds, that a second time a column of Abbieannians was almost driven back by the deadly Glandelinian marksmanship, that to add their attempt the Abbieannians set fire to Warren, the Abbieannian cannon did a little more work this time, and that three divisions of Glandelinians a second time started to retreat leaving the ground covered more thickly covered with dead and wounded, and worse for the Glandelinians the Abbieannians came without knapsacks and their whole movement was concentrated upon the redoubt and breastwork while their light artillery was sent ahead and so placed that the cannon were infiltrating the Glandelinians in the flank.

The main red line were but twenty yards away when the fire of the Glandelinians increased, but not a single Abbieannian column wavered, but with fierce yells sprang forward like hunters with fixed bayonets, though many fired in return gapping the whole gray line horribly. First the Abbieannians surged up to the southern side like a screaming monstrous tidal wave, their front line being lifted by the men behind. The whole first line of redcoats that mounted the parapets was gradually shot down, but the remainder could not be halted, and a scene of confusion ensued as the breastworks was the first carried. The fierce attack was speedily directed against an open space in which the Abbieannian leaders had noticed between the breastwork and open fence.

All along the line the Abbieannians advanced with fixed bayonets, poured in a single volley all along the line, and then assailed the redcoats on three sides. Now followed a most desperate encounter, the Glandelinians fighting with pistol butts, firing muskets and pistols at close range, using daggers and clubbed muskets, stones and bayonets, but before the pressure of such an overwhelming wave of redcoats it was almost impossible to maintain the ground and the survivors commenced an orderly retreat.

General Pomperory clubbed his sabre and retreated with his face to the Abbieannians and then fell severely wounded. Pugnose, Satanian Johnston, and Fields kept their positions at the breastworks against great odds until the remainder had left the redoubt and passed down the hills, and thus prevented the Abbieannians from cutting off the retreat, then they slowly retired.

This part of the conflict had raged two hours, and of the 10,000,000 Abbieannians that charged over 3,456,777 had fallen of which 56,789 were dead, and the rest wounded, while despite the Abbieannians being the assailants, the 280 had lost over 6,789,800 in killed and wounded, 2,344,559 of which were dead, an unusual proportion of whom were general officers, among whom was major general Pit cairn Bodylice, and Warran another general of high rank.

THEFOT AT TEMPT TO RETAKE THE WORK S. . . CONCLUSION OF THE BATTLE.....

The strength of the fortifications of the hills was now to be tested. First the Glandelinian commander decided to retake it by having the battle ships fire on the hills. From the results afterwards this battlefield was contemptuously styled the 'SLAUGHTER PEN'. The important hills was threatened by the wicked Glandelinians by land and sea simultaneously by land and sea. Before it lay the Glandelinian fleet of 10,000 ships under Sir Henry Franklin. Germaine Fielding with 20,000,000 men had retreated to Titanic Landing, which lay to the rear of the previously abandoned hills, and here he was erecting new batteries to cover his advance across a small stream to counter assault the fortified hills when the fire of the ships should make a breach. An hour after the lull as the Abbieannians stationed a force under general Thompson on the opposite side of the creek the Glandelinian assault started, general Francis Lee taking his position on a point of the extreme mainland north of the hills, where he stood off the assailants with great gallantry, and sent aid to Thompson and general Moultrie. Simultaneously as the Glandelinian columns started their counter attack the formidable Glandelinian fleet of Franklin advanced and commenced a most furious fire, which was returned with great spirit, not by the batteries on the hills in possession of the Abbieannians but by the Abbieannian batteries as well, and though the firing had considerable effect on the hills, the ships of the enemy were almost torn to pieces.

In the midst of the most terrific roar of artillery, and perfect storm of exploding shells the Abbieannians stood bravely to their guns and positions, many of them remaining at their posts, even after they had lost a limb or arm. Twenty of the ships ran aground, ten others were battered and set on fire with their guns loaded and colors flying and only abandoned when the fire got under headway. The Abbieannians determined to secure a trophy, boarded the burning wooden dreadnaughts, fired their guns at the steel dreadnaughts, took possession of the colors, loaded 100 boats with the stores and departed in safety before they blew up.

Germaine made repeated attempts to breach the christian line, but many times was repulsed by Thompson's batteries. For ten hours the battle raged, the ships continually firing the foe attacking by land simultaneously.

General Feilding during a lull became convinced that the Abbieannians designed to press their advantage by a direct attack, and so he sent further reinforcements among which was Haslet's divisions, Glandelinian troops whose soldierly bearing and discipline had won him special regard. It was true for his fears were immediately realized. On that late afternoon despite the firing of the Glandelinian ships the Abbieannians proceeded to carry out their desperate plan of pressing their attack. General Jimmie Vivian was to march along by paths across to the Titanic Fair roads, to seize the paths in the Saratoga hills, thence proceed onward, and turn the Glandelinian left flank, general Groatheart was to pass along the shore road, and attack them on the main right wing with full force and fury, while general Santa Dania with his Concentinians was to threaten the central wing, where general Double Day Hand was stationed with his field artillery.

As soon as possible Jimmie Vivian commenced his dash toward the Titanic Fair road, general Grants divisions moved in an opposite direction along the western or shore road, and forced the Glandelinians under Atlee from point to point with heavy loss. Again the firing was fearful. As news of Grants approach reached general Feilding he sent Body Knowe with Harle woods divisions and Haslet's batteries to the relief of general Atlee and though the se opposed the christians with might and main, they were desperately assaulted by overwhelming numbers while simultaneously the redoubt was heavily cannonaded, and now the heavy firing attracting the attention of general Feilding he sent more relief and started to advance himself.

After desperate fighting these first columns of Gargolians were scattered widely beyond their main lines, the object of the Abbieannians was in part accomplished, and silently and rapidly the forces of Groatheart were moving on to cut off their retreat. He had forced the eastern pass but not without heavy losses, but nevertheless continued his assault and now the whole Abbieannian line advanced upon the now Glandelinian redoubt. General Grant pushed on along his point, struck the enemy along his point a frightful blow and carried all before him. General Stirlingington and Sullivan Johnston both perceived their danger and after bloody resistance and sanguinary fighting endeavored to retreat but in vain, the enemy having gained their rear, the Glandelinians being completely entrapped and hemmed in, and though a portion of Stirlingington's troops after savage fighting escaped by fording a creek, the remainder most of whom were Smallwoods divisions again took a brave but desperate stand, and more than 50,000 of them were slain within sight of the main Masonic line. Thousands of those were most cruelly and wantonly bayoneted by the merciless Abbieannians who were enraged over the sights of starvation and misery they had witnessed in Calverinia during the time of their entrance.

At length Stirlingington sought Santa Dania and surrendered. Sullivan's divisions of Gargolians were driven back and forth, by the varied divisions of the Abbieannians and treated in a like barbarous manner by the enraged Abbieannians, millions were taken prisoners among whom was the Glandelinian general Sullivan himself others fought their way back to the main lines. The battle thus ended, with a cruel defeat for the Glandelinians under Germaine Fielding. The loss of the Glandelinians was very severe of the remaining 20,000,000 engaged, nearly 5,000,000 more were literally slain or taken prisoners, while out of 56,789,876 the Abbieannians only lost 4,999,876. They made no further assault on Germaine's lines that day but encamped directly in front of them, and prepared to carry them by regular approaches, but during the night the Glandelinian army secretly retreated southward toward the boundary line of Calverinia.

THE BATTLE OF VIRGINIA ZICCHERMANN.

At the same time this occurred the entire Glandelinian fleets of battle ships was within cannon shot of the blockaded city of Virginia, and many of their dreadnaughts had passed up the Mc-Whirther and Aronburg Run rivers. They had landed heavy troops on the islands on at the mouths of the Zimmermann river and there erected a series of batteries, and soon these Glandelinian armies under Clinton and Donop crossed over and started an attack upon General Walter Jennings lines. Jennings heard the terrific cannonading in that quarter and the fearful firing of musketry, and as he was on his way to learn the cause met the first columns who on the first desperate assault of the enemy had fled in the saddest confusion, followed by two brigades of Concentinian troops, who that very morning had been sent to support them.

He strove to rally them, but in vain; neither entreaties or commands had any effect upon these panic-stricken soldiers, and mortified and indignant at their cowardice he dashed his sword upon the ground and cried:

"Are these the cowardly men with whom I am to defend Angelina?"

The enemy in pursuit were now not more than eight yards from him but in his excitement, and despite the firing and bursting shells all around him he forgot his own safety, and had not an attendant seized the bridle of his horse and hurried him from the field he would have fallen into the hands of the Glandelinians. Jennings ordered general Francis Heath to secure Zimmerman heights and sent an express order to Jonnington to evacuate the city and to retire to those heights with all speed, for the enemy was extending his lines across the region and he feared the foe would cut off their retreat. Jonnington retreated along the westside of the region under fire by what is called the Bloomingdale road in Calvernia. His line encumbered with thousands of children and orphans, and many others including hundreds of thousands of women and children fleeing from the city was exposed to the fire of the ships and the advance advancing enemy, but by his extraordinary exertions he saved the children from entire destruction and contr concentrated his heavy artillery on the heights and awaited the charge of the enemy who were now in possession of the city.

The Abbieannians were successful in reaching the heights in time, and with their rifles and artillery opened a severe fire upon the advancing enemy, who returned it vigorously. Almost at the first fire general Hansels' horse was shot under him, and the second general in command fell mortally wounded. The enemy took advantage of the confusion that followed the fall of the two Abbieannian general, and rushed on with the bayonet.

The Abbieannians tried to withstand the pressure of the charge but in vain and were forced to give way, and Hansel now on foot tried to rally them but he was struck down by the enemy, bayoneted, and left on the field apparently dead.

As his men retreated in confusion, a large body of the Abbieannian militia which general Jennings had sent to their aid appeared in sight. Mawhood the Glandelinian commander instantly checked his pursuit of the fugitives and opened upon these fresh troops of Christians a heavy fire of artillery which after three mortal charges brought them to a stand. Convinced by the continued firing that the conflict was serious Jennings spurred on in advance of his main divisions, and just at this crisis had reached a rising ground near by from which he witnessed the scene. He saw Hansels scattered forces, the hesitation of the militia, that everything was at stake and that the foe was raising gain with the main Christian line, and was attacking the batteries with tenfold fury and that the scene had become like a vast inferno.

He dashed forward in the face of Mawhood's artillery fire, exposed both to the fire of the enemy and the random shots of his own soldiers, and waving his hat called upon the broken and faltering armies to follow him. Inspired by his voice and example they rallied at once and counter charged with all their might. At this moment a fresh division emerged from a neighboring wood, and with loud cheers engaged in the conflict, cut the enemy's line all to pieces, while the Abbieannian batteries now within range showered shells and grapeshot upon the enemy tearing many huge avenues in their main line. The fight was desperate, Mawhood was captured, the main commander with great difficulty forced his way back to the main Bloomingdale road and retreated with all haste toward the city. The second division of the enemy was attacked by the brigade under Henrique St. Clare broken and scattered and it fled toward the fields toward Zimmerman creek and across. Alarmed at the general rout a part of the scattered division under Francis fled in the same direction, while another portion took refuge in three children's school buildings. The Abbieannian artillery was soon brought to bear upon it and they soon surrendered. The Abbieannians then attacked the towns on all sides. The Glandelinians after further resistance which cost the Abbieannians four hundred thousand men was driven from the city to the outer lines, and crowded into the shelter of breastworks where though they were able to fight to advantage, were exposed to the shells of the Christian batteries, and as further resistance was impossible the whole army fled southward, two thousand of the Glandelinians having been bayoneted by the merciless Abbieannians. General Porter of the Glandelinians was clearing on his men.

THE LONG RETREAT OF THE FOE.

It was resolved by the Glandelinians to abandon the regions at this point but before it was fully accomplished Germaine Vivian with a force of 16,000,000 men crossed the Zimmerman the object of the Christians being to form a line across the country and between the Glandelinians in both between the city and the rivers. To avoid this the foe retreated and the Glandelinians secured the bridges over the McWhirther Run, then across the Aronburg Run, to the neighborhood of Wainston. This Glandelinian retreat was made in such haste that nearly all the artillery was abandoned, the tents of the extensive camps left standing and the fires still burning. That night the Abbieannians found shelter in the tents of the deserted city of the enemy. From the Aronburg Run the army moved on across the Raritan-Brunswick to the Princeton, where they left their baggage and sent a general Sterling to check the Abbieannian advance, while the army proceeded to Dredge, and thence beyond the Aronburg Run reaching the great McHollister Run. The Abbieannians pressed so closely upon them, that the advance of Walter Janin Jennings entered the ruins of Pandora at one end as their rear guard passed out the other, and incessantly during this march the Glandelinian rear guard employed in pulling up bridges was within sight and shot of the Abbieannian pioneers sent forward to rebuild them. Thus less than four million men, a mere shadow of a recent Glandelinian army—poorly clad, with a scant supply of blankets, without tents and enfeebled for the want of food, evaded by an orderly retreat, a well appointed Abbieannian force that far outnumbered them, fell fed, well clothed, well disciplined, and flushed with victory. When the Abbieannians reached the McHollister Run they were unable to cross over, not a boat was to be found, the Glandelinian general having taken the precaution to have them all secured for a distance of one hundred fifty miles, and transferred to the north, west and east side. Two miles above this point was the fortifications of North Titanic Fair, and a few miles below them was the Abbieannian lines extending also from river to river.

Simultaneously the Abbieannian general Crew decided to ford over to the mainland and gain the rear of the Glandelinians, and cut off their communications with the main body, whence they received most of their supplies, but though well laid his plans were defeated, for general Dunn was on the alert, and joined by general Prescott Whilliam and others every pass and ford was guarded, and all bridges torn down. Crew with his caution waited several days for reinforcements, and again the Glandelinian army in four divisions commanded by generals Henry Lee, Heath, Sullivan, and Lincoln withdrew across the McHollister Run and gradually concentrated their forces in a fortified camp near White Rose Town.

THE BATTLE OF WHITE ROSE TOWN.

Still hoping to gain the rear of the Glandelinian army, Jennings moved on toward Rehoboth and Rochelle, where he was reinforced by 10,000,000 light horse troops, and mounted Continentals under general Nero and with these he advanced upon the Glandelinian camps. Scarcely had the foe encamped, and entrenched themselves at White Rose Town when a rumor of the approach of the Abbieannians reached them. On the morrow when general Knyphausen the foe commander accompanied by his general officers was reconnoitering the neighboring heights, the alarm was given that the enemy had driven in the pickets, and were within the camp. When he reached the scene he found the whole army in action, the enemy not attacking the main line alone but turning their attention to the fortified heights, which lay a little south of the camp, and was separated from it by the Benbow Run. This height was occupied by 16,000,000 men under general McDougal and the main attack of the battle was made at this point. After thirteen hours of desperate resistance in which ten desperate charges of the Abbieannians had been repulsed with frightful slaughter, a part of the Abbieannian line broke and fled, but Hazel Smallwoods great divisions made a still braver stand the following day, and repeatedly repulsed the Abbieannians who assaulted in long lines ten deep, rushing to the attack in perfect tidal waves, but at length overpowered by numbers, a part of the line retreated across the fields toward the camp. Reinforcements arrived however and the breach was filled and the Abbieannians were once more repulsed, but the Glandelinian generals Liegins and the brave general Knowlton both fell in this savage encounter. The Glandelinians were still in possession of the hills, but could the worn out and almost disheartened Glandelinian troops hope to repulse another onslaught from a force so well equipped and so powerful. Their redoubts were of hastily constructed stumps of corn, pulled up from neighboring fields, with the earth clinging to the roots. At night the Glandelinian commanders again withdrew their armies, and placed them in a new and stronger position about five miles distant. General Jennings passed from the McWhirther Run down the banks of the McHollister Run, and took possession of the Sandwith Isles, near the McWhirther River.

Tobin's important position commanded the entrance into the Angeline Lake. He then made desperate attempts on St John's Run but finding it more strongly garisoned than had been represented, he decided to besiege it instead of raging a battle, and sent another division under Allan Ebban A la, but this division in attempting to take Montreal Run and another section of the loomingdale road was overpowered without a battle, and taken prisoner with his men. Simultaneously general Baile took the fortifications of Chamblie a few miles down the river without a battle, thus placing strong Abbeonnnian troops between St John's and Calvernia. General Carleton also made exertions but without success, and was repelled at a passage of the Vivian Wikey Run without a battle by general Warner Sathing, while another division going up the Gaudenians on the same errand was also driven back without fighting a battle. The garrison at St John's Run presently surrendered to the Christians, and immediately the energetic Jennings pushed on to Tobin which submitted at the first summons, while Carleton's with his army of Omarians fled toward Angolinia.

In the meantime another force of Glandelinians was marching to the relief and the Glandelinian general proposed to make a desperate attack. So on the morrow after retreating the christian pickets were suddenly surprised to see whole columns of Glandelinians rushing forward to make a desperate attack.

BATTLE OF CAMPHILL.

The battle was of three days duration and as savage an encounter as could ever be imagined. Taken by surprise as they had been the sentries had not fired like comards from the picket but brought down so many of the foe that the survivors were not able to advance and Cal Carleton's the main commander fell shot down by a picket, and then during the rest of the first day the foe made a effective series of charges, and though disheartened at the fall of their main leader, and their frightful losses, the foe still maintained the attack, until their left wing was rolled up by Abbeonnnian reinforcements, Generals Og Campbell, the esmanian, and Mac-Ther's son also being killed. Arnold Johnston on the Glandelinian right flank suffered immensely from a flanking fire, his column was shattered to pieces, and driven into confusion, his two legs were shattered by the explosion of a shell, and he was unable to lead his men against the storming christian batteries. Morgan's assumed the command, and with the support of his main batteries stormed the christian artillery, carried the batteries, and the second one but not without wholesale losses in officers and men, but now the main Abbeonnnians were concentrated at this point, and after a screaming roaring hell of sanguinary fighting the Glandelinian surge was cut to pieces and driven back in shattered and mangled columns for the distance of ten miles in half an hour, while Morgan's and a division of 3,555,000 men were captured with 34,000 pieces of Glandelinian artillery.

The enemy on the first day had made such a hasty retreat so hasty that the main baggage train and artillery and all the sick and wounded were left behind to the mercy of the ferocious Abbeonnnians. Jennings came pressing on like a titan with his force of 13,000,000 men of the first division, the other 34,000,000 coming on far behind, and general Francis Thompson trying to cover the retreat was killed at Three Rivers, and his force annihilated, and those of other divisions who escaped joined Frank Sullivan on the Angeline. The Generals of the Glandelinian center had been as equally as unfortunate, for the positions on Cedar Run had been abandoned after shameful losses had been inflicted by the marvellous Abbeonnnian soldiers, and a big reinforcing division sent to this aid was routed, a fort was surrendered without a blow, and the wreck of the first main Glandelinian division passed out of the region.

The brave An Abbeonnnian generals led forward their men with great spirit. A part of the Glandelinian army had rallied, and when the first grand division of the Glandelinians faltered in the face of the enemy's heavy musketry and artillery, the generals rode to the front and cheered them on. General Francis Whooster fell mortally wounded a man's ball piercing his side he being a Glandelinian commander, and his soldiers now retreated in confusion. General Arnold Ridgfield made a stand two miles beyond the spot where Whooster fell, and while the Abbeonnnians made their tremendous assault, he acted with unusual daring, but after a spirited and bloody resistance, his force was overpowered and driven back, his horse was shot under him, and before he could disengage himself from the struggling animal, he was taken prisoner by the Abbeonnnians.

During the pursuit the Abbeonnnians were greeted continually until night fall with a palling fire from behind trees, rocks, houses and houses, which continued until night put an end to the scene.

THE SECOND DAY OF THE BATTLE.

General Jennings during the night commanded a series of manoeuvres and made a flight movement toward the right of the main Glandelinian position in the hopes of drawing the Glandelinians from the heights into the open plain, where the Abbeonnnian discipline might prevail better, but the latter was too cautious to be trapped, but Jennings suddenly wheeled his forces and by a rapid movement endeavored to burn the left of the Glandelinian position in order to gain the passes and heights in their rear, but general Biggley saw his object in time to gain his stronghold and was just about to launch a counter assault, when suddenly the whole heavens were lighted up, the city of Mount Tension was on fire, and its light revealed the whole red army advancing to make a tremendous assault.

The assault came the roar of artillery shook the heavens, the christians were repelled after spirited resistance but the assault was assumed again with redoubled fury, abandoned positions taken possession of the day before beset with active christian cannon, shells fairly rained like confetti, St. Clare rushed on with his division of Abbeonnnians, and general Barado Fraser followed with his Bonobianians, and assaulted the enemy's line at every point. The struggle was fearful, merciless, the opposing lines fighting like savage beasts expecting no quarter, the roar of fresh artillery led that a second Abbeonnnian wave was advancing, everything abandoned the previous evening was on fire, Fort St. Anna was also on fire, a stretch of woods was burning, and though both waves of redcoats were held in check, general Edward of the Glandelinians was killed and general St. Clare Schuler and Castleton arriving with reinforcements were wounded and the reinforcements badly cut up. St. Clare on the christian side fell in that deathly inferno, five thousand redcoats went down like an execution but nevertheless the foe was finally compelled to yield to superior numbers, and the left wing made the best retreat they could until morning when relieving reinforcements they rallied and stood their ground once more. Along the left the Glandelinian loss of military stores, artillery, ammunition and prisoners was immense, and consternation was spread through the army over the wildness of the Abbeonnnians night attack.

The reinforcing forces of the enemy was concentrated in front of the Abbeonnnian wave, and Wayne stationed at the centre of this position with his batteries opposed the red force with all his might, a hill overlooking the ford had already been captured by the christians, the right wing there commanded by Logan Sullivan which division extending thirty miles had been driven back, with the loss of 3,555,799 men, the left wing under general Armstrong extending ten miles below was cut to pieces and scattered after all morning's desperate fighting, while general Green with the reserve was unable to advance to the aid. Simultaneously the Abbeonnnians in heavy column charged through the intervening woods, and though several attempts were made here by the christians to cross the fords they were temporarily repulsed. In the meantime the Glandelinian generals threw their main forces on the Abbeonnnians immediately in their front, being determined to hinder them from obtaining assistance from the other divisions marching through the regions of the Mac-Hollister Run, the two main wings co-operated, and though this was a skillful movement Sullivan made a vigorous assault but was forced to fall back to the wooded regions, in which the Abbeonnnians became entangled. These Glandelinians rallied on a hill, and there made a still fiercer resistance for four hours, but were at length compelled to fall back. Green moving forward at this moment to their support was killed, the Abbeonnnians charging forward with such rapidity, that his forces drove the Glandelinians under Green fifteen miles in less than an hour in a headlong rout.

Such a such was the skillful disposition of the Abbeonnnian soldiers that they not only checked the Glandelinian counter charge, but cut open their lines, and passed through, taking the christian line on the flank, while the brave conduct of the reserve saved Warner's division of Concentin from being completely checked, having stubbornly withstood the attack of the foe at the lower fords meeting the enemy in deadly conflict with the bayonet, and forcing them back. General Kales of the christians behaved with great bravery and prudence, but was severely wounded in the leg.

The main right wing of the enemy still held the two armies meeting each other and raging with a storming battle, but the roar of the Abbasid army had been gained at this position, and their baggage was not off, but when it seemed certain that the region was again falling into the hands of the Ghaznavids, the military stores were removed, but by this time the second wave of Abbasids had come up to this point and the line was restored and a heavy concentration forced the foe to yield, and the whole army was rolled up, with the loss of 4,000 heavy armor. At another point of the line the Ghaznavids had won an advantage only to lose it. A swift attack of Ghaznavid troops had drove the Abbasids on center, the smoke of firing being thick like a dense fog, and though the Abbasids at this point had given way on all sides, abandoning everything, heavy concentration of fresh troops drove the foe into consternation, and into a panic. The complete victory at this point within their grasp was lost, the Abbasids rallied, coming on like a tidal wave and carried all before them.

THE THIRD AND LAST DAY OF THE GREAT BATTLE.

On the third day the foe again tried their luck by making an attack. The army advanced in two parallel columns, the Abbasids received them with a continuous shower of arrows, aided by an overwhelming shower of shafts and projectiles. The Ghaznavids, retreating, came on again and though again completely repulsed a second time with a loss of 100,000 men returned to the attack with redoubled fury. The two forces now met in the dead level conflict. It was one of the most desperate encounters of the war along this section, quarter was neither given or asked. There were instances when all was over when the death grasp still held the combatants and into a neighborhood her heart, and it seemed as if the fight had been decided over by countless arrows. The brave Ghaznavid general Kharkeher was twice mortally wounded, but leaning against a shattered tree he continued to encourage his men till a counter charge of the Abbasids compelled the foe to give way, the attack being made in both rear and front at the same time, Baume of the foe he found his ordered lines with the greatest determination and desperation, and his thousands of field pieces were so well timed that fearful losses were inflicted among the Abbasids but his works were stormed with the greatest violence, the Abbasid army surging rushing up to the very muzzles of the enemy's chain of cannon and though they went down in many thousands for every charge, the Abbasids continued the assault and at length Baume fell mortally wounded, and his men surrendered.

Scarcely did this occur when Francis Preysner appeared with his new forces of Ghaznavids on the one side and Warner Bosto on the other, the fighting being renewed with redoubled violence along this point, and during the first repulse of the army who made a desperate assault a thousand artillery and a million stand of arms were taken, about two hundred officers the enemy were slain, and sixty taken prisoners, while the Abbasids lost only fourteen officers killed, and twenty wounded but their loss in private was exceedingly heavy.

General Arnold Bates of the Ghaznavids being forced back all along the line and continuing hard to hand with almost the entire Abbasid right wing, and his losses were heavy, having had sent to Portland for reinforcements, but the reinforcements could not check the Christian tide, and Arnold Bates with only 13,000 men was left for four hours to sustain the attack of over 40,000 Abbasids. The severest conflict was now on and in the open field, the Ghaznavids being posted on the one side in a dense wood, where few cannon could be used, the Abbasids on the opposite side in a thin pine grove, where they could use their artillery. When the Christian column would advance across the body across fields, the Ghaznavid infantry would drive them back, and when the Ghaznavids would become the pursuers, the Abbasids would sweep thousands of their ranks down with their cannon. A dozen times this field was lost and won. The Ghaznavid infantry repeatedly took possession of the Abbasid artillery, but the roughness of the ground would not permit them to secure the guns, and before they could turn them they themselves were driven off at the point of the bayonet.

By the desperate exertions of the Abbasids the line was broken again and again, but as often the generals would rally their men and divisions and return to the conflict, but presently the Ghaznavid general Frederick fell mortally wounded, the whole assembling line gave way and in spite of a shower of grape and cannon and shafts, and a fearful fire of musketry, the Abbasids rushed headlong to the assault. The Ghaznavid general Arnold rode directly up to the Christian ranks in one of these charges, where his horse was shot under him, and he himself was severely wounded—a shaft fragment had shattered his leg.

His three divisions were in battle, and advanced through and through with shot and shell now fell back in confusion also. A series of numbers of other Ghaznavid divisions were fortunate forced their way clear through the Abbasid intrusions, and maintained their position for three hours against the Abbasids who counterattacked them, using up a large amount of ammunition in the terrific firing before they finally gave way. Simultaneously a division of Ghaznavid Abbasids under general Brown, had seized the position to the left, also a fleet of lance-axe lance-axe men with provisions for the Ghaznavid army, and three hundred thousand priest prisoners. The same division had united with another and laid siege to Ticonderoga divisions. Disasters men and steel had drowned indeed upon the wicked Ghaznavids. The only onslaught of St Ledger and Baume had failed, the Ghaznavids and Tripoligoulian troops were pressing hard upon Ticonderoga troops, and their supplies and intercourse was cut off from the main divisions.

Toward the afternoon the whole Ghaznavid army was drawn up in order of general battle, large advancing forces appearing on the heights in the rear, nearly all the passes by which the Ghaznavid commanders could extract themselves in case of other defeat were in the hands of the Christians, cannon balls, shafts and bullets tore his shagging lines to pieces and damaged his camp ten miles away, and ten hundred and extensive saw million men occupied by the Ghaznavid generals were on fire. Clinton shot himself attached and captured the positions under Montgomery and Clinton's division. Though the Ghaznavids at these positions fought like demons the positions could not be maintained, the fury of the firing setting fire to every house within the battle field and several miles beyond. The Ghaznavid force surrounded the force on the extreme center, and the whole Ghaznavid army resumed its retreat.

THE BATTLE OF CLINTON.

The strong Abbasid army was soon in pursuit. For a December month in University the weather was excessively cold, and the heavily armed Ghaznavids moved very slowly through the deep snow. The Abbasids soon came up as the foe had halted on suddenly being joined by Canadian army. A council of war was held, and the question discussed, whether to attack the enemy and bring on a general engagement again, or merely harass them on their march. Jennings was in favor of the former manner of attack and he sent forward 2,445,000 men to take possession of the hills, and three great divisions off into the plateau and Green Sanders were sent also with two divisions, and when these advanced they found a force of about 10,000,000 Ghaznavids approaching to make an assault on a summit.

This was three days after the recent battle. The two Abbasid commanders made arrangements to cut off this force, and sent word of his movements to Jennings. But when he came upon the divisions he found it much stronger than he anticipated. In truth Jennings had thrown his strong force of Omarbun and the Ghaznavids there for the express purpose of giving the Abbasids a severe check. The battle had scarcely begun, before occurred a misapprehension of orders, the first divisions of Abbasids began to retreat, and in the retreat had passed about into a flight.

The enemy came up in force, other divisions of the Abbasids filled the gap made by the retreating Christians and the battle became extremely fierce. The enemy army assaulted the line at all points, another portion of the Abbasids then started to give way, but the Abbasids passed around a creek across to their rear, and Butler-Henryson seeing this movement ordered his divisions to draw off from the attack, lest they should be surrounded, but the flankers pressed their attack, all the Ghaznavids at this point were thrown into confusion and made a shivering flight, and were pursued all in unrelenting fury. The whole army was ravaged by the terrific fire along the Abbasid ranks. Ghaznavid divisions fell by scores of thousands, perishing by hundreds per minute. Division of horsemen were cut to pieces, and a division of infantry when crying for quarter were butchered with the bayonet without mercy by the Abbasids. The battle was over ending with another Abbasid victory. Simultaneously Clinton and Campbell with 2,000,000 men moved on to press the Ghaznavids at Benue. Savannah (Ghana) Port of the country, and general Howard Roberts who was in command of the Ghaznavids there could not make any resistance and without a battle the foe forces were thrown into confusion and retreated, and the town of Savannah fell into the hands of the Christian victors. B. Jennings simultaneously defeated the enemy passing across the Vivian creek took Barbary and Barbary Creek into his possession, and there Jennings fell and assumed the command.

Since the battle of Gloriana the Glandelinian armies were extensively distributed, in a series of divisions and cantonments, which extended all along the Sothern part of Calvernia, thus effectually opposing the united Abbeoninian forces. The fierce and cruel Abbeoninians were so strong at New Aronburg, and Mo-Wilther, that to attack them with success seemed and was hopeless. The enemy themselves held important places and were watching for opportunities to pillage but could not do so on account of the near approach of the ferocious Abbeoninians. But the recently Glandelinians attempted it, and a body of Abbeoninians taking note of it did not make a direct attack upon this Glandelinian out for revenge, but suddenly dashed down and desolated the whole region of land all around, penetrating the region the Glandelinians were going on making their intended march for the degradation, destroying more than forty villages occupied by the Glandelinian soldiers and officers of all rank, took over one prisoner, routed those intending to make the raid by their very appearance, and pursued them into the Glandelinian creek, laying waste to all the cornfields, gardens and orchards belonging to the enemy. It was a terrible appearance but the only means to prevent the threatened degradation on the helpless towns and settlements in the path of the murderous foe. Seventy five thousand were made prisoners, and condemned to death, and executed too, and no the Glandelinian force at this point under General Asho Lincoln and Brant Grant retreated in haste before the swift Abbeoninian advance, Asho soon rallied his force and stood his ground, but his entire force was dispersed without a battle.

The Abbeoninians themselves sent out plundering expeditions on the foe. Two towns occupied by the foe called Portman and Morfolk in Calvernia were plundered, one hundred and thirty ships were burned, in the stream a little higher up, and all the warships were seized. In the course of a Few hours more General Vivian's force itself burned more than two hundred and twenty five private small towns held in possession by the enemy, forced the garrison of 100,000 men at Verplankers Point to surrender without a battle, captured two forts, destroyed many barns, farms and stores, took places of worship for the foe, and made off with sixteen thousand stacks of fine swar y horses. Many of the Glandelinians for giving part in caught carrying off children to murder were shot down and bayoneted like dogs, and the recently Glandelinians were unable to commit the barbarities which had rendered the earlier parts of the great war so famous.

The Abbeoninians continued their degrading depredations. They decided to capture a whole camp of the foe. The attempt was made in broad daylight. The sentinels were noticed and gagged, and the other line of guards treated in the same manner, at the third the alarm was given, but the impetuosity of the ferocious Abbeoninians was so great, that in a few minutes the two divisions of Abbeoninians from the opposite side of the camp they attacked met in the center. They took more than 500,000 prisoners. This was one of the most brilliant exploits in the war....

In the south the Abbeoninian armies were also very successful. When Gann arrived at Pandora after the battle of Gloriana, he immediately went north for the purpose of besieging the city of Farnell. General Pemberton made every exertion to fortify the city, but as the aid instances from the nearest army was very small and the garrison numbered only 500,000 men they had no hopes of holding the city against the 100,000,000 Abbeoninians holding it. The only hope of the city of holding out and defying itself in heavy relief operations, then on their march from Glandelinia and from eastern Calvernia. These divisions did finally arrive and increased Pemberton's divisions and army to 1,712,777, only 2,345 of which were the Glandelinian divisions. The Abbeoninians delayed no little time

In their approach that little opportunity was given for the town troops to fortify the harbor, the superior fleets passed the three fortifications raining a storm of shell fire, without receiving any damage while the fortifications were shattered into ruins, troops were landed, a large Glandelinian division of 100,000 men under Glandelinian Tarletonia was pointed upon and scattered, over 30,000 prisoners were captured, with general Washington Hagar and Banberry, and forty hundred wagons laden with provisions and stores. The fortifications surrendered, and soon after another division of Glandelinians all very bravely was annihilated because they would not surrender, and the city was now completely invested before a general battle began. In the defense of the town continued to fall in succession the Glandelinian commanders thought of abandoning the place and forcing their way through the Abbeoninian line, but the superiority of the besiegers in number and position rendered that impossible.

The entire Abbeoninian fleet of three hundred steel dracnoughts was ready to pour ruin upon the devoted town, while the Abbeoninian commander James Quincy Cannon had thrown up long intrenchments across the necks of land and at this crisis general Schloeder arrived from Gloriana with three million more fresh troops of Abbeoninians. Immediately general Cannon sent off three expeditions, one to intercept general Bonafortin, who was approaching with a Glandelinian division to the aid of the besieged city, a second toward St Augustine, and a third toward Mo-Farran. Bonafortine heard of the approach of the Abbeoninians and commenced to retreat, but there was no escaping general Logan who had made a forced march of one hundred and five miles in fifty four hours, and coming upon the Glandelinians scattered them without a conflict, giving them no quarter, but treating them in the most cruel and barbarous manner. The Abbeoninians in the other two divisions was threatened with the most determined opposition at every step, but nevertheless they pressed on, and soon had the whole main besieged line harassed in the flank, and preparation for the bombardment and attack were made.

THE BATTLE OF ELIZABETH.

September 11, 1778

Soon commenced the most terrible bombardment of the war from two million cannons, mostly from the land batteries batteries erected along the necks, and the rest from the ships. All night long bombs and high explosive poured upon the town and positions of the foe, and as the fleets approached nearer the main Glandelinian general Pembertonia proposed a desperate attack on the Christian line. The assault was made in succession of attacks all along the line, and at first so swift did the desperate Glandelinian waves rush on with fixed bayonets against the centre of the Abbeoninian line, that after letting loose a hell of firing for two hours and tearing wave after wave into a thousand people as pieces that the whole centre was forced, the Abbeoninians being crushed in the hand to hand encounter, and the withdrawal became a headlong flight, the Abbeoninians immediately throwing down their arms in the rear. Cannon himself and general Groverner Canevillars both carried off the field by the torrent of fugitives. The batteries thundered and roared in a mad frenzy of firing but a portion of these were also carried, and the second line of Abbeoninian infantry under general Berry who received forty wounds, who stood their ground firmly against the tidal wave of gray were annihilated, and the third line badly torn up also gave way and was completely routed like frightened sheep, and scattered in small parties in all directions. Their loss in slain and prisoners was 10,000,000. Besides all their baggage and artillery, the fields for scores of miles being strewn with the dead and wounded, the work of the Glandelinian savor, cavalry which the hapless Pembertonia urged on in pursuit of the fugitives for twenty eight miles. It was the most disastrous defeat the Abbeoninian nation had ever experienced in a battle before and it seemed as if the siege was raised.

During the battle general Sumner of the Abbeoninians fell upon a convoy of supplies approaching Elizabeth for the Glandelinians, and took two hundred thousand prisoners. Pembertonia learning of it sent Talstonia in pursuit who rode so hard that half his men and horses broke down. When he arrived on the Sande sky run the Glandelinians completely took them by surprise, routing the division of Abbeoninians, and rescuing the prisoners. Thus within thirteen hours two divisions of the Abbeoninians and the main central wing had been defeated and scattered in every direction.

Cannon withdrew from the siege, and retreated toward the north, having now about 120,000 men the remainder having been forced to surrender to the Glandelinians.

CHAPTER THREE. C
THE SERIES OF BATTLES CONTINUE. GLANDE LINIANS ARE DRIVEN OUT OF CALVERINIA AND TAKE A DESPERATE STAND IN ANORLINDIA AT BIG GULPHOOL.
DURING THESE SERIES OF BATTLES THERE ARE A NUMBER OF BRILLIANT VICTORIES OF THE FOE.

Jimie Vivian after his victory recommenced his march toward southern Calverinia with the purpose of driving his enemies further south. His great army was in three great divisions, one of which under general Groatheart, was moving southeastward, while the two other divisions though separate moved toward Torle, through a region in which the Glandelinians were very numerous. Little did the Abbieandian commander and the good son of general Vivian think that at this time when he neither saw nor heard of an enemy for all his expresses was out off, that from the distant hills and valleys of the Mc-Whirther Run, and from the eastern spur of the mountains overwhelming armies were advancing silently through the forests, to make an attack upon him. However rumors stole into his camp of their approach and being astonished at the perseverance of the repeatedly defeated foe who was in pursuit of his now retreating army, he pushed forward for a strong position at Catawba, and threw up strong intrenchments.

THE BATTLE OF CATAWBA RUN.

The Glandelinians arriving prepared for the battle, preparing to attack the Christians in three divisions, in front, and on the right and left flanks. The bloody battle soon commenced, the Glandelinians made ten charges, thinned the Abbieandian line ten times with their deadliest fire and were repulsed ten times. Jimie Vivian on white charger rode back and forth encouraging his men. No impression was made by the assaults by either the Abbieandian cannon, musketry fire or bayonets. Again and again the Abbieandian cavalry charged like a thundering avalanche against the assailants trodding down thousands, shooting and hacking over everywhere and using their long lances to good effect, driving back the left division of the Glandelinians with heavy losses, but the cavalry every time were taken in flank by Glande Linian artillery and cut down in scores of thousands per minute and were then assailed by Glandelinian Gargolian cavalry and driven back, and by this time the second division of Glandelinians had come up and started forward to the support of the first.

The firing on both sides was fearful, losses were inflicted by the wholesale, and though the second division was driven back and torn up by the Abbieandian cavalry, the third division arrived on the plain and the assault was redoubled with tenfold fury. The Abbieandian losses were horrible greater than the enemy's. Thus as it was as often as a division of Glandelinians were forced to retire before the thunderous counter charge of the Abbieandian Cavalry, another gave relief, and once when the first whole line of Abbieandian infantry went forward to make a counter charge they came back in fragments leaving a sea of slain strewn on the plains.

Jimie Vivian though ten horses were shot under him passed from point to point, and cheered and rallied his men, three hundred thousand Glandelinians having been slain by one simultaneous musketry volley, but still still the attack was continued by Benningtons Glandelinians. It was a battle which sent its commanding roars so far reaching in echoes as to be heard for hundreds of miles.

But it was all in vain the Abbieandians continued to hold their ground. They continued to deliver their deadly fire, used their bayonets and drove them back again and again, capturing their colors and many cannons. The whole Glandelinian army was routed beyond recovery, the Abbieandians pursuing them vigorously, the fiery Glandelinian general himself barely escaping escaping capture.

THE BRILLIANT AND LONG RETREAT OF THE FOE...

When General Lema learned of this Glandelinian defeat he at once determined upon his course. He thought that the Glandelinian army though defeated, being encumbered with prisoners and spoils would linger for some time near the scene of their defeat. He therefore destroyed his baggage, converted his whole army into light troops, and with all his force joined Jimie's army and both set out in pursuit.

His object was two fold, to rescue all the prisoners, and crush the Glande Linian army before they could cross the Mc-Whirther Run, and unite their forces with the other Glandelinian forces.

But the wicked Glandelinian general was too watchful to be caught in this manner. Having known that the two Abbieandian generals would pursue him and so he left his wounded under a flag of truce and hurried on to the regions of the Mc-Whirther Run and crossed over. Two hours had scarcely elapsed before the vanguard of the Abbieandians appeared on the opposite bank. At this point another army had joined this retreating force, but they were not as yet able to meet the Abbieandians, and the retreat was continued toward the Mc-Hollister Run, the encumbered Glandelinian army could but move slowly, and just as the rear guard was embarking on the river the rear guard or the vanguard of the Abbieandians came up. A severe skirmish ensued in which the Glandelinians lost a few trains of baggage wagons. The rain and snow was pouring in torrents and the river was so swollen that the Abbieandian army could not cross it nor ford it, and the Glandelinians had secured all the boats on the other side and destroyed all the bridges also. The Glandelinians though here joined by other divisions dared not risk a battle with the unrelenting pursuers, and though the militia in the neighboring neighborhood was called out to check the enemy at the fords the main Glandelinian army had to hurry on and cross the Danner river into southern Calverinia. As soon as pontoon bridges were built general Jimie Vivian crossed the series of streams at one time, if the wicked Glandelinians could get across the Danner they would be safe, and the Abbieandian commanders strained every nerve and effort to cut them off. Jimie Vivian supposed that the Glande Linians could not cross the lower ferries for want of bridges and boats, and that they must go higher up the stream where it could be forded, so with this impression the Abbieandian commanders pushed on for the upper fords, and general Phil Lema of the foe kept up his delusion by maneuvering before him in that direction.

But the judicious Glandelinian generals anticipating the movements had taken measures to collect boats and built pontoon bridges at the lower ferries, and sent forward general Koschnoos to throw up breast works and defend them, and then urged on his weary soldiers, at the rate of fifty miles a day, reached the ferries, and marched over the main body and the baggage while the cavalry forces swam across. Meanwhile when they had sufficiently retraced the Abbieandian pursuers by breaking down the bridges afterwards, and carrying off the boats and provisions, the light troops of Gargolians as for the night kindled their campfires in sight of the Abbieandian Abbieandians, then dashed off, and by a rapid march of forty three miles reached the ferries and passed over. In a few hours the van of the Abbieandian Abbieandian army appeared on the opposite bank, and Jimie Vivian himself in his movements toward the upper fords had gone forty three miles out of his way, and after a chase of more than two hundred and fifty six miles the object of his pursuit lay in sight, but the waters could not be forded nor boats obtained with which to build pontoon bridges.

The half day Glandelinians had toiled for nearly three weeks over roads blistering hot with the heat of the tropical regions of southern Calverinia, through drenching rains and series of severe hurricanes, without tents at night, multitudes being without shoes or stockings, and their way could be traced in bloody footprints. Twice had the waters of the Mc-Whirther run and the Mc-Hollister run through which they had passed of safely risen and become impassable to their pursuers, and again a river swollen by recent rains lay between them.

Jimie Vivian and his officers were so greatly mortified at their want of success, and of the great sacrifices they had made in destroying their stores, that when thus freed from encumbrances they could overtake the Glandelinians and disperse them, that they refused to retreat themselves. But nevertheless almost destitute of supplies they changed their position and moved to further south in an endeavor to get at the foe some way, the Glandelinians cautiously following instead of retreating. Not daring however on such bad ground to risk an engagement with the Abbieandian veterans except when they were in small parties.

THE BATTLE OF CAROLINIA.

As for themselves the Glandelinian generals were so watchful against a surprise, that portions of their great armies never remained in one place, and never communicated to any one before hand where they expected to encamp. Fresh armies in the meantime were rapidly joining this defeated force, and when general Cannonias force amounted to 13,000,000 men, he left his baggage seventy miles in the rear, and approached the Abbieandians to give them another fierce battle. It was in the vicinity of the city of Carolina.

He drew up his army in two grand lines, the militia in whom he had little confidence, as they were apt to give way at the first charge of the fierce Abbeonians he placed behind the strongest breastworks, with sentries in the rear with orders to shoot the first man who should run. The battle was fought in a region covered with thick woods, with cleared fields interspersed. The militia could not withstand the terrific shock of the onslaught made by the Abbeonians, but threw down their arms and fled. The Glandelinian infantry columns stood their ground and put in a destructive fire upon the Abbeonians cutting down their ranks like laves in a forest, but they too were compelled to yield to the bayonet. Now the Abbeonians pressed on in pursuit, but presently the main Glandelinian cavalry came up and made a terrific counter charge covered by a fearful artillery fire of 10,000 guns, and the Abbeonians with their columns torn to shreds gave way and were forced back all along the line.

Then again the Abbeonian artillery opened upon the Glandelinian assaults with all such fury as to threaten them with annihilation, and they in turn were checked. General Green of the Glandelinians depended much upon his Mc-Hollistians, but these were almost annihilated, during the charge of the Abbeonians, and one of the newly raised divisions of London ecians gave way before a force of dragoons led by general Grambrara, but the battalion was presently checked by the Glandelinian cavalry, and the brave Grambrara himself was slain. It was impossible to retrieve what the militia had lost, and the left wing of the foe started a retreat, and it was seen that the wounded of both sides lay scattered over a wide space.

General Gammon's army was so broken by this battle, and weakened by heavier losses in further engagements of the battle, that it numbered but about 11,000,000 men. His left was compelled to abandon its position during the assault of the Abbeonians, and fall back to Wilmington Creek, and here they were exposed to a most severe infiltrating fire of Abbeonian artillery and musketry, and the Abbeonian infantry were about to attack it then in flank, while the Abbeonian horse under general Washington moved to make a treacherous charge in the rear.

Radwonda brought up his Glandelinian reserve to counteract this movement, and during the bloody fencer a division of of Countians, and upon whom Cannonia depended upon very much, unexpectedly gave way, and though divisions were sent to their aid these could not stand their ground either, the Abbeonian fire was too heavy to withstand without annihilation, and the whole line at this point also gave way. A several fortified works and fortifications simultaneously fell into the hands of the Abbeonians, and the losses of the unfortunate Glandelinians was terrible.

At other sections of the battle line the Glandelinians themselves pressed a great attack with the utmost vigor, the Abbeonians withstanding it with utmost bravery, and determined courage, the contest raging most fiercely around the artillery which changed hands a dozen times with frightful wholesale losses to both sides. The Abbeonian left at length gave way, and the Glandelinians pursued, but presently a large column of fugitive Abbeonians took possession of a series of large stone houses, which had once been country schools and orphan asylums, all being surrounded by a picketed garden. From this place they could never be dislodged. Repeated attempts met with great slaughter, and now a large Abbeonian battalion, which had successfully resisted a desperate charge of the wicked Glandelinians, suddenly appeared at the rear of the assailants, and the latter being disconcerted by this movement, was thrown into great confusion, many were cut down or bayoneted without mercy thousands taken prisoners and the rest retreated in headlong flight.

Simultaneously general George of the Glandelinians attacked the rear guard of the Abbeonians, and Jimmie Vivian laid plans to entrap the Glandelinian Marquis. He sent over a large portion of his unengaged troops with cavalry and pack horses, and so arranged them as to make a great display, also making a tremendous attack at the same time, and threw in the way of the Glandelinians two dragoon soldiers, who pretended to be deserters, and who announced that the main body of the Abbeonian army was retreating before Glandelinian reinforcements. George immediately detached Green with a force of infantry and covered with artillery added to them a force of dragoons to deliver a most violent attack, while he himself should advance to his support. Green moved forward under a storm of shell fire, forced a battery, at length he found himself close to the main line of the Abbeonians who were firing furiously upon the other columns of assailants. In a moment he saw that he had been deceived. His daring nature decided his course; he at once ordered a charge to be sounded, his men horse and foot caught his spirit, and with shouts as if surer of victory, they dashed against the Abbeonian line with great impetuosity and violence, broke the Abbeonian line, and then rapidly retreating, resumed the assault, thus enabling George to extricate himself from his dangerous position.

The Glandelinian works on the center was also obstinately defended, in which the Abbeonians lost forty thousand men in a horribly short time, but it was finally abandoned, and though the Glandelinians who were surrounded and could not escape they were massacred by the Abbeonians.

The whole wave of Glandelinians now pressed on, scrambling over the long lines of parapets without regard to order and in the face of a severe withering fire extending suddenly for twenty miles carried the redoubts at the point of the bayonet, but they suffered greater losses than the enemy in their headlong attack. From these captured redoubts a hundred thousand cannon poured in an incessant storm of shells.

The Glandelinians rushed suddenly on and recaptured the redoubts and batteries, but scarcely had they obtained possession of them before the Abbeonians in turn furiously charged, and drove them back to their own intrenchments and from them, driving the whole Glandelinian out of commission and ending the battle in favor of the Christian side.

But again it was resumed the next day, the Glandelinians suddenly attacking the Christian line but failing to break it. For another whole day the contest raged and was very severe. The Glandelinians would attack and storm the Christian lines with great fury and impetuosity, and then retreat, to renew the effort. After almost breaking the Abbeonian line the foe gave it up finally and continued the retreat southward.

In the meantime a serious disaster happened to the wicked Glandelinians. General Miller who had been advancing to repel the Christian advance under general Constantine Aronburg the father of the murdered Aronburg child, rapidly found himself surrounded, by a superior force of the fierce Abbeonians, and soon continuing, the Abbeonians also held possession of Lake Angeline, and had easy communication with her mother country, while between Miller's Glandelinian army and the others, intervened a vast and unbroken forest and jungle for hundreds of miles which were burning fiercely for days. When Miller arrived in the vicinity he had only 1310000

13,000,000 men, of whom the greater part were militia, there he received orders by wireless to break through the circle of Abbeonians immediately or meet serious disaster. By strange blunders, the intelligence of the intentions of the wicked Glandelinians fell into the hands of general Aronburg, who availed himself of the information, and immediately seized the whole stretch of the Mc-Hollister Run in that location, and in a great battle found himself surrounded and enclosed tighter than a coar. The Abbeonian general Proctor sent a column down the coast coast with heavy reinforcements, and these marched toward the Aronburgs Run. To open a road and obtain supplies Miller sent out a large detachment, but it fell into an ambush and to avoid a useless slaughter surrendered without a fight. He now strongly fortified himself, and to open communications to the river banks, sent another detachment under general Mc-Whirther Cass, but they became bewildered by the near approach of the fierce Abbeonians and were forced to find their way back to the camp or be captured. Presently general Richard Logan arrived with millions of Christians with more reinforcements, and now Constantine Aronburg passed over the Mc-Whirther Run River and summoned Miller to surrender, who refused, but Aronburg landed the main bodies of troops, and there threatened with destruction Miller surrendered. He not surrounded his army but all of southern Galverinda at the same time.

Simultaneously other Glandelinian armies tried to force back the vigorous advance of the Christians, attempts being made to obtain possession of the town called The Virgin Queen but owing to a deficiency of boats only about six hundred thousand men mostly regulars passed over the punt river and general Gammon who became separated from his men, failed on account of the rapidity of the current to reach the opposite shore quick enough.

THE BATTLE OF THE VIRGIN QUEEN.

The Glandelinian forces that had landed were suddenly attacked with great vigor by the Abbeonians, and general Gammon's army soon fell wounded, but he ordered general Ogilvie and Woodhead to storm the batteries, which they did in fine style, driving the Abbeonians with great loss into their stone defenses, from which all the attempts to dislodge them was unavailing and the Glandelinian losses was horribly heavy in a few hours. General Constantine Aronburg to whom Miller surrendered a few days before was in command of the Abbeonians, and he led a tremendous onslaught, which though successful cost him the loss of 3,566,999 privates in slain and fairly generals in killed and wounded.....

During this time a large force of the Glandelinian were striving to cross the river under fire of the Abbieannian batteries, about five hundred thousand started across, and only five hundred or six were the remainder that reached the opposite banks, the rest having been blown to air or shot down and then suddenly a band of Concentinians emerged from the woods and joined in the horribly horrible fray; these were soon cut to flight by other streams of Glandelinians crossing the river, but the Glandelinian general Scott Whitfield was slain and his forces were driven back with terrible loss in officers and men.....

The battle raged with horrible violence, and now general Sheaf George advancing with reinforcements for the Abbieannians, and then pressed upon the assailants from all sides and the sight of this overwhelming force of Abbieannians somewhat cooled the ardor of the Glandelinians for some time and they refused without reinforcements to cross the river in aid of their countrymen, and so the result was that all those who had gone over, about 1,500,000 in number were compelled to surrender the selves as prisoners of war or be ruthlessly bayoneted to death by the ferocious Abbieannians who reluctantly received the surrender as they had wished to annihilate them all but their comrades did not allow it.

The armies of Glandelinians under general Detroit Kentucky was reluctant to advance to the aid and so the expedition was abandoned and the Abbieannian troops were allowed possession of all the southern parts of western Galverinia, other Glandelinian armies refused to advance against such overwhelming numbers of Christians, and one failure followed another in rapid succession. Indeed the surrender of general Miller a great disaster indeed aroused the warlike spirit of the wicked Glandelinians to the highest pitch and Glandelinian armies were coming by scores to repel the Abbieannian advances. The Glandelinians were divided into series of great armies. Those of the west, that of central Galverinia, and the rest along the boundary line of Galverinia and Anglinia. The whole of Galverinia was swarming with Abbieannian armies and despite the desperation of the wicked Glandelinians they soon met with a similar shattering disaster. To recover what Miller had lost the Glandelinians under general Walter John Harrison, Detroit Kentucky, and Maidenia, and Winchester advanced with "20,000,000 Glandelinians, and as this large force drew near the Evangeline St. Clare river Winchester learned that a body of Abbieannians and Concentinians was in possession of southern Pandora Run, and sent a detachment but was routed without a battle, and the Abbieannians defiant in the extreme remained and maintained their position until Concentinians Aronburg came up. When Aronburg learned of the approach of the new forces of Glandelinians he hastened on to cut off the Glandelinian army from escape before Harrison could give aid.

THE BATTLE ALONG THE EVANGELINE ST. CLARE.

After a fierce attack was made during the night, and during the confusion of the frightful battle general Detroit and Winchester was killed, two other enormous armies were captured, 3,456,000 Glandelinians were forced to surrender and the whole camp with all the tents, provisions and artillery was captured by the dashing Abbieannians. Fearing the approach of Concentinians Aronburg the remaining general of the wretched army retreated leaving behind the wounded Glandelinians, which fell into the possession of the Abbieannians. Harrison was himself besieged by a large force of Glandelinians, and learning that the Glandelinian general Foolchond was advancing with a large force he secretly telegraphed for half of the force to immediately seize the Abbieannian batteries on the north side of the McWhirther run, and though this was attempted, they were routed with indiscriminate slaughter, and the attempt was abandoned. Two days later Harrison again attempted to take the position after two days of fighting horse and at long range firing, but the Abbieannians defended the line of batteries against overwhelming numbers of Glandelinians until the last man fell. The Abbieannian reinforcements were enraged at the indiscriminate slaughter of their comrades and they dashed with fearful fury to the assault all around; in their battle yell

"Come on comrades, give the dirty Glandelinian stinks no quarter, and again and again they rushed to the assault, and so fierce was the firing of both sides that everything was fogged in smoke. As they crowded among the captured guns, the infantry fire of the Glandelinians let loose with horrifying fury the effect was terrific, the Abbieannian line was torn in shreds, their comrades all of them were down, their flags ripped and torn and soaked in blood of their fallen, and the survivors retreated in the wildest confusion.

To a Glandelinian general pressed on with the same fury that the Abbieannians had under the attack, the Glandelinians were driven back with terrible losses, but general Concentinians Aronburg threw forward the heaviest reinforcements, all of this way of Glandelinian assailants were either taken or slain, general Banderline barely escaped with about two hundred thousand men who fought fouriously all the way during their retreat to the captured guns, and then the batteries opened once more and galled the approaching Abbieannian reinforcements. The Glandelinian forces coming up now from other points the Glandelinian general Bernard punn, led another great assault, but a rain of high explosives was dropped upon the Glandelinians from newly placed batteries which blew up with tremendous force killing and wounded all the Glandelinians who had rushed to the assault, among whom was the gallant general Pikean and now as the main line which still held the batteries prepared for a desperate stand the Abbieannians came on once more with firecrackers and fur firing fiercely as they advanced to the attack. The Glandelinians after a determined resistance repulsed the assailants, but to stand ground further was impossible and in the night they retreated, but before retreating the Glandelinians burned the towns of Hanson, Lewistown, Youngstown, Manchester, the city of Black Rock, and indeed every town in the path of the retreat in an endeavor to check the Abbieannians by means of a thick smoke shroud but in vain they were followed closely.

During the following day the Glandelinians resumed the conflict in terrible earnest, and though defeated in every charge and cut down without mercy in horrible numbers, the Glandelinian divisions penetrated the Abbieannian line a gain and a gain again from different points, and drove back the right and center twelve times with great loss, and though overwhelmed every time and driven back in succession they were not conquered and were determined not to give an inch further of ground no matter how large a force of Abbieannians went against them. But now as the Abbieannians attacked most wildly the Glandelinian left wing after four hours of it could not resist the tremendous attack, but fled leaving the undefended batteries exposed. The small defenders of the batteries charged the advancing Abbieannians, but met annihilation and the batteries were captured. All along the line the strong Abbieannian batteries played fearfully upon the Glandelinian trenches on the center, the loss of the Glandelinians was still greater, yet they maintained their position, and made one tremendous charge after another, and as speedily as they were repulsed they only went at it again.

General Jessup of the foe arriving with big reinforcements drove the main line of Abbieannian militia before him, and gaining the rear of the Abbieannians captured a great number of prisoners among whom was general Great heart himself, who having been wounded was retreating. It was seen that the key of the Abbieannian position was the artillery on the main Abbieannian center.

The Glandelinian general Miller rushed upon the artilleryists, and after a mortal combat of four hours, of which terrible numbers of Glandelinians fell the artillery men were driven from their batteries by the foe who charged with fixed bayonets.

Presently general Drummond punn advanced advanced with overwhelming numbers to recover the guns but all his divisions quailed before the terrible annihilating fire which they encountered, and which reduced them into fragments. He rallied them again and again to the charge, sent reinforcements, spared every man he could, sent the support of new batteries, and added them by covering charges of large bodies of dashing Concentinians cavalry, but again and again these gigantic columns were forced back torn and mangled and with the loss of scores of officers of the highest rank. It was terrible with the energy of furious desperation, and determination, he again rushed them forward, but again they were met with a resistance equally obstinate, the opposing forces closing with them in a mad melee fighting with bayonets, and old clubbed muskets and pistols, or of firing face to face. The Abbieannians stung by the defeat sullenly retired. The Glandelinians had maintained their ground, supplying their own exhausted ammunition from the cartridge boxes of their slain foes. The men were almost perishing with hunger thirst and fatigue, they having marched for fifteen miles and continued with an overwhelming force of Abbieannians for forty eight hours. Exhausted they sank upon the ground, the silence only being broken by the groans of the hundreds of thousands of wounded and dying, and the roar of the mighty conflict still going on at another quarters, whose crashing thunders was a fit requiem for the dead on that field of blood.

The Glandelinians at last toward midnight retired toward their own lines carrying off every one of the guns they had captured, and all the tents belonging to the Abbieannians which they had captured. The Glandelinians had in the two days lost over 8,756,444 men, and the Abbieannians nearly 83,444,44 23,444,444 an unprecedented loss when compared with the numbers engaged. Concentinians Aronburg and Scott were both wounded, as well as nearly all the regimental officers of his right wing.

The glandelinians proved to be different than when they had been in 1941. It was seen now by the Abbeisannians that the glandelinians when driven to desperation could and would fight. They had met the Abbeisannians time and again during the bloody battle, and repulsed them in the series of desperate encounters. But then unfortunately for the glandelinians the horrible battle was not over. The Abbeisannians were so ashamed to be worsted that they did not give way during the night, and in the night advanced three grand divisions, and in the face of a destructive fire of the greatest in tenacity charged, recoiled, charged, recoiled, and charged again and again, even within a few feet of the glandelinians redoubts, and repulsed every counter assault with indiscriminate slaughter. They were again finally forced to retire at twelve o'clock at noon with a loss of nearly 3,566,666 men, the glandelinians not losing even a hundred thousand. Now garrison determined to take the rest of the Abbeisannian batteries. The time two o'clock was well chosen. Pushing forward his main forces he stormed the batteries with all the fury he could assume, fired the magazines, spiked the guns, captured four hundred thousand prisoners and returned to the lines, resumed the assault against heavy reinforcements captured the batteries for good and sent the whole Abbeisannian army flying in a total rout. It was a second victory for the desperate glandelinians but a very costly one.

THE GREAT NAVAL ENGAGEMENT.

Simultaneously stirring events occurred on other parts of the theatre of war, for general Camden marching southward with about 80,000,000 Abbeisannians moved forward toward the fortified town of Erminia on the banks of the great Erminia Run, which was the special object of attack planned.

There on the south bank of the great Erminia Run, general general Mc-Gork Mc-Gork was entrenched with an army of 3,000,000 men many of whom were in vilads. The main body of the glandelinian forces under Isreal Izard, was at Mc-Whirther's harbor, and so Mc-Gork called upon the forces for aid thirteen million of whom nobly responded, as did other armies. Mainly the Abbeisannians were moving down the great Erminia with a large fleet of war ships while other forces by land were approaching to take the town by land attacks. The ships numbered 3,456 all armed with three hundred big guns. While the fleets hammered away with their guns, the Abbeisannians prepared batteries of great strength on order to assault Mc-Gork's position. It was found useless to force the positions on the Mc-Whirther, and 10,000,000 paid their lives for the rash attempt on both sides combined.

Admiral Zimmermann had a fleet of eighty fresh ships each carrying over four hundred and thirty seven guns, twenty four great dreadnaughts, one thousand war sloops, each of ninety five guns, and 100,000 sailors and marines. The battle began in earnest. Thirty vessels at once began to be disabled, 100 others were torn to pieces by the deadly fire of the glandelinian batteries, twenty were secured by the foe, while the sloops were battered to splinters and set on fire. All the guns on the three flagships were disabled the great admiral Zimmermann and Mc-Gork were severely wounded, ten other ships were so badly cut up as to become unmanageable, and drifting within reach was also secured, but the remainder of the ships for a while presented a whole side of the ships and sent in broadsides after broad sides, but finally being also torn to pieces, sunk and blown up, with the loss of 45,666 men they struck their flags, and the entire fleet was captured with the exception of the two admirals the surviving men and a few gun boats.

Simultaneously when the fight began on the river Camden advanced to storm Mc-Gork's position, the main attack was made and repulsed with exorbitant losses to the Abbeisannians. The following night after the raging storm of battle in which again nearly five hundred thousand guns had been thundering like at Mc-Whirther, the Abbeisannians stricken with their third failure commenced their retreat abandoning the greater part of their stores and the many sick and wounded.

At other points the Abbeisannians under germanine yivian was still advancing unchecked. But it was impossible for them to reach the scene of action, but nevertheless he continued onward without meeting the least resistance from the militia of the neighborhood, and so he commenced his march toward Bowditchastill in the hands of the foe, moving very swiftly not less than fifty miles a day, and the advanced seemed more like a retreat, while the glandelinians moved very slowly, being enervated from the effects of their serious defeats, and from the excessive cold of the weather.

A few spirited troops could have captured any given number of them without resistance. A division of armed and trained negroes marched in front cautiously exploring the country, and recovering from runaway child slaves information from the glandelinians. The soul of the enterprise was the vicious gonocentian Aronburg who had been for the whole war engaged in many horrible battles. Wounded as he was in the recent battle he had resumed his advance, and the glandelinian planters in gawdina larned for their own safety, for their child slaves more numerous than ever seen elsewhere were threatening to rise in insurrection and join the Abbeisannians as boy scouts, permitted the durstians to retake them and offered themselves up as prisoners but general Barney franklin with his unengaged army of Glandelinians decided to try out his luck. He marched his forces after destroying his stores to join the retreating forces under Cannonia, and halted then on the old time battle ground of Mc-Hollester Run near gordinia and here he placed long lines of heavy batteries, and then a double line, and the divisions of the army were stationed astato stationed in such positions to support each other, in case of an attack by the Abbeisannians and as it was ascertained that the Abbeisannians were moving toward gordinia the positions were extended and made stronger. Rumors had magnified the numbers of the Abbeisannians as 50,000,000 all veterans. The discreet militia began to retreat, some with permission, some without, and on learning this general Cannonia sent orders for them to go back and make a stand and fight, or be shot as cowards. Barney had placed his batteries in a position to sweep all approaches to his lines. About two days later the enemy appeared but so excessive had been the cold that the glandelinians were exhaused and dying by hundreds. When Jimmie yivian reconnoitred the militia stationed on the rising ground, he was somewhat alarmed at their formidable appearance. The neighboring hills, hills were teeming with soldiers, field works and artillery which altogether made the most formidable appearance that the Abbeisannian commanders had ever seen, but they had gone too far to retreat, the order was given to move forward.

ANOTHER BATTLE ON THE GROUNDS OF MC-HOLLESTER RUN.

His alarm was of short continuance. A few charges put the Mc-Hollesterian militia to flight, the artillery men followed after tearing avenues in the Abbeisannian lines ten times, the main line of artillery after firing not more than three times rapidly retreated, then the first line of infantry gave way without resistance, then the Omarians on which some hopes were placed fled also without resistance, carrying with them one of their wounded generals. The Abbeisannians moved on steadily until they were checked by the double line of batteries manned by Barney. Finding it impossible to force this double line of batteries, divisions fled by right and left and passed up ravines. At the head of one was stationed the gargolians who cut down the first line of Abbeisannians at the first fire and then slowly retreated before overwhelming numbers fighting every step of the way. At the head of the other ravine was stationed a stronger force of gargolians with artillery, and they showed their way of discretion by causing the Abbeisannians to get out of the way of harm as quickly as possible.

Two more attempts were made to carry this hornets nest, and only when terrible numbers had fallen did the Abbeisannians succeed. Owing to the vigorous fire of the gargolians the Abbeisannians lost a large number of officers, and they could not for a while press on to force matters some more and it seemed as if the battle was lost. And in the midst of a very hostile country general Jimmie yivian was ill at ease, but in a fresh march of four months he did not meet the least opposition. His fleet was also moving up the Erminia run, and other forces of Abbeisannians eight million strong was landing at the northern fords, and also commenced their march the fleets passing on to bombard the fortifications of yivian and though an advanced party of troops was thrown forward to resume the battle their main general Ross Mc-Henry was killed, the fields and plains were covered with soldiers, teeming with active lines of artillery, and the Abbeisannians under general Samuel Francis Smith were storming the glandelinian works at all points and carrying all before them, the fortifications were bombarded with great success, though the fortifications had been replying with the greatest spirit and vigor, the cannonading at every point, and the roar of musketry extending for scores of miles making a earthenaking din.

The Abbeannian fleets passing on was mashing down every defence within range and fort Donald also fell before the guns of the fleet. Fort Gower was also attacked and invested and the shore batteries were shelled with terrible fury, these being defended by one hundred and thirty thousand men under general Lawrence Equel. The vigorous defence repulsed the fleet for the time being one of whose ships blew up. The battle soon increased with terrible fury and within four days of activity night and day the enemy were driven from point to point, until finally the confused masses found protection behind a long stretch of batteries erected during the previous night and which now were opened upon the Abbeannians with telling effect. Good service was done by the battle ship the Virgin Queen which ran in nearer to the shore and with her guns swept the glandelinian batteries through and through all day long, tossing guns into the air, crowding the works with gigantic explosions and committing incalculable damage until the Abbeannians were finally able to capture them. Another vigorous cannonade lasting seventeen more hours continued with series of infantry and cavalry assaults of both sides but finally the Abbeannians prepared for another desperate assault. The main column was led by goncentinian Aronburg in person, intending to storm the center, one column moving along the river and carrying a redoubt fifteen miles long with the loss of 300,000 in four hours, another led by Jimmie Vivian and Greathart advancing through a small swamp. As the advancing columns came within range the glandelinian artillery opened upon them with deadly effect, yet though thousands were mowed down at every discharge, they filled their shattered ranks and moved steadily on.

Presently the first wing reached the range of the Gargol Ivan infantry who poured in a continuous stream of unerring bullets, and the whole column faltered, there being extensive gaps in their lines. Panberham Johnson of the Abbeannians fell a very superior general, Keen and Gibbs Johnstonia were both dangerously wounded, goncentinia-Aronburg was wounded again, Jacksonia was killed, and generals Pyandlin, Morgan and Thro Thornton were wounded the latter mortally. Jimmie Vivian continued the desperate assault, and lost 2,000,000 in half an hour's time. The struggle was fearful but still it continued.

As the Abbeannians were pressing on successfully general Jimmie Vivian received information that a large force of glandelinian reinforcements was threatening to storm his right which alone was not advancing.

Fearing disaster he sent forces to relieve his right. And just in time. The glandelinians opened with a tremendous cannonade from their main line of batteries, and then launched a fearful assault. The Abbeannians of the right wing defended themselves with the greatest bravery, and not until general Brown fell mortally wounded did they threaten to give way and fire the signal guns.

The right of the Abbeannian army was truly in peril, an overwhelming force of glandelinians three to one, had made a desperate and incessant assault of the most violent character, and Jimmie Vivian had to withdraw one half of his assailants and these he moved on with the determination of cutting through the glandelinian wave assailing his right wing. A general fire of artillery was suddenly opened, but the Abbeannians moved silently and swiftly onward, then their own artillery opened, and displayed great skill in the rapidity, as well as in the accuracy, with which each gun was handled. The Abbeannian guns riddled the big glandelinian wave through and through, while Jimmie Vivian scarcely noticed their artillery, but poured an incessant storm of balls and shells and canister upon their massive line of infantry. During the meanwhile the glandelinian cavalry endeavored to turn the Abbeannian flank, but the infantry, with fixed bayonets stood firm and met the shock, and repulsed them with the aid of the field artillery was reduced the cavalry to half their number.

The glandelinian wave being thus placed between two fires posted themselves in a strong ravine, their right and left being protected by dense brush and their artillery was placed behind a strong breastwork beyond the ravine, and which swept the Abbeannian line into through and through. General Vivian placed his artillery near the region in a long chain and ordered divisions on the right and left to group their way through the chaparral and ferret out with the bayonet the glandelinian sharpshooters, who were swarming in the brush which protected them, but while this was done no order could be observed, officers were shot down by the enemy by scores, men fell in hundreds per second, and each soldier who survived acted for himself as he broke his way through the brush and probed for the wicked glandelinians, and the sharp rattling of the firing of thousands of muskets, the sharp twang of rifle rifles, the dull sound of the bayonet, the deep muttering of thousands of cannon, the shrill devil yell of the glandelinian glandelinians, so in contrast with the vigorous shouts of the millions of Abbeannians produced a tremendous uproar.

The right and left had gradually forced their way through the chaparral almost to the ravine, leaving myriads of comrades behind dead, almost to the ravine, but the glandelinian battery handled with great coolness and execution still swept the Abbeannian line at every discharge, and held them in complete check. That battery, the key of the glandelinian position on the left must be taken, so general Vivian turned to general May of the goncentinian cavalry, and pointing to the battery ordered him to take it at all costs. The general wheeled his horse and shouting to his troops said:

"Men we must take that battery."

The attention of the combatants was arrested, all eyes were turned toward the fields across which dashed the overwhelming force of horsemen at a thunderous charge led by their gallant leader. A cloud of smoke from bursting shells soon hid them from view, the discharge of guns swept away one third of their number, but in a moment more the clashing of sabres and the trampling of men underfoot proclaimed that the battery had been taken. The glandelinian cannoniers were paralyzed at the sudden appearance of the approaching Abbeannian cavalry, and before they could recover the dragons were upon them, May with his own hands capturing the glandelinian general La Vega Stata who was in the act of discharging a gun. The dragons then charged directly through the glandelinian centre, and a shout of triumph arose through the Abbeannian lines as the infantry pressed on under hot fire from the foot infantry and took possession of the guns, from which the dragons had driven the artillery men.

The entire left wing of the wicked glandelinians panic stricken at the sudden onset, broke and fled in confusion to the nearest point of the Mc-Hollister Run, in their haste to pass over which numbers of them were drowned. It was a complete victory along the left but it was temporary. The main general of the glandelinian left Arasta by name fled with what remainder remained of his force, all the glandelinian artillery, two million stand of arms, and sixteen thousand mules and horses, fell into the hands of the Abbeannians. We may well imagine the emotions with which the right wing of general Vivian's force, exhausted by the exertions of the four days battles, and incessant bombardment, listened to the sound of fresh battle caused by the reinforcing force of christians, as it drew nearer and nearer, first was heard the cannon, then the wild incessant crash of musketry, then the smoke could be seen floating above the distant trees, now the glandelinians appeared here and there in flight, presently the victorious Abbeannian cavalry came into sight, and the men mounted the ramparts and shouted a welcome.

At other points of the line the Abbeannians still pressed on a diversion was made against the centre, by batteries erected during the night before, and the impetuous goncentinian Aronburg though wounded as he was by great exertions accomplished his purpose, and after most hard fighting one of the first main line of glandelinian works of great strength was captured. The Abbeannians captured the works in handsome style, as well as a long line of child slave factories in the rear which had been used as fortifications. General Worth and Butler simultaneously succeeded in gaining the Saltillio Run and thus cut off the enemy's communication from the south, while the remainder of his force carried in succession the heights south of the great Mc-Hollister Run, and immediately turned the captured batteries upon the main wing of the glandelinian center. The Abbeannians under a hot withering fire advanced from tree to tree, from house and factory to factory, and from square to square, firing furiously in turn, until they reached the open where the enemy's series of fresh batteries were situated. They obtained these batteries after a desperate assault, then forced the child slave factories on either side after frightful onslaughts, by means of crowbars and cannon tore and blew down the high railments, captured the and drove the enemy from point to point until the whole center was forced.

It is sad to say the carnage was terrible, it being a scene of damnable. The shouts of the combatants, with the wail of suffering child slaves, the thunder of thousands of cannon, the ear-splitting roar of countless muskets and the dead and wounded lying in multitudes everywhere for miles and miles present presented a scene so heartrending that even the demon of war might be supposed to turn from its surpassing horror. The glandelinians had effectually barricaded the open spaces between the child slave factories but these were carried, while the Abbeannians borrowed from house to house, this part of the conflict continuing with horror for four hours in which the glandelinians fought most desperately from behind their barricades, on the factory tops, from the factory windows, breastworks and elsewhere where they did not hesitate to meet the desperate Abbeannian assailants. All the child slaves were rescued, the glandelinian general Ampudia was captured and the whole center was forced back for ten miles from the works.

The main ground chosen by the wicked Glandelinian generals on which to make a general and last stand was the northern parts of the Mc-Hollester Run since so famous for the many battles fought on these grounds during the war, and here it was believed that neither flank could be turned except by large forces of light troops clambering up hills, having numerous ravines or deep gullies, the plateau being somewhat rough, with here and there open and very smooth places as well as clumps of thorny chaparral.

During the slight lull in the battle it being now two thirty o'clock clouds of smoke far to the right of the Abbia Abbieannian line made known that the main part of the glandelinian army had come up, and was in motion against that part of the Abbieannian line, and the long roll of drum drum cannon fire gave them the impression that the glandelinian cavalry had also joined in the assault, and under the support of fresh glandelinian artillery which had come up.

The Abbieannians on account of the new sound of battle halted in their head long advance, they realized they were about to meet a fresh force of the enemy in their numbers nearly five to the one of the forces first engaged. In this great contest their only hopes was in their own bravery and in the skill of their brave commanders. General Washington's batteries were placed to command the lower banks of the Mc-Hollester Run, the key to the position of the Abbieannian army. General Hardings divisions was on a ridge to the left of the artillery, and general Mc-Kee's forces of concentinians intrenched on another ridge in their rear. To the left beyond these was posted the Bombobians, under general Asels, while still further further in the same direction, were stationed generals Yeller, and Humphrey Francis Marshall with the fierce Tripoligonians, and the remainder of the army including Land Lanes divisions, the gormomian riflemen, general Davis Jeffersons two forces of cavalry or flying dragons, and Shermans Bruggards batteries of flying artillery, which were placed in reserve on the rear of the plateau. The main Abbieannian right had a battery of sixteen hundred, sixteen pounders, and 1000 Krupps and 2,444 Centeseters, which rested along the salient of the Mc-Hollester Run, these guns being manned by San Patricios divisions of Concentinians composed of Ovarian and Mc-Hollesterian deserters from the glandelinian army.

Two grand divisions Pachecos and Lombardinis extended in the rear of this battery, new guns twelve and eight pounders, 10,000 in number were posted to the extreme left, and an overwhelming battalion occupied a hill in advance of the main line, directly opposite the Ermine creek running into the great river at this section. Their cavalry and lancers were stationed also to the rear of either flank and to be unnumbered the baggage of the whole army was left many miles in the rear under guard of the second Abbieannian army. All the while the roar in of heavy firing had been observed since the short lull but now Santa Anna noticing that the foe position beyond their own left was unguarded, sent general Ampudia with a force of light troops to take the weak position. This movement was observed by Gannonia and as the christians approached more furious fighting began, the wicked wicked glandelinians keeping up a continuous uproar of musketry, while the Abbieannians lay among the rocks which whence could be heard the roar of their own musketry. The glandelinian batteries threw a shot and shell storm with great intensity, but the Abbieannians on the other fields remained silent as they wished a closer conflict. General Minon in the meantime had passed through the defile, Palomas Andentro coming next and then he prepared to throw forward his numerous forces of cavalry, but here Santa Anna sent his orders to refrain from charging just now, and to be in readiness to fall upon the glandelinian forces, which he promised general Jimmie Vivian would either capture or put to flight the next morning.

The appearance of Minon caused no little anxiety, and to make it worse for the glandelinians Ap Ampudia was reinforced, and he now resumed the recently abandoned attack, and stretched his lines further to the left, but general Marshall maintaining his position and having been repulsed when making an attack on the glandelinian position now found himself pressed by superior numbers.

Soon after toward quarter to three movements in the Abbieannian lines indicated that a grand attack was in contemplation, and they decided to delay and attack first which they did. Their strength was nearly all thrown with fearful force and violence toward the Abbieannian left, where despite the overwhelming numbers of their troops and the extent of the ground the troops were placed in a long but thin line.

San Patricios batteries was immediately brought forward, and placed on the ridge in front of the plateau, to repel the three powerful columns of attack each five million strong, these glandelinian soldiers being composed of the best of the army and led by its most experienced officers.

As the foremost columns advanced, general pande ordered general Lane O'Brien to hold them in check with his guns, and the Concentinian divisions to support him. The shot and shell ploughed through the glandelinian ranks from front to rear, tearing huge avenues in their columns, yet the furious glandelinians crowded on till the head of the columns and then the main columns were literally shot to pieces, and thrown into irreparable confusion and despite the urgent requests of their officers refused to continue the advance. Lane now ordered Lane to move forward fifty yards nearer to the enemy, and as he did so, the concentinians followed, but came within range of a strong glandelinian battery, which they carried and opened upon the flank of the other column of assailants. The first assaulting columns having retreated before, the retreat now became a flight which extended quite beyond the Abbieannian guns, and now as O'Brien's batteries was concentrated the entire fire of Pachecos artillery and infantry column added, but as the enemy resumed the assault and poured in a fierce musketry storm of a million rifles per minute, his horses belonging to the artillery were soon disabled, not a man of the concentinian force escaped from being killed or wounded, but nevertheless the wounded alone struck to their position and fired again and again until unable to do any more, but again before such bravery the glandelinians were forced to fall back. The forces now advanced advanced with wild yells and formed a juncture with the divisions under Lombardini, the entire body then moved against the second and third column of glandelinians; while their supporting batteries opened a heavy and galling fire upon the glandelinian cannon. Four divisions simultaneously volunteered to gain the main plateau, which they reached in the midst of this conflict and the glandelinians after giving fierce resistance were overpowered and became panic-stricken and fled.

The second glandelinian column now unsupported slowly fell back but continued a withering fire all along the line of retreat, and while this was in progress a portion of the Ovarians were also forced back, and Ampudia with his light troops came down the Ermine and completely turned the left of the second column, while the third heavy column of Abbieannians under Mora Villanelli pressed on after the thundering glandelinian battery, and then waiting until his men came within close range, he turned his machine gun battery loose on the glandelinian artillerymen, and though the foe battery poured in the shot and shell with surprising rapidity and most terrible effect, and though the first portion of the column melted away before the storm the rest came on, the whole mass of glandelinian infantry was ravaged by the return fire of the christians and thrown into confusion, and swayed from side to side, and then broke and fled, leaving the plain covered with a multitude of slain and wounded.

Just as the three columns of the wicked enemies of God had failed to force the Abbia Abbieannian left, general Tylor accompanied by fresh troops arrived upon the field, his presence was needed. He brought with him every available man that could be spared, and these were sent forward to support the assault. The natural advantages of the positions had been gained, success had alone depended upon the bravery of the troops, and had been accomplished, though many officers of both sides had fallen fallen, and whole divisions of the glandelinian volunteers, both infantry and horse strewn the fields in dead and wounded, the remainder were in disastrous retreat toward the Ermine, in spite the efforts of their generals, and other officers to restrain them.

So it can be seen how difficult it is to clash with Abbieannia. The Abbieannian infantry supported by their fine cavalry, right and left which made one tremendous shock after another, and then followed again by shock after shock, continued to press on. By great exertions Davis rallied the majority of his glandelinian forces, and a part of the Ovarian force, the Abbieannians advanced at a quick step, but silent until within rifle range, and then again gave the wicked foe of God a destructive fire all along the line for twenty miles all of a sudden.

The glandelinians answered with a as fierce a storm and shredded the christian line, but they did not slacken their pace, until they came to the edge of the first line of works, which lay between them and the enemy, and thus for a while the two forces confronted each other, and making desperate assaults back and forth, and then the Abbieannians with a shout all along the line, dashed over the works, poured in a murderous fire lingers for a moment to reload, and then rose upon the opposite crest in the face of the enemy, and with defiant yells urged how their fire more fearfully than ever and the graycoats fell in myriads for every volley.

The wicked glandelinians apparently astonished at the apparition, which was sending death through their ranks, wavered for a few minutes, tried to rally and make another stand, but as the Abbieannians with savage yells and fury closed with them and bayoneted them in the same barbaric manner, they recoiled in confusion, and rolled back upon the columns, which was advancing to their support. General Davis who had tried to rally his army was assailed by another force of Abbieannians from another direction, and over 10,000,000 lancers who had not as yet been engaged, swept over the plains at a thunderous gallop, being well supported by infantry.

To meet this new army mostly of whom were Concentinians, Davis was aided by the Omarians and Mc-Hollestonians. He extended his lines across the opposite parts of the field in the form of the letter V, the opening toward the approaching lancers.

They came on and on at a wild gallop being bound to charge their way through the centre, and as they gradually drew nearer it was expected that they would slacken their pace, but they did not, they expected the foe to fire but nevertheless they were determined to ride them down before they could reload to fire a second volley. The latter fired not a gun, but awaited their approach. At length the lancers came at a cyclone pace through the opening of the extensive angle. The silence seemed to fill the air with awe, they were within eighty yards of a thousand machine guns and a other artillery, and infantry were marksmen who could take deliberate aim. At the word every rifle, musket and cannon was aimed and poised, a moment intervened then went forth the storm of death and destruction.

The entire front columns of the lancers were riddled, not a ball or shell appeared to have failed on its errand, which was added by a hurricane of grape and canister. The dead and wounded men and horses made a barricade of struggling life, but over passed the remainder, and they broke through the line and gained the rear of the field, sabred and lanced a 1 the gunners and almost changed the fortunes of the day right there. The wicked glandelinians were appalled at the destruction of their companions, and the whole mass fled headlong from the field, but the glandelinians only reformed here for another stand.

In the meantime a great squadron of Abbieannian cavalry under general Torrejon skirted the glandelinian centre to the left, and penetrated to the Erminde a distance of ten miles, whence the commands of Tell and Marshall had also penetrated at another quarter. General Taylor sent all the cavalry he could spare, under general May, to reinforce the assailants at that point. Torrejon advanced with greater enthusiasm at the approach of these reinforcements, the glandelinians still holding firm received him with a scattering withering fire, but the Abbieannians confident in man horse rode on rapidly, there they were checked by two battalions for some time, and here it was that general Teller as he made a tremendous charge was killed at the head of his troops. Torrejon himself was wounded, and general May making his appearance again, with two batteries separated his forces, and forced the glandelinians to retreat still further.

On the plateau the battle had raged in one long continuous cannonade, the glandelinians having on the ridge in front, a battery of 18,654 cannon, yet they could not silence the Abbieannian guns under San Patriello, but now at no point was there any lull in the battle storm. Along the left grand divisions a severe conflict was in progress. One of the Glandelinian divisions retreating toward the Erminde had united with a large force sent by Cannonia against Santa Anna to make its way on the extreme right round to the Abbieannian rear.

General May with his dragoons, infantry and a portion of the Concentinians, and Dandobians was engaged in the bloody contest. General Taylor sent to his aid a portion of the main battery of artillery, and the main division of dragoons, with some of the volunteer cavalry. They soon accomplished the object by cutting off the retreat of the Glandelinians, who had passed so far beyond the Abbieannian left. They were shelled, and driven back to their own lines of works and thrown into inextricable confusion, Braggs advanced within close canister range, and with their wonted rapidity his guns played upon them, the shot tore through, and crashed through the bewildered multitude, and those nearest the hills endeavored to escape by clambering up its sides. The whole force about five million became utterly hopeless, while the wounded and lying, was increased at a fearful rate, the horses frantic with pain and terror added to the confusion. A few minutes more and they laid down their arms at this crisis, as if to stay the arm of death, a white flag was seen approaching, but it was fired upon by the Abbieannians, who seen it as a trick, the hill was carried and the survivors captured.

Santa Anna had in the meantime extricated his soldiers and had also learned from his spies--the Abbieannian officers--the size of the glandelinian army--only three grand divisions of infantry and guns, and their main portion was far to the left, whether they had almost driven the Abbieannian right wing an hour before. Shielding his own men from sight by ravines and a ure of the mountains he had been for four hours concentrating his main strength for a final assault upon the central position of the glandelinian army. At several points already he had met with partial success, but in the main his plans had been frustrated by the indomitable courage, rapid movements, and hard fighting of the wicked glandelinians.

Having concentrated his forces, he now brought his reserve into fierce action, aided by the large force of troops of the right wing, which had just been rescued from peril by the assault of the left on the glandelinian position. The whole force of attack 12,000,000 strong, the front divisions composed of veterans, with general Perese at their head, moved up the ascent from the valleys. The scattered divisions of glandelinians, composed of marians and Mc-Hollestonians in advance of the line were taken by surprise at the sudden appearance of the Abbieannians in such numbers, the Abbieannians which an hour or two before, had driven the other columns into utter confusion, retreating from the field. The multitudes of Abbieannians pouring in a volley after volley of musketry pressed on and compelled these divisions to retire toward the lines. General Ladstone was left almost entirely alone with his artillery, yet for a time he maintained his place, his broadsides of shells burying themselves in the columns of the approaching Abbieannians, but the mass closed up the gaps and steadily came nearer and nearer. For round shot, and shells he substituted canister and grape, and they were checked for a time appalled at their horrible losses, but it was their last struggle to secure the field, and trusting to numbers and heedless of death, the mass again moved on. Presently there was not an infantry soldier to defend or support the guns, nor a horse to draw them, still the desperate gunners stood to their places, and retreated only as their places recoiled. At length overtaken every officer or gunner either killed or wounded, Abbieannians a himself among the latter, they abandoned them to the Abbieannians.

Meanwhile the series of scattered divisions took refuge in a deep ravine to the right of the battle field. The glandelinians lined its crest, and kept upon the Abbieannians a continuous volley of musketry, to which they could scarcely reply, while their cavalry dashed forward to the mouth of the ravine to cut off their retreat. Fortunately the rout of the cavalry brought them within range of Washington's battery at the Plateau, whose guns were immediately brought to bear upon them, they recoiled, relinquished their object, and began to retreat from the ravine, while by throwing shots over the heads of the volunteers who were now moving out he harassed the glandelinians exceedingly. The glandelinian infantry now unopposed descended into the ravine once more, but was driven back with murderous loss, and it was in this encounter that the glandelinian generals Logan Hardinia, Henry Mc-Kee, and Henry Francis Clay Johnston and great numbers of brave and generous glandelinian officers were slain. The first crisis of the conflict was near. The whole glandelinian center being overcome there was no one to oppose the Abbieannians, and encouraged by their sweeping success the Abbieannians pushed on with unusual vigor, and at the commencement of the new attack the glandelinians were more or less scattered in a headlong rout over the plateau and on the extremes of the field, and now the heavy roar of the battle at other quarters made known that the issue of the day was about to be determined, and reinforcements hastened of their own accord to the point of danger. It was an hour of intense anxiety to Cannonia it now being half past three, as he saw this unexpected host advance in such order and with such determination. The battle during the fourth hour day had already lasted eight hours, the toll of so many rapid movements over the rough fields had wearied his men, while the approaching Abbieannian force was fresh, and in numbers four to one of his own. Was it possible to hold them in check till his second reserves could come up. He sent messenger after messenger to urge them on. In one division could be seen Nelson and in another Fitzpatrickson, driving with whip and spur the faded horses attached to their batteries, while in the distance to the left of the line could be seen the Concentinians and Trojogonillians under their officers Davis Danner and Lane rapidly advancing, now in sight, and moving toward the broken glandelinian center. Bragg was the first to continue to go forward, and as he started on the attack he sent for more infantry to support the guns which were to cover his charge, and then as these came he sent his columns forward with the order:

"Fight the glandelinians to the death."

The Abbieannians now rushed on and before the glandolinian cannons could unlumber their guns, the christians were within a few yards of their muzzles so swift they came on, but the glandolinians seemed to be inspired with an energy bey and human, and with a readiness greater than ever discharge followed discharge in endless succession and a whole line of Abbieannians were mowed down. The surviving columns faltered, as if waiting for them to cease, but for a moment that they might rush forward and capture them. No such moment was granted, they still hesitated, and were thrown into confusion. By this time ghorrans Abbieannians came up, and charged with his wonted effect, in a few moments more wash Washington's batteries moved forward and did the same. Davis and Jane then closed with the enemys right flank, commenced to pour in their fire, the hesitating columns took heart, and with wild yells that was heard for miles dashed forward, and over the works, and among the guns, and closed with the glandolinians who after desperate fighting hand to hand were forced again to recoil from all sides, they could not hold the new battery, hope seemed to desert every breast, and again pell mell they rushed from the field with the Abbieannians in pursuit.

This part of the battle was indeed a series of encounters in different parts of the field, each one severe in its self, but indecisive in its result. Never before had cannonias army contended with such odds and under disadvantages so great as contesting with the horrible Abbieannians the dread of all the foes of god. It was won by the super superior handling of the Abbieannian flying artillery, which continually thinned shattered, mangled, and broken all the ranks and columns of the enemies of god, before they could bring their second main force to bear.

When repulsed the Abbieannians invariably fell back out of danger to be again reformed for another attack, while the glandolinians for want of cavalry and sufficient numbers, could not pursue and disperse them beyond the power of rallying. On the part of the latter morning was one of unrelenting toil, their fewness of numbers, the extent of the shell torn field, the roughness of the ground, and the numerous attacks, forced them to be continually in rapid and laborous motion. General cannonia was in the midst of flying battle and exploding shells forelight hours, only one ball of which passed through his coat, and none one of his officers swarmed from their post of danger nor neglected a duty—especially this could be said of the fami us general Neldon, who was ever at every point where he was especially needed, and the almost superior skill in which the glandolinian batteries were handled was due to the exertions of the officers, who spared no effort to infuse into the ranks their own spirit and discipline, who cheerfully submitted to the requisite drudgery of the drill. They had also hoped to win the battle by musketry and charges of cavalry, their main heavy guns they did not as yet bring upon the field, but placed them in battery formations on the crest of hills. The foe had taken every precaution to repel the attack of the Abbieannians, and endeavors had been made to prevent the Abbieannians from passing round to the right or left.

The troops having been supplied with their rations, remained on the field despite the fury of the Abbieannian assault, fresh divisions were brought from the rear to supply the places of those who took charge of the sea of wounded, who were carried southward in series of long freight or passenger trains to glandolinia. The glandolinian army was indeed in a truly deplorable condition, they being without hospital supplies, and almost literally without food, and no means to obtain it, a watery waste of series of dangerous and treacherous rivers before them and a apparently victorious enemy all around. The defeated columns continued their retreat under cover of the reserves which were forcing to resume the battle on a forlorn hope indeed, and indeed losses had reduced the center of the glandolinian army to a mere remnant, and that discouraged by defeat confidence in the generalship of cannonia was almost gone, many of the wounded had been left to their fate, and the sea of dead was unnumbered. More than 23,678,554 of his men including many officers of high rank lay scattered over the field, and trains were loaded with the wounded who were rescued.

At four o'clock the great struggle was renewed, and amid a din of shouts the fierce glandolinian reserves fell upon the advancing Abbieannians with fearful force, but the Abbieannians threw away scarcely a shot, the whole lines of the foe were shot down, the survivors broke and fled, but general Herredia made a desperate stand with a force of four million men, protected by intrenchments across the fields, and on the neighboring fields and hills, but to no avail. Doniphan forced his way in that inferno to the flank of the glandolinian column, and before the enemies of god could bring their guns to bear, he was in full play upon them with his own artillery. Their cavalry as well as artillery fell back and retired across the fields but firing incessantly as they retreated.

Now the intrenchments were to be forced, this was done in true backwoods style by the fierce Abbieannians. Each man rushed on and fought on his own responsibility, some rode along the intrenchments seeking a place to enter, while others rushed up close to pick off the defenders. The glandolinians fled from the presence of their desperate assailants, who leaped over the works and secured every place within reach. Meanwhile a party of horse men crossed the field to storm on horseback a battery which crowned the hill on the opposite side. The enemy again completely routed abandoned everything the officers fled toward the south, and the common cannon soldiers to the mountains.

Despite this success of the Abbieannians the Abbieannian general cannonia had been duped, for though beaten this and again during the fearful battle cannonia devoted all his energies to arouse the war spirit of his soldiers, called upon them again and again to rally under his banner, and save their nationality, issued flaming manifestos expressing the most intense hatred of all christian nations, and his indignations at the wrongs imposed on his country by the 'perfidious Angelinians and Abbieannians. Within an hour more cannonia had a new force of 23,000,000 concentrated along his broken centre. Meanwhile general Wool had marched San Antonio's forces to resume the attack, his indefatigable labors, having converted the soldiers under his care into well drilled soldiers. The slight cessation of hostilities ceased at four thirty o'clock, and now the battle was resumed with mightier violence. General Wooler took possession of gaitillio's works after desperation of charges, and general Tyler himself attacked Tampico's immense battery but was repulsed. The cannonading from the fierce glandolinian batteries was more incessant than before, the glandolinians firing every gun and mortar that could be brought to bear on the Abbieannian positions.

Some of the christian fleets steamed down the Mc-Holleston Run river, and with their own heavy guns added to the frightful uproar, other christian batteries were brought and batteries erected within a thousand yards of the glandolinian position and who can imagine how terrific was this artillery storm. Twenty one thousand heavy guns poured forth an incessant storm of high explosives and shrapnell, the heavy explosive explosions tore gaps in the Abbieannian intrenchments, and crashed through the lines of infantry terrible hundreds of big gaps, while the rattling storm of shells explosions still more terrible scattered ruin and death everywhere, and burned everything thing that would burn. With out any intermission this horrid work continued, and all this while Santa Anna had been very active and he was already pressing forward with 30,000,000 Abbieannians sending forward Cerro Cordos great cavalry squadron, the whole position of the glandolinians was first reconnoitred, and the first general attack commenced by three grand divisions, sent to turn their position. The scene was now a roaring inferno of artillery and musketry. The battle was horrible. The whole front was smothered, the Abbieannians were killed by the foe, driving the foe from it, general El Telegrafo was killed but up the sides then they had rushed in a the face of a withering fire that threatened to sweep all before it, they even dragged up the heavy pieces of their own artillery during the assault and placed them upon the foe who retreated they threw shells like confetti. The glandolinian batteries played with greater vigor, but during this mortal cannonade general Harney now led his three new divisions rapidly down into the valley, between the hills also under a storm of shot and shell, and began to ascend the slopes toward the strong defenses on the top. The declivity was steep and rugged, and soon the entire fire of the battery was directed against these new assailants, but despite the havoc they kept on, without wavering, pressing up doggedly, until they presented themselves at last the strongest on the summit. General Yaquez was killed, but undaunted the Abbieannians poured in a stream of balls, forced their way through the breastworks, and then charged with the bayonet, the glandolinians fleeing down the slope in the direction of cannonia's main line.

This glandolinian division was annihilated and scattered in all directions, this division had lost more than 1,000,000 men killed and wounded, 3,456,678 prisoners, five generals all their artillery and military stores. This was not obtained without a severe loss to the Abbieannians who in their rash and headlong charges in the face of overwhelming batteries, and well protected musketeers had lost four hundred and thirty one officers, and 8,745,333 in killed and wounded, of whom thirty three were great generals.

THE CONCLUSION OF THE BATTLE.

The main and strongest position of the glandolinian right wing assaulted all that day long was along the main section of the Mc-Holleston Run stream, to a capture which the Abbieannians of gineers stated would further cost the loss of three million lives.

General K Jimmie Vivian was indeed proverbially careful if the lives of his soldiers, the horrible sacrifice must be avoided. The vicinity of the army storming batteries of the enemy was reconnoitred in the most daring manner; and it was discovered that their defenses south and west were more strongly fortified than expected. The general diverted his course to the right and turned El Penon's forces on the south side, and under the direction of skillful engineers crossed chasms and ravines in the face of a withering deadly impasse; and therefore but imperfectly unguarded. General Twigg led the advance, worth followed took the lead, and with his divisions halted the glandelinian counter charge of San Augustin's glandelinians, where he found that a strong force of glandelinians were on the march round to the north side of the main christian line. Not so far away was the fortified camp under general Contreras, which contained sixteen million glandelinians, in the rear between the camp and the main line, were placed twelve million men in reserve, the whole number of glandelinians at the right wing being about 35,456,000, with nearly one hundred thousand pieces of artillery of various sizes. General Persifer Smithsonia proposed to attack Contreras camp, which was personally under the command of general Valencia. At five o'clock the assault started, the glandelinians were at paralyzing surprise still the furious attack effectually routed the first grand divisions, three million, three hundred thousand and sixty four of their number were made prisoners, eighty generals and three hundred and thirty five pieces of artillery, and among the latter were twenty two pieces taken by the foe at the early part of the battle, now recaptured by a portion of a regg regiments to which they originally belonged. Thus commenced the eventful part of the battle along the remaining glandelinian wing still standing its ground. --several conflicts were yet to rage. General Shields and Pierce threw their divisions between the captured positions, and with the help of Santa Anna drove back the main forces of Contreras, captured Churur booco, drove back fresh troops arriving to his assistance, and then attacked the remainder of the line which made a most desperate defense.

Ten convents were also defended at this point, these being very strong stone buildings well fortified, and pierced for muskets and cannon, also the bridges of over the river were well defended.

The shell fire of the christian batteries had flooded the region with smoke clouds, the fortifications masked by trees and corn were shelled, and the enemy's gun so arranged to sweep them perfectly were hammered at most vigorously. The first main line of the Abbeannians pressed the attack, the Abbeannian officers in the face of these batteries advancing to reconnoitre the ground, the men were rushing up on all points, the officers would again advance, and the same process was repeated, and during all this time, huge avenues were torn in the Abbeannian columns, can cannon balls and high explosives from the unseen enemy, and from the fire along the twenty mile long trenches, crashed through column after column spreading horrible destruction everywhere, officers fell by the score, yet as if impelled by some powerful influence, they moved steadily on until Churubusco works were in their hands. General Santa Anna sent Scott and Pillow round to the other side, these forces waded through the mud and blood in some instances waist deep, before they could reach the convents. Several divisions were entirely broken up by the artillery fire of the foe, general Taylor's artillery men were cut up, all of his thousands of horses were killed, the region was a blasting inferno, the glandelinians made a terrific counter charge, and were repulsed with murderous loss. The ground to the buildings was intercrossed and intersected by causeways, and so fierce was the enemy's fire that it was impossible to preserve military order, also owing to their ignorance of the position of the wicked wicked enemy, as well as their own, and the Abbeannians were in constant danger of being fired upon from every point. The battle raged furiously in every direction, and thousands upon thousands were dropping. General Worthington carried San Antonio's works but both generals fell dead at the same time as both sides suddenly opened a murderous withering fire, and generals Twigg and McPollester carrying another portion of the breastworks like fortresses were also killed and hundreds of thousands of their men shot down. The glandelinians fought bravely, obstinate, and with the utmost fury of determination and desperation, the Abbeannians were more than three to their one, and they met every effort to repel them, and what was before a scene like a inferno was now tenfold worse. The smoke completely enshrouded the positions of the enemy, the roar of their thirty million muskets, hundreds of thousands of cannon seemed to drown the roar of the distant christian artillery, and to render the din peculiarly terrific.

The Abbeannians could but feel their way through the corn, and across causeways and ditches, ignorant at what moment they would come upon a concealed battery. At length a division was enabled to cross the river, and presented themselves in the rear of the

At the present

Worthington's divisions emerged through the cornfields in their front, those in the rear rushed across ditches, and over the parapets and carried the works, while the glandelinians at the head of the bridges did not abandon them until threatened with annihilation, their guns were immediately seized and turned upon them, both the other divisions of Abbeannians pressing forward with the bayonet, the glandelinians recoiled in confusion, and finally fled, the dragons pursuing them to the very main line of works. The advantage was again won, but it had again cost the poor Abbeannians dear, another two million had fallen or had been disabled, among these were seventy six general officers. The coolness the indomitable courage and perseverance of both men and officers were never bettered in display. The ground was unknown, and they were thrown upon their own resources, there was no wavering, each one performed his part, and adapted himself to the emergency. In no battle did the glandelinians fight better; they struggled hard, and the number of their slain, wounded, and dying, and mission--nearly 7,899,999--testifies that they were brave and still still had hopes of conquering the christians at no matter what the forlorn costs.

Indignant at the continued violent resistance and treachery of the wicked glandelinians, general Vivian now ordered the army to press on and crush the foe at all costs. The other positions were immensely strong, and fortified, under general Molino Del Rey and another under Chapultepec which it was believed could not be turned, but must be taken, before the main line of the foe could be reached. It was resolved to capture general Molino Del Rey's position and so the attack was launched forward with redoubled fury against it, two thousand twenty four pounders, opening at the same time and sending their balls through the glandelinian columns, and then the foe guns opened in reply a poor pouring grape and shot, and shells upon the flank of the advancing Abbeannians. The effect of the glandelinian guns were indeed terrible, for in a few minutes the front of the whole Abbeannian advance was cut down, of fourteen fresh generals eleven were either killed or wounded, and a horrible proportion of the men. The first grand division was forced to fall back, and the glandelinians as usual with savage ferocity hurled themselves forward in a counter charge but they were massacred with savage ferocity. Santa Anna ordered forward other great divisions, and these were seconded by another grand division, who vigorously attacked the glandelinian flank. Though exposed to a cross fire, which did fearful execution, these all fought desperately, it would seem seen the idea of retreating from the face of such overwhelming odds never occurred to the glandelinians, they held on to their positions, while the Abbeannians steadily advanced. Simultaneously general Leon led a strong assault upon Molino Del Rey's line, but it was driven back with frightful and destruction, Leon was mortally wounded, and three generals of other high rank were slain. The attack was continued in a fearful manner, the assailants sought in various ways to gain access to the enemy, they crept along the ground and fired upon the works, climbed to the top of the parapet in the face of the desperate defenders, and tore down the glandelinian infantry columns with their galling musketry fire, ripped up the works, with their hands or pried into the columns with their thumb of bayonets, and at length broke through the glandelinian front on the left of the main wing, and engaged in close combat the slaughter now being fearful. The glandelinians did not yield but continued to fire with utmost deliberation, the Abbeannians burst through column after column, meeting the enemy hand to hand with the bayonet, or firing face to face. In a few minutes the northwest portion of the works was in like manner forced, but the foe did not give way at any point, and so horrible was the fighting that it resembled a great massacre. The Abbeannians were in numbers three to one against the glandelinians who nevertheless held a very strong position, the Abbeannians had scarcely any aid from their heavy cannons at this point, and were forced to depend solely upon their rifles and muskets. Still they carried portions of the works, captured eight hundred thousand of the prisoners, and lost themselves over 7,777,995 more men in killed and wounded, of whom fifty nine were officers nearly one fourth of all the officers engaged in the battle at this point. The loss of so many men shed a cloud over the whole nation.

Soon however the full force of all the captured cannon was concentrated upon the remainder of the strong glandelinian position, storming parties while pouring in a withering fire of musketry all the while were anxiously waiting for a breach to be made, by which they might carry it by assault, grouping their way from tree to tree, and rock to rock, driving the glandelinians steadily before them, but suddenly on the crest of the remaining works, the remaining force of the foe frowned the position with cannon and musketry. The Abbeannians approached cautiously, but still drawing nearer and nearer, the positions were taken in succession, presently an ensign bearing the standard of God's Holy Church rushed forward to the rampart a tremendous shout arose along the whole Abbieannian line, the whole christ inn forces bounded over, the battle was over. The glandelinians overhauled stood but a few minutes more, then scrambled from the works and retreated in amazing confusion. The provocations of the Abbieannians had been great for at the beginning of the war for themselves they had seen their wounded companions found on the battle field barbarously murdered by the foe, the reason why they ruthlessly slaughtered the glandelinians with their bayonets, when again disarmed or helplessly wounded. The whole battle field was a mass of bodies, ruin desolation, so effective had been the extensive storm of shot shell and high explosives, that the whole Mc-Pollister gun region within the space of the battle field was battered to pieces. The foe had been fairly scattered and were in rout for the boundary line of Angolinia, for now all the northern parts, southeastern, and western parts of Galverinia were entire ly free from the foe, and general Gormaine, Vivian, and his brother were bound to drive all the glandelinians out as soon as possible.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF THE FORTIFICATIONS OF ANNIE ARONBURG... January 28

From the very beginning of the horrible war the long line of fortifications called by the name of the murdered child in honor of her heroism during the child slave rebellion was the subject of much anxiety of the whole entire world, for they knew that if these fortifications in the hands of the foe could not be taken, the war would be won on the side of the foe and all the lost ground in Galverinia gained once more. At the necks of the rivers of Fortonia and Belmont-Belmontie general Gormaine unopposed by the Abbiean nians there had been for weeks fortifying points all along the line in front of these fortifications, and these prepared to attack Annie Aronburg if not surrendered, though also it was the purpose of the Abbieannian commander not to give any quarter. General Manley further away a o along the Angolinian and Calvinian boundary line had sent a messenger to inform general Pivkness of his intentions of sending provisions and reinforcements to the storming fortifications, and thus alarmed the Abbieannians and made them impatient to bombard the fortifications before the reinforcements arrived.

Mansonia then demanded the surrender of the for tifications, and the glandelinian commander harshly and insultingly refused to surrender his thrust, incidentally remarking to those who demand ed the surrender that God himself could not force him to surrender the fort ifications and told the Abbieannian commander "To go to Hell."

This insult enraged the Abbieannian general, he ordered the bombard ment to begin right away and on the following evening five batteries each consisting of a thousand guns were already throwing a rain of shot and shell upon the fortifications, but so vigorous were the discharges from these fortifications, that the Abbieannians thought the fortifications must have been reinforced. All of the glandelinians were inspired with their patriotic zeal, even some common laborers joined in with their native ardor for a fight. The firing was indeed terrific, red hot balls were even added which set the barracks on fire, blew up one magazine and en dangered another, so to avoid further damage and danger many hundreds of barrels of powder were rolled into the sea. The heat and smoke began to become stifling, yet the brave glandelinians fought on breathing through wet cloths.

In the meantime a powerful fleet of battle ships were steaming down the river, this flotilla joining the fleets of the mouth passes of the Eminia gun. Admiral Zimmerman who though wounded still remained commander took charge of the whole armament, and Mc-Pollister under him had control of the motor boats. The whole fleet and transports soon passed within the passes, and gunboats acted as pickets up the river, seized rams and other ironclads, and fire rafts--large barges three hundred sixty yars yards long laden with split pine over which had been poured melted pitch rendering them highly inflammable. One of the piggy Abbieannian ships carried Angolinian rifled guns. They had also a peculiar iron clad float floating battery, besides eighteen hundred armed steamers, many of which were protected by an armor of iron. The naval commander Francis Hollinger announced that he would annihilate the glandelinian fleet, and surprisingly did worse. An exceedingly strong chain was stretched on floats across the channel from one part of the Aronburg fortifications on the opposite shore, to the other side, near to another glandelinian fort called Belmont.

These series of fortifications, were very strong structures built by the A Abbieannian government before the war of eighteen fourteen one, just like those of Mc-Whie Mc-Whirther, but still stronger, and each portion of the fortifications being divided into five quarters was armed with 23,456 guns and fort Belmont had almost twice as many. In addition the enemy had flank ing batteries commanding the two rivers for ten miles, and also the approach to Lake Angeline.

Hearing the bombardment of the Abbieannians from the land side, and knowing what was going on Zimmerman anxious to do something, and still smarting from the humiliation he had received from the wicked glandelinian govern ment which caused him to turn traitor, moved to join in the attack.
 Then occurred one of the most terrible cannon battles on record.

Over a space of rolling surface for the distance of nearly a score of miles high explosives tore everything in to a mad chase, fourteen hundred Abbieannian dreadnaughts, threw immense shells from the western shores , and sixteen hundred of others on the eastern bank of the river in the swamp passages, and so covered by green bushes as to be well masked, , sixteen hundred other ships of war, and thousands of gunboats, and steam submarines, and torpedo boat destroyers up and down the stream and even steamers took part in the thunderous fray, while the fortifications repelled with the greatest vigor. The bombardment was fearful lasting four days, glandelinian fleets steamed with to oppose and smash the Abbieannian warships and poured broadsides by the score per minute every ship taking part, greater fires broke out than any ever seen during the bombardment of the Mc-Wi Whirther fortifications, the guns in the embrasures of the fortifications of Belmont were silenced, and also the last line of guns on the rear rear of the Annie Aronburg fortifications. Meanwhile Hollinger sent down scores upon scores of the fire rafts in the midst of the battle, and though many of these were destroyed by the shells of the forts or towed out of the way by glandelinian ships they set fire to the fortifications of Belmont and the woods near by and the scene became terrific.

All of the ships now hammered with redoubled fury, throwing a perfect rattling storm of scores of thousands of shells into the Annie Aronburg fortifications, which interfered materially with their firing, the whole entire fleets passing back and forth continually pouring their most fearful broadsides. All the while the glandelinian ships trying again and again to stop the attack on the forts found themselves in the midst of the hostile iron clads and rams, the latter butting in every direction, ships went down by tens, and though the glandelinian gunboats were able to dodge them and pay them the compliment of a series of broadsides they were overtaken and sunk one by one. The Abbieannian battleship the Queen a swift vessel passing through compelled twenty glandelinian ships single handed to strike their flags, after being torn to pieces for a spirited resistance.
 The rams under admiral Mansassie, were running round butting at every ship in the way, ten glandelinian ships ran afoul of these rams and though they gave broadsides they finally were sunk by the rams. All around the glande linian fleet found itself in a nest of Abbieannian warships and armored steamers, which fired broadsides after broadsides right and left, the first broadside of forty Abbieannian ships went into thirty glandelinian ships crowded with marines and sailors, exploded their boilers, torn the bulwarks and sending cabin after cabin flying into the air, broad every mast down by the board, and were driven ashore on fire, simultaneously three glandelinian dreadnaughts were driven ashore in a mass of flames and blown up. The glande linian ship the Varuna was attacked by an Abbieannian iron clad ram which raked her with terrible carnage, and battered her on the quarter, but this glandelinian ship in the meantime managed to plant thirty eight inch shells in the armor of her foe, and a rifle shot, but for revenge the ram with prow under water, struck the Varuna in the port gangway, doing terrible damage, then her enemy drew off and made another plunge, and struck again in the same place, crushing in her sides, now the Varuna gave her ferocious antagonist five eight inch shells, these settled her, and this one Abbieannian ship floated ashore in flames. The Varuna herself in a sinking condition was towed ashore, and all along the river banks were stranded glandelinian warships, and armored steamers and rams, nearly all on fire from Abbieannian shots and shells, none of the ships had ever escaped while only three Abbieannian ships had been only damaged.

There was only one glandelinian ship left to oppose the Abbieannians and she was a giant. This ship had a heavy armament of many hundreds of 10 inch guns, and she poured in her broadsides with precision
 , but these heavy balls and shells did small damage to her assailant
 , while from the Abbieannian ship the shells and balls tore through the glandelinian ship committing horrible damage.

The immense crew of the glandolinian ship fought desperately, warping round their vessel to give effective broadsides, but presently the ram which assailed it, rushed in full speed upon the glandolinian ship and peirc'd her hull below the water line, making a hole forty feet in diameter, and crush'ing in the battleships upper decks, still pouring in shells, sh solid shot and adding it by canister making a horrible slaughter on the crowded decks. Of the 10,000 men on board not a man wavered in this presence of death their vessel was fast filling, in five minutes the water reached the berth decks, where lay the wounded and dying, and though more than 3,456 of these brave persons perished, the remains kept on fighting until the ship gave a lurch and disappeared under the water. The remainder who were not drowned were picked up by boats which put off from shore. After the four weeks bombardment, it was seen that the main way to force the Annie Aaronburg fortifications was by land assaults. General confederate of the foe anticipating the movements of the Abbieannians during the thr third week of the bombardment by sending 1,000,000 troops in three divisions to seize the heights around the fortifications, and fortify them. The Mo-Holleston and Panroas railroad was seized and on it a train having on board 3,000 Abbieannians was captured, but not the Abbieannians who fought with such devilish fury and savagery that they all escaped without the loss of a man in killed or wounded, and fully slew 45,000 glandolinians out of the 50,000 who made the attack. Again this showed the fury of the Abbieannians Alexandria was also occupied by the foe but retaken by the menance of an overwhelming force of Abbieannians.

General Hansonia resolved by a night movement to surprise and capture two positions during the bombardment by attacking with infantry, and the plan being well arranged the troops set out on the march in order to attack the positions by daylight. But at night two divisions of Abbieannians and three divisions of glandolinians came into collision and though both sides fought with the savage fury the Abbieannians did at the train, the glandolinians escaped with small loss, and this firing giving information of the approach of the Abbieannian attack against their redoubts hastily retreated to the larger position. Meantime the other portion of the glandolinian force hearing the firing fell back lest they should be taken in the flank. In the morning the Abbieannians came together, a conference was held, and it was determined to attack the fortified position on the hill whose guns commanded the approach. The attack was a tremendous one, and though the result was a repulse, the soldiers stood the fire well, and resumed the assault with redoubled fur' fury, and here fell two of the most accomplished men in the command of the Abbieannians, general ganta Grebelio, and Theodore Wentreia both of whom were killed.

The attack was so violent however that the glandolinians after a defence for a whole day retreated, while at the same time, general Hansonia made a strong demonstration in front, while a large force of his men by a flank movement grouped their way through the jungle and to the top of the hill, and with a daring shout rushed on the enemy, captured twenty of the enemys guns and carried all before them. General garnett pilfiman of the enemy behaved with great bravery but presently fell pierced by a shell fragment, and his men panic stricken fell in the wildest confusion and reaching the big column of reserves in the rear, the panic failed to be communicated to the rear, and they having it taken a strong position refused to retreat and poured in a fearful withering fire.

Phillips line was forced however, his division being scattered after a spirited fight by the Abbieannians, they leaving all their ammunition, but however they made a sternious but unsuccessful attempt to recover their lost ground. Already in the assault upon y this position the glandolinian losses in those conflicts was about 1,500,000 killed wounded and prisoners, while the Abbieannian loss was only 200,000 thousand in killed and 600,000 wounded. Now the next day while the bombardments were again in progress preparations by the main Abbieannian armies were made to advance, and these under Pattersonia, and those under Mo-Gelliania, the extreme right, and the forces under Bendonia extending along the river, all were to advance, and gradually contract their lines around the fortifications. General Bendonia was to move direct upon the north wing of the fortifications on the railway twenty miles from Alexandria, an important strategic position held by the enemy. General Pattersonia had already moved upon Chambersburg lines in gray, and passed over the position, general Chambersburg having fallen back after serious resistance. At another point Chambersburg had a force of 15,000,000 Glandolinians well supplied with field artillery stationed in front of the fortifications. He a general Pattersonia attempted to press Chambersburg, and prevent him from reinforcing the other portion of the recently defeated forces on the hill, but in vain his assault after being waged four hours was horribly crushed and driven back for two miles. Bendonia determined to turn the enemys position at the fortifiand reach the Mo-Whirther railway, and thus intercept reinforcements from Winchester divisions, and though now Pattersonia was holding Chambersburg in check he could not advance and was urgently calling for reinforcements, and artillery support. So Bendonia made his arrangements to flank the enemy by crossing the region to the left wing of the fortifications, and these various divisions were soon crossing the fords, and now the contest became general, but desultory in the extreme. In different parts of the extensive fortifications the Glandolinians were driven from time to time, and would recover, batteries of cannon changed hands more than ten times, and the fortifications were riddled by a storm of bullets and on fire in many places. Finally the Abbieannians drove the enemy nearly two miles, but they were surprised and suddenly attacked by about 5,678,777 fresh troops fresh from Winchester army. At this crisis the other glandolinians and the garrison of the fortifications thus encouraged renewed the conflict with vigor, but division after division of Abbieannians were continually thrown upon them, again the glandolinian forces were thrown into confusion and though one division stood in the way and fought the Abbieannians gallantly, retarding the advance of the Abbieannians until those defending the works could retreat into the fort the could not hold long and after suffering the loss of 482,999 in killed, and 1,915,876 in wounded, they also retired, the first forces retreating having suffered the loss of 296,666 in killed and 1,533,222 wounded. This success of the Abbieannians made known to the insurgents against god that the Abbieannians could never be checked by the hardest fighting.

B 37

The assaults on the fortifications now started. A force of the enemy defended the line of barracks with the utmost determination, but after a few hours they fled to the fortifications, the Abbieannians scattering their rain of shells upon the fortifications in all directions. About 45,000 more of the desperate glandolinians were killed, the barracks were all on fire, and a great number were taken prisoners. Jacksonia Price fled toward the centre fortifications and now the Abbieannians pressed against the fortifications in a general assault. The garthage fortifications were the first assaulted, the garrison here numbering 5, 5,500,000 and a fa battery of 5,000 guns, and the Abbieannian force of 10,500,000 men and eighty thousand guns, twl twelve hundred of which were centenneters reduced the fortifications of garthage into ruins: the centre guns of the enemy were soon silenced, but for a time the Glandolinians held the Abbieannians in check pouring in shells and canister, while the glandolinian cavali began to outflank the concentric ians, and the insurgents being reinforced with 5,678,666 more men tried their best to drive back the assault entirely but met with terrible slaughter.

In the meantime the entire Abbieannian force was moving forward to the attack, and thus now one of the fiercest battles in the war for the possession of fortifications began, and after excruciating losses the enemy were driven from the fortifications of garthage. General padonia greatly exposed himself and was wounded three times but he retained his command. The enemy rallied and made a most desperate effort to regain what they had lost but were most severely repulsed by the cool determination of the Abbieannians, who lying close on the brow of the mound of extensive ruins in the rear of the fortifications let their foe come within forty three feet of them and tearing their line down with a murderous fire. The survivors recoiled in utmost confusion, but they made another severe attempt with redoubled fury, the enemy reached the position, and fired furiously before their second bloody repulse and in this die discharge padonia was kil'd killed, and the fortifications was once again captured.

263,721 more of the foe had been killed, and 2,345,678 wounded, while of the Abbieannians, 421,789 were slain, and more than 3,456,000 wounded. Meantime General Sigel was successful in driving the enemy before him and capturing the Sigel fortifications, but was at length greatly outnumbered by encountering a large force in his front, and compelled to retreat, but the enemy lost five thousand cannons, twenty of wnt which the soldiers spiked, and general Lexingtonia Mulligania of the glandolinian brigade, being surrounded by 10,000,000 Abbieannians and def after defending his position in most heroic manner with his 2,640,000 men was compelled to surrender, and though orders had been passed that no glandolinians were to be spared, they were nevertheless not massacred, but held as criminals and sentenced as prisoners for life.

Simultaneously the Abbieannians endeavored to gain the virginian fortifications, sending the forces under Henry A. Wiser, but the latter was defeated, his men leaving all their munitions except what they could carry. General Lee Robertson also made a desperate attempt with 9,876,555 men but after several conflicts was also defeated. At the same time the Glandolinians under general Evans made a flight of evacuating the Leesburg fortifications, in order to draw a force of Abbieannians into an ambushade.

But not so, a force of glandelinians under general Bakerson itself fell into a trap. Then occurred a most terrific part of that day's battle for the fortifications, and slaughter compared with the numbers engaged, and this disaster to the glandelinians was the saddest of the war. The force of 3,456,665 glandelinians with ten of their generals met annihilation, those surrendering were shot or cut down, and prisoners taken, were annihilated without mercy. It was a fearful disaster indeed, and simultaneously, the Hattassor fortifications were opened on by the fleets of warships, the fortifications replying wildly, and with spirit, the cannonading making a rolling drum drum crash that was incessant, the ships pouring in their storm of shot and shell, le literally tearing this part of the main fortifications to pieces, the land forces having already occupying the fortifications of Clark, more than 6000 - 600,000 prisoners were taken, while at this point of the battle as yet not a Abbeannian soldier was injured.

The vessels in assaulting the fortifications had moved in an ellipse, pouring in a deadly fire of shells and explosives, mingled with solid shot simultaneously paying their respects to the fortifications on the other side, the glandelinians could not stand the storm on the fortifications of Logan, and leaving everything fled to the woods. The Abbeannians here captured about forty thousand pieces of ordnance, mostly of the heaviest calibre of and of the most approved patterns and an immense quantity of munition ammunition. After the capture of these part of the fortifications the enemy began to burn the abandoned property, lest it should fall into the hands of the Abbeannians, and that night the whole heavy heavens were lighted up for scores of miles by the biggest of fires raging at this part of galverinia.

Indeed the battle for the possession of these fortifications was the most tremendous ever witnessed especially for any capture of any given fort....

While all the other assaults had been going on general Belmont with about 33,567,666 Abbeannians aboard steamers, and escorted by gunboats and warships which were shelling the fortifications by water, the christian soldiers landed about four miles above the fortifications, and at once took up their march to join in the fray, and soon falling in with a force of the enemy which had been advancing to reinforce the besieged garrison at the fortifications and drove them foot by foot, and from the tree to tree back to their encampment on the river edge, a distance of over three miles, as they drew nearer, suddenly was heard severer firing and cheers on the rear of the enemy. The D goncentinians under general

Napoleon, had made a rapid detour, and were now closing in, a combined movement was made upon three sides of the enemy's camps and works, which were soon in possession of the Abbeannian forces, the wicked enemies of god passing over the river banks, and into their transports in quick time. The Abbeannians destroyed all the munition and property of the camp, then the glandelinians under Joseph and Jimmie Daniels sent fresh troops to attack the Abbeannians and recapture the camp but without success and after a hard fought battle for the rest of the day were repulsed at all points, with a loss of 7,500,888. The Abbeannians in this part of the engagement lost 84,000 killed, and 298,654 wounded, and the total loss of the enemy in the entire battle was never intirely known.

The Abbeannians during the following night and while the bombardment was still raging, had taken possession of the Grinnin Run Gap, to prevent the glandelinian forces from being aided by fresh troops from any other glandelinian army that might be approaching.

General Franklina had now assumed command of the whole army besieging the fortifications, and he threw his main grand division toward the eastern portion of the fortifications, an important and strategic point, and it was his intention to move forward the next morning, and by a strenuous effort, it was expected to drive the foe from the fortifications the next day. During the whole night hundreds of severe skirmishes had taken place, in which the Abbeannians had been worsted every time, and driven from point to point, but finally in the morning general powling Greenia and Franklina made a tremendous attack upon the eastern fortifications, driving in the glandelinian pickets. Resistance however was horribly terrific and word was speedily given that the enemy were defending the fortifications in great force, and in less than an hour the whole grand division was making an attack though the desperate fire of the glandelinian continually held them in check. The conflict was now terribly severe, and the two immense opposing lines wavered back and forth for hours. The glandelinians had protected themselves by an exten orized bulwarks of palisades and fence rails in front of the eastern line of fortifications, and while between them and the woods where the Abbeannian soldiers were was a large open field.

General Jimmie Vivian determined to capture these defenses and the eastern line of fortifications, and he ordered the first line of the grand division all Goncentinians to fix bayonets, and then moving along the front he shouted;

"My invincible Goncentinians, charge."

A few minutes afterwards the whole line was in the open field, and with shouts rushed upon the enemy, who lingered for a moment as if bet bewildered, and then fled. The Abbeannian troops with cheers advanced w the whole line, and the glandelinian defeat was complete, nor did the Abbeannians stop until they reached the fortifications, eight miles distant. Then after a slight halt the Abbeannians pushed on, and late in the morning commenced a heavier cannonade upon the fortifications, then after desperate fighting the ramparts were scaled, the enemy fleeing, leaving everything in the fort, their commander general J Zollicoffer Francis was killed, and the glandelinian camps completely demoralized abandoned the east eastern fortifications, the way was now open for the bombardment and capture of the remainder of the fortifications, and so the battle resumed with greater fury.

The total number of the glandelinian army defending the fortifications was, infantry, 23,568,393, cavalry, 4,559,398; artillery, 24,586, rifles and sharpshooters, 88,395; engineers, 107,000, while in the aggregate, 660,971 were captured out of those in the camp sent to reinforce the garrison, of which, 23,334 had been of the regular army. The entire Abbeannian army besieging these fortifications numbered about 56,350,000 men.

Another force of Abbeannians was also coming 30,000,000 strong, and reinforcements which had sorely distracted the enemy, by both land and water, ascertained the positions of their forces.

The entire line of woods to the rear of the fortifications and along side were also searched and shelled by the Abbeannian warships, and now general Jimmie Vivian growing impatient at the long resistance of the foe, moved to throw his main divisions on the fields and roads leading to the remaining portions of the fortifications still in the hands of the enemy.

General Root and Greathart also moved at the same time, the warships simultaneously took their positions closer, and threw a hurricane of shells, and high explosives, into the fortifications, and then approached nearer and nearer, and now so terrible was the storm that earthworks crumpled away, the barracks were shattered to splinters, and nearly one half of the guns of the western line of fortifications were dismounted, and after hellish resistance the infantry supports of the artillery fled, the glandelinian flag was hauled down, and this portion of the fortifications surrendered unconditionally. Only 130,000 prisoners were secured, the remainder escaped, as the Abbeannian forces were not as yet in position to capture them, for true to his expectation Jimmie Vivian had subdued this portion of the fortifications in one hour and fifteen minutes. A The astonishment at the simultaneous success of the warships was as great among the army and the officers, as the whole scale dread, which they had inspired the glandelinians. Unfortunately the magazine of the St Annie was struck by a shell, and the explosion of both the shell and magazine annihilated the whole crew of the ship all of whom were killed instantly, but otherwise no other boats were injured.

General Vivian sent warships in pursuit of the glandelinian warships, which they overtook and captured or destroyed, and also transports laden with supplies for the enemy, ascending the entire river for one hundred miles in one day making clean work of all war material on the river.

The glandelinians in the meantime deemed it of the greatest importance to hold firmly the centre portions of the fortifications not yet abandoned. Thither general John Manley though in glandelinia had sent troops under Floyd Jucker, and Guckner, the former having chief command. This main portion of the fortifications stood on a gradually rising line of small hills, or plateau, and contained about forty thousand acres. The crest of these series of plateaus contained or was encircled by cannons, and rifle pits, and all kinds of artillery commanded every approach, and so it was deemed impregnable by the wicked enemy of god.

West and south of the centre fortifications were hills densely wooded, and filled with ravines, which the foe had fired to prevent the christians from assailing them from that quarter, and the burning woods made a tremendous display for a conflagration.

The day before the last of the engagement were the fiercest artillery duels of the long four weeks conflict. Even sharpshooters by millions on both sides were busy, desperate sorties, and general assaults by the enemy were shattered, and repulsed, and an equally desperate attempt to capture a strong battery that annoyed the Abbeannian army, was made by Jimmie Vivian's order, but after a heroic effort lasting all that day with bloody losses to both sides failed.

The a main bombardment of the fortifications on the center commenced on the last day, and for more than an hour the battle had raged already with the greatest savagery. Soon only two of the enemy's guns were able to reply, which when a chance shot out the tiller chain of the Abbeannian ship called the Virgin Mary. The ship veered round and exposed her side, and another another shot broke the rudder post, and she was carried helplessly down the stream. Encouraged by this mishap the enemy directed all their fire on the fleet, a heavy battery on the hill joining in. Two other ships were soon as helpless as the Virgin Mary, their side wheels being broken by a shell and they too floated down the stream having been struck four hundred and fifty times.

Meantime the enemy became alarmed lest they should be so hemmed in that they could not escape, and they resolved to cut their way by dislodging their besiegers. According at noon on the last day of the fight, they moved out in the three divisions, intending to converge to one point of attack on the Abbeannian right next to the river, but they unexpectedly found the Abbeannian army prepared in front of their own earthworks, and before they were formed in line of battle, they were severely attacked and held in check, but only to make another desperate attempt, and thus on the south side of the fortifications the conflict raged with bloody fury for five hours.

Division after division of these experienced Abbeannian soldiers, took their places and remained till their ammunition was exhausted, and they were relieved by fresh troops. Many of these when their cartridges failed, begged to be led in a bayonet charge against the enemy, such being the spirit of the army. The battle for the most part was fought in a forest with a dense undergrowth, which much impeded rapid movements. The glandelinians thus far had made desperate aggressive attempts, and now General Vivian ordered his forces to carry the glandelinian positions by a final assault. This was most handsomely done, the enemy being driven at the point of the bayonet to the inner works and from them, while simultaneously, on the other portion of the Abbeannian line, a similar assault was made with the same result. The Abbeannian army then held all their advanced positions during the night, and were preparing to renew the attack in the morning. The gloomy night was passed in bringing within the Abbeannian lines, the wounded scattered over a space of a score of miles. There was evidently commotion in the enemy's camp. In the morning when the Abbeannian forces advanced in the daylight to the assault, numerous muskets were held up along their ramparts, displaying white flags. The advance halted, many red flags were displayed by the Abbeannians as signs of no quarter, but the generals decided to spare the prisoners, and General Tucker desired to negotiate. He was left in command, the other glandelinian generals with their armies had slipped off up the river with some of their divisions, on board transports, and left Tucker to bear the stigma of surrendering.

He wished for an armistice and terms of capitulation, but General Vivian refused the request, wishing only an immediate and unconditional surrender, as he was proposed to move immediately on the works. Tucker at once surrendered, the number of prisoners being nearly 14,000,000, and their killed and wounded found within the centre fortifications being about 1,300,000, and all weapons and military stores an immense amount was captured, and to add to it all the glandelinian fugitives on the transports were overtaken and captured none escaping. This tremendous Abbeannian victory sent dismay into the glandelinians, while the rejoicings in Calverinia, Abbeannian, and Angolina was great.

THE RESULTS OF FIVE OTHER DESPERATE BATTLES.....

On the Calverinian coast, a naval and land expedition under Williams Burger Zimmermann, and general A.E. Vivian was fitted and started out against the positions of Logan Richardson on the close scene of the Organ of the River Run battle-- and to make a demonstration on the coast of Angolina, to encourage the Angolinians, and also create a diversion south of the city of Angoline and Aronburg. In approaching the St Lawrence sound, the glandelinian fleet and an earthwork known as fort parton were encountered, the enemy's fleet after three days battles and a cannonading that surprised the world and fairly shook the coast for a thousand miles, finally retired torn in pieces, and Zimmermann opened his guns upon the fortifications, but was not able to reduce it despite a bombardment of three more days. During the night after the third day after however the Abbeannian troops landed, and in the morning under general Osterline, moved to the attack over a swampy and difficult way. On the march they came upon a strong battery, protected by a swamp on either side, Osterline flanked the battery right and left, and when the Abbeannian soldiers came out 300 their rear flanks, the enemy after desperate fighting threw down their arms and fled....

This success was followed up, and their entire force--about 3,000,000--on the island of Calverinia was captured. Another most important battle and capture on the Brimble Run River was the capture of St Tracina which was also accomplished by a combined land and naval force. The troops landed 13 miles below the town, and marched up the roads and through the fields along the river banks, and a railway line from garnardson, the warships by their rain of shells keeping the enemy at a very respectful distance. About three miles below the small town was found a formidable field work which promised to offer much resistance. This fortification was also flanked by a swamp, and general Jacob Baldwin sent a large force round, while he pressed the enemy heavily in front, the detachments appeared on the flank, but the glandelinians held their ground with utmost determination, untill a constant caviary force, followed by infantry on the gallop and run, charged with irresistible fury and changed the tide of battle, other Abbeannian troops pressed on, and the rout became complete. A portion of the fleeing enemy reached a train of cars, gave fierce resistance here, while some others carried the news to the main camp, burning a bridge and all the stores and furniture, and the steamers at the wharf, two of which were saved by the Abbeannian gunboats. The enemy had vainly set the town on fire, but the citizens with the aid of the Abbeannian marines succeeded in putting it out, though not untill the best hotels, and the large courthouse, and many private residences, and great churches were consumed. Three other places were captured, such as Meldon, and the fortifications on the Washontonia and Pacific River but without a battle as the enemy fled at the approach of the Christians. Fort Maconia a strong fortification built by the Abbeannian government, and now in the hands of the foe and which protected the harbor of La Lake Angoline, was reduced after a bombardment of eleven hours and a half. This secured the blockading Abbeannian fleet one of the finest and safest harbors on the Calverinian coast. Simultaneously generals Curtiss, and Halleck-Pice, and Rains were directed by General Vivian to drive Shoemuckers glandelinians out of Calverinia. Curtiss was soon on the march toward Bondinia, where Shoemucker and his army had been for some time. The latter took the alarm, and hastily retreated, south, Curtiss pursuing, and the enemy retreating, untill at length they reached the Imporia Mountains. Curtiss learned that the glandelinians were concentrating against him under general Dornier Van, who whose army numbered 34,000,000 men, of these Mc-Cullough Bonnie had 13,000,000--outnumbering the Abbeannian army four to one. These made attacks of great violence on the various Abbeannian positions as they came up, but were always repulsed. At length the next day they concentrated at Nelly plige, and again the enemy advanced to give battle, which raged all day on the right of the Abbeannian right and left without a cessation. The ground was hilly and covered with thick underbrush, and broken up by ravines. These ravines later were filled with the dead and wounded of both sides. On the left wing and center the struggle was equally stubborn, but more varied in result. Mc-Cullough Bonnie made a most desperate assault upon general Ostermauser, but Curtiss ordered up Davids forces to the generals aid, and the combined force drove the enemy headlong from the field, they leaving their dead commanding general Mc-Intimotor, and Mc-Cullough Bonnie, the latter the master spirit of their army. Success had also crowned the left wing. The center had been unengaged. During the night both armies lay on their arms, the Abbeannians soldiers resting for the first time in thirty days marching. At sunrise the battle was renewed, and raged most of the day along the whole line with the greatest violence, nearly thirty miles, general pandorbedine handling his artillery with wonderful rapidity and effect. Every desperate attempt to break the Abbeannian line was foiled. For more than two hours this continued when Single began to advance his part of the line into the enemy sought shelter in the woods, which they diverted into an inferno by their firing, but the Abbeannians in the face of this withering fire charged through the enemy's shelter, and drove them with the bayonet to an open field beyond, when they broke and fled in all directions. Thus ended the three days battle at Imporia Mountains. Never before had the joys of God suffered such a disastrous defeat. All this while the Abbeannian government never lost sight of the importance of the control of the Brimble River and to that end Admiral Zimmermann directed his attention in connection with a land force under general Mc-Hollister Pope. The enemy made the most strenuous efforts to retain their hold of this great Calverinian river as a most important source of supplies both beyond it and on its tributaries. The remaining positions on the northern portions of the Brimble river were designed by numbers. The glandelinians had chosen available points on the great river to fortify, such as the island of Blengigloemenan, opposite island number eighty four, Blenginia, and number eighty four itself all four within supporting distances. To this main island they had directed special attention, center their best engineer superintending the works and promoting its gunnery.

In consequence here were collected vast military stores and provisions as for a long siege. Admiral von Ziemer was to bombard the eighty four, and at the same time Pope to capture the other places. The latter found the town fortified by earthworks, and defended by three hundred dromedaries, added by a long chain of shore batteries on opposite sides, the riverbank swarmed with mines, and submarines, and it was seen that in the face of all these guns it was impossible to capture the town by direct assault. He therefore sent for siege guns. These soon came, and during the night they were placed within position within eight hundred yards of the enemy's main fortifications, and in the morning opened upon the astonished enemy, every shot telling with fine effect, dismounting a number of their heavy guns. The shots also reached their battle ships, submarines, and mines in the river, destroying the mines, and compelling the ships after a spirited cannonading of thirteen hours to hasten out of range, many badly battered and disabled. A night of storming infantry charges, and artillery duels came on with redoubled violence, but the glandolinians proved to be the masters and held firm repulsing every assault the Abissinians made with frightful decimation. For twenty days the island was bombarded, and assaults were numbered by the hundred, but each assault was decimated, and there was no break effected by the shell or storm on any of the works. But the heavy shelling had silenced all the glandolinian batteries along the river below, and by midnight of the same day Pope's army was across the river and pushing for Gondokoro to intercept the enemy fleeing from island eighty four, which place it was rumored they were evacuating. Early the next morning the island of eighty four surrendered to Admiral von Ziemer with 1,789 officers, 34,356,555 soldiers, 56,799 heavy cannons, ranging from 32 to 100 heavy pounders, and centerpieces and krupps guns, the latter rifled, and an immense amount of other military stores, twenty four steamers and three floating batteries.

Meanwhile Pope had intercepted the fleeing foe, who laid down their arms surrendering unconditionally as prisoners of war in all nearly 17,000,000. The three other points had also been taken without even a fight, and this defeat and loss, so many of which were abandoned even without a fight was a source of great mortification to the glandolinian authorities, and was equally a gratification to the loyal states of Alvorina which soon would be free from glandolinian invasion.

THE BATTLE OF FRAM.

Simultaneously to these happenings, Gannon who had recently been defeated at Elisabeth town had captured the place after a dash without a battle, and leaving the town marched for the Erindia river, which he reached about two hundred miles from the mouth of the Mc-Hollister gun running into the Erindia, at an obscure place of ten or eleven houses known as the village of Fram, but now famous in the annals of war, as it was the first bloodiest battle of the western theatre of war with these forces.

General Gannon soon after began the march, for two months the enemy under Mc-Hollister Pemberton had been concentrating here, and fortifying the hills in the immediate vicinity. General Christie Wilson was first in command, and Mc-Hollister second. At once the most strenuous efforts were made to resist the Abissinian army, Mawussasassa and St Vincent De Paul once occupied by the enemy were evacuated after desperate fighting of three days duration, the Abissinian lines drew up in heavier numbers, and in order to secure troops in this emergency general Pemberton Braggard, came up with well drilled Gargolians, and artillery, and Columbus evacuated before was retaken after frightful carnage, and general Polkerson bishop of the glandolinians trying to retake the other places suffered the shattering loss of 100,000 glandolinian troops, was himself killed, and general orner Van Spootle bringing up 15,000,000 glandolinians made a headlong assault upon the Christian right but was repulsed with indiscriminate slaughter in men and officers. The enemy then advanced in greater force, and under fury from their stronghold to meet Gannon's army at the crossing, and if possible to crush him before Hannson could bring up his Dowdorian forces. But the Abissinian army had crossed over, and was stationed in a semi-circle, the center in the front of the road to Beldon, the left extending round to the Erindia river, at Hamburger, fourteen miles distant.

The main glandolinian assault came with terrible violence, but all the most wildest fury of ravaging demons in the attack, the firing of musketry and cannons was terrific, and attacking the center the glandolinians extended their line by an oblique movement, and threw an overwhelming force upon the left, driving the Abissinian back through the rear and capturing general Godkinow, and his division almost entire.

They pressed on in the face of a withering fire extending for ten miles from the other line of Abissinians, turning to the left, but were held in check by three Conquistadorian divisions, till they were overpowered and forced to retire losing thirty three guns. General phormon Galtman, still in held of his line by the Erindia, until the enemy passed around his rear, when he fell back, took up a new position and devastated the glandolinian surge and drove back ten desperate assaults, but the enemy by main force drove the Abissinians left through their camp toward the river, but were at length held at bay for four hours by the pluck of general Aronburg and his troops. The glandolinians had planned not to attack, but in overwhelming numbers thus when they attacked the center they deployed their main force against the left. They well knew that if at all they must crush this advanced Abissinian force before Hannson could come up, or troops under general Wintonian and Thomas later could reach the field of battle. At ten p.m. o'clock there was a brief lull in the tremendous firing. The enemy fell back, apparently worsted, and then suddenly as if to take the Abissinians by surprise threw forward their whole force for the second time, with such fierceness and desperation that the Abissinian army was compelled to fall back. The Abissinian batteries had already taken in their own positions and sent with great rapidity their storm of shot and shell, the latter bursting amid the columns of the desperate glandolinians, hurrying death and destruction through the scrub-oak jungles, under whose cover they fought so bravely. In less than thirty minutes they had silenced a glandolinian battery. Just before these batteries opened fire Hannson's advanced division, appeared on the Abissinian right, and they successfully resisted the charge of the enemy, finding the advantage of his superior numbers, and continually reinforcements arrived for the Abissinian army, the remainder of Hannson's forces, Wintonian and Morris divisions, came on foot and came on steamers, ten batteries of the regular army, and Mc-Cook's divisions by a forced march, reaching the battle field by ten thirty. At quarter to eleven, about 38,000,000 Abissinians was advancing simultaneously against a glandolinian force of 45,000,000 men under their best generals, Mc-Hollister Pemberton, and others, and the best fighting material they had in the field, and in the face of the worse fire they had ever encountered, moved forward steadily steadily and forced the enemy step by step, from point to point, and though occasionally checked the Abissinian army moved steadily forward, their worse fire was as regular as clock-work, and the divisions though suffering wholesale losses sustained each other admirably. At length the enemy after repeated attempts to break through the Abissinian lines and failing, seemed to desist pair of success. For seven long hours they had fought most valiantly. General Hannson made the most strenuous exertions and exposed himself in his efforts to prevent his army falling back, and was successful, though the battle had ended with an Abissinian victory. The Abissinians lost in killed, 1,785,789; wounded 7,883,399, the glandolinians killed, 1,723,999; and wounded 12,012,736. The enemy for the most part were better protected by the dense woods, as they fought on ground of their own choosing and still their losses were heavier than the Christians. At night they fell back to their intrenchments at Beldon, which they also abandoned.

THE BATTLE OF DAVIS.....

During this time Admiral Aronburg and general Wintonian were working their way down the great Erindia river with their entire fleet of warships, capturing fortified places one after another with without a single battle, was delayed a few days at Fort Viviana and Chikadee bluffs. Here general Wintonian was ordered to join general Pemberton at Gorthin and Admiral Aronburg proceeded on his advance. Soon reaching the fortified town of Little Davis he was resisted, but defeated a glandolinian fleet of warships and iron clad, and armed steamers under Admiral Gannon, in a savage and desperate conflict of thirty minutes, in which ten ships were disabled and sunk on the side of the enemy, Fort Wrighter and Pillbox were abandoned by the enemy after a thunderous cannonading of forty hours, and this opened the way down to the town proper. The Abissinian fleet was joined by Admiral Abissinian Angolindian rafts of unique construction made out of powerful steamers and tug boats.

The whole fleet then swept forward to resume the attack, the battle resumed at long range, but the Angelinian rams passed rapidly by the Abbeamian ships and rained with great impetuosity into the midst of the glandelinian ships firing broadsides of heavy shot and shell right and left, and when opportunity offered they served playing the enemy with hot water by means of a hose of great power. Then came on the Abbeamian warships, and the result of this singular contest, was that only one of the glandelinian warships escaped, the others being sunk or blown up. In consequence of this destruction of their whole fleet, the town of Davis surrendered unconditionally.

The glandelinian then deemed it important to secure an important strategic point, being at the junction of the Mc-Hollister, Pandora, and the Benton Railroad, but that importance was gone as soon as the entire roads were cut, and little Davis in the hands of the Abbeamian forces. General Pemberton then moved on after the battle of Davis, and advanced into the vicinity of Gornithia, and though the enemy were at first leisurely carrying away their war material, and about to evacuate their stronghold they were taken by surprise, by general Pandora sent in pursuit, and about 2,345,478 were captured, out of 3,000,000 men.

The rest can not see how it is for the glandelinians to show fight against the Abbeamians, who were gaining battle after battle, and in no instance except three failing to accomplish their ultimate objects.

ENDING OF OTHER BATTLES. TEN OF THEM.

They had simultaneously met the sorted glandelinian armies, at P-Pon gidges, and drove them out of the region in a desperate conflict of three days duration, they captured the five forts, of Mc-Henryson, Donaldson, Aurantia, Meifort, Baum, and Henry Bargerlinia, in five sanguinary battles, opened up the Evangelina St. glars rivers in one desperate battle at Franklin, won the bloody battle of Angelina Aronburg, and then compelled the enemy to retire to Gornithia, which in turn they were made to abandon after four days horrible battle. Along the south galvulinian coast two other desperate battles had been fought, one at Gornithia, and another at Olsen, when after some had been captured and held on the glandelinian coast without any fighting there whatever, and an expedition against Calverton (Glandelinia) had been successful without a battle, the whole length of the Calverton river was held from northern to Angelinian ports still held in the possession of the foe, and from the mouth of the Ebnathia down to Angelina gun still in the possession of the foe also.

The twenty smaller battles.

In the meantime the glandelinian commander Jackson Meldon made a desperate dash at Ester, where general Everett True was in command, but after a few days skirmishing and fighting retired in the night up the Ebnathia valley destroying all the bridges on the route. General Lawler, Francis had been wounded on the Christian side during this slight engagement where the losses on both sides was only 14,000, but would not retire, though urged by his physician, and consequently his great exertions led to his death. The enemy had been for some time leisurely evacuating the regions of the Mc-Whirther Run, and transporting their war material by railway, to the southern Mc-Hollister gun without interference from the Angelinian or Abbeamian armies.

The glandelinian general Francis Mc-Hollister Johnston had over 44,000,000 men at Mc-Hollister Run, and Frannassan, and Jacksonia his aid had 6,000,000 in the Ebnathia Valley. John Johnston finally fell back behind the Ebnathia, leaving a more defensive position than the Mc-Hollister Run of which it is a branch.

Time passed on the enemy soon on, making a very bold front to declare the Abbeamian commander Everett True, and when he was ready to open with his siege guns upon Gornithia, it was discovered that the enemy was gone, their rear guard even far on its way toward the south. The Abbeamian warships passed up the river, conveying their transports, carrying Francis divisions to West St Ann twenty five miles above Gornithia where it arrived the next day.

The glandelinians in the meantime retired as best as they could on account of the rainy roads and fields, made so by pouring rain, which continued for thirty six hours, and halted to retard the pursuit at Kensington, twelve miles above Bunkonia, at which place extensive earthworks and positions had been thrown from time to time mostly by the labor of child slaves. About morning the next day the Abbeamian cavalry and dragoons overtook the glandelinian army, and ascertained their position, but imperfectly. Then Francis moved with his divisions, Francis Smith and Hooker Smith divisions soon after. The latter commenced the battle at 7 one half am. The struggle was desperate and at 10 A.M. the enemy endeavored to turn the Abbeamian left, but Hooker Smith persistently held his place, and for six hours the battle raged with the fury of desperation at this point, the mire being so deep that artillery could scarcely be handled. There was soon a lamentable loss in Christian officers, so terrific was the fire of the enemy, and general Summer Pentamerog who was nominally in command was disastrously wounded. Early in the afternoon ammunition began to fail Hooker Francis men. Messenger after messenger had been sent to urge on Mc-Hollister's divisions, which was retarded beyond precedent by the enemy's assaults upon his divisions from another portion of the field. Francis Smith and his brother Hooker Smith held their position by desperate bayonet charges alone, but it seemed to threaten a wholesale carnage too horrible to think of, to stand any longer owing to the lack of ammunition.

Shall we retire brother? said Francis to Hooker.
"No sir," said the latter. "If we must fall, I'll have some responsibility for it be made to answer, we cannot and will not leave this post."
"Just my view," said his brother.

Presently a hurrah was heard above the din, Mc-Hollister's forces having dispersed their assailants were coming headlong through the forest. Francis Smith moved his wounded arm, and shouted a welcome, and called to the new music band.

"Give us 'Onward Christian soldiers' boys," and a cheer of triumph rose along the whole line as these brave men moved to the conflict.
"On to the front," shouted Hooker Smith, and he knowing the ground led forward the divisions without a moment's delay. The enemy after heavy firing for a half hour fell back to their breastworks.

"Now for the charge boys," was shouted, and they rushed forward, and carried the rifle pits, and over ran the point of the bayonet, driving the foe back in confusion. Later on the enemy tried most desperately again and again, and still again to recover the position but were as often repulsed. In another part of the field were found two redoubts and a line of breastworks unoccupied, of these the Abbeamians under Everett True now setting up took possession. Soon the glandelinians discovered their loss, and made a determined effort to recover them. Hand Hooker began to retreat, and the foe rushed on to make a desperate assault. The Abbeamians at the proper moment, wheeled, and rapidly delivered forty eight deadly volleys, and then charged upon the surprised, enemy secured 500,000 prisoners, and scattered the remainder. Night came on, the Abbeamian soldiers remained on the field, sleeping for the most part on the muddy ground, without shelter or food. The main forces of Everett True arrived just as the battle was closed. During the night general Johnston withdrew from his defenses, and moved over to the south side of the Mc-Henry Run, leaving on the field his dead and wounded—about 567,909. General Averil pursued with a severely force, and captured a large number of prisoners. The Abbeamian army lost 14,435 killed, and 111,400, wounded the main glandelinian loss was smaller.

In the meantime general Fisher was destroying all the war material and ships to the amount of more than $10,000,000 and then retreated. But the Abbeamian ships in pursuit passed up the Mc-Whirther gun captured the batteries without the fight, and overtaking the fugitives seized ships and the whole army, though in retreat, several Christian soldiers, general Fisher was killed. The other battles were fought at St Ann, St. John, Michaelson, Frannassan, Delaney, Mattingale, St Thomas, St Martin, Shifter, Abbeamian, Mc-Hollister-Frannassan, Banks, Bunker, Frannassan, Shields, Johnston town, Mc-Gellan royal front, and warring Willow gun. These all were Christian victories, and the losses on both sides in all these latter battles were about 1,000,000.

During this process general Everett True was in the Ebnathia valley, his troops not exceeding 55,000,000, as he had been stripped of two divisions and one that of general Shields, sent to general a genuine Vivian at Bowling, the other John Brown to Virginia gun. General Johnston was sent and ordered by Manley with 47,000,000 men to pounce upon Everett True drive him out of the valley, make a demonstration upon Calverton, and delay the movements of the other approaching Christian armies.

General Everette True had a large force stationed at Royal Gorden to protect the people from roving glandelinian marauding. This force Gannonia prepared to attack, but warned by a contrahand, the glandelinian fell back without any action, withdrawing all the way toward Whiterock, where Everette True waited. The latter made his arrangements and at two o'clock, his troops, troops of artillery and baggage and hospital stores were on their march to the main Erminie. This retreat was one continued story of straggling, and some severe fighting. Everette True deserved credit, that with his limited force, he brought nearly all his train and men safely across the river, and then halted to dispute the passage. The glandelinian general Gannonia could not do confident and encouraged by this slight victory did not, however, for he heard that general Shields and Aberdeen, and even Gannonia's own army were coming to fall upon his rear, but escaped by great skill and joined Johnstonia, leaving accomplished nothing of importance, but lost by death general Ashby unquestionably the most important commander of all the glandelinian cavalry. In a few days Everette True was back again at his old post.

The advance of the Abbeannian army was slow, it did not reach the Erminie until the 15th of January, when the left wing somewhat in constant action passed the river at Mc-Hollester's Ferry to the south side, and the right wing remained on the north side, the whole line extending thirty miles to Mc-Hollester's run, and Johnnie's Harbor, the extreme right. To the army supply came on steamers. General Gannonia who had his division at pondina joined Everette True, the river itself being one of the most formidable obstacles that could be opposed to the march of an army, and the Abbeannian army lay in an exposed position from January 1st to 31st, the left wing south of this dangerous river, and the right wing, the bridges and pontoons were ready, and the entire right wing passed a portion of the river. A storm arised in the form of a heavy storm and hurricane, the river swamp became impassable for either and for this very storm the enemy had waited, and now they prepared a general storm of their own.

THE BATTLE OF SWAMPY RUN.

It came and for two days they attacked the left wing furiously. This battle is known as Swampy run or Grunnie run, one of the most bloody contests of the entire war raging on this section of Alvorina. Both armies displayed heroic bravery and obstinate fury. After repeated attempts the enemy were compelled to retire, and the right and center not as yet engaged yet wondered what the great noise had been for the last two days. Everette True seeing the peril of having the army divided by that dangerous river had given warning days before, of what the enemy evidently intended, and general Gannonia of his own responsibility passed the river from the north side on a temporary bridge, and by the presence of his troops the fortunes of the first day of the battle were saved, just when the enemy were almost successful in their most desperate assaults. These two generals handled their forces independently of each other, there was no supreme authority on the field, as Everette True was seven miles away. On the first day of the conflict the glandelinian loss was about 8,000,000, that of the Abbeannians 5,000,000. In this battle Mc-Hollester Johnstonia was severely wounded, and general Gannonia had to be appointed in his place to the command of the glandelinian army.

On the second day while the conflict had again been in progress the Abbeannian army despite the violence of the attack by the foe remained in its original position. The danger of the separating the two wings by the river was still the same, and general Gannonia did not fail to take advantage of the blunder. Everette True ignorant of the battle that was raging did not advance, and the enemy hurled 20,000,000 men to the assault with the most horrible violence, and the terrible banging of artillery, and crashing of musketry ever where on the battle field was so loud that if Everette True did not hear it he certainly must have been deaf. The glandelinians lost 100,000 men in killed at the start of the assault, the right wing of the Abbeannian army lay isolated on the north side of the Erminie, a tempting bait which general Gannonia was trying to secure. The glandelinian surge extending from the little Erminie rock, where its extreme right commenced to the big Erminie beyond pondina, on which its extreme left awaited swept forward making a most tremendous assault, that startled the Abbeannian leaders, and compelled them to send to Everette True for aid, and so fierce was the resistance that general Logan, after commanding the right of this big tidal wave of assault was killed, general Magruder Francis commanding the center was fatally wounded, and general A.P. Schloeder commanding the left was disabled, the divisions under Mc-Hollester Longstreet, and D.H. Till drawn up behind the first wave, and beyond the left, covered the tremendous charge, covering the movement, and aiding the turning movement of general Francis Logan. General Francis Logan had to make a long detour to attack the rear of the exposed right wing, and in the attack his army was almost decimated by the fire of artillery and musketry it encountered. Gannonia's own army seeing the large force of the enemy, and knowing the violence of the assault had himself fallen back to a strong position at a crossing of Grunnie Creek to which the enemy soon came up and endeavored to cross by the two bridges, but were severely repulsed from both one after the other, the enemy losing between three or four million, the Abbeannians much less. The way was open, and now two more glandelinian divisions under Porter moved around the Abbeannian right to unite with Jacksonia the next day, but they were attacked by the Christiania's, the perilous line having been abandoned, and a new one taken, extending from near and beyond Gums Mills, and to Fowd swamp thus covering the approaches to the bridges over the Grunnie Creek, which had to be made in order to change the base. During the inactivity along the centre heavy guns were put in position on the south side to protect the bridges, and numerous wagons were passed over. General Gannonia joined the army on an hour after, and he ordered a general assault on the right wing of the Abbeannian line. The greatest bravery was now displayed on both sides, but at half past ten, Jacksonia came upon the strong Abbeannian lines, the Abbeannians in the meanwhile rushed and charged D.H. Till's divisions driving him back with indiscriminate slaughter, and to aid him general Gannonia ordered general Johnstonia to make an attack on the center and left of the Abbeannian line. But the latter seeing the strength of the position found it made a most desperate attack if he would add Till's troops, and his divisions rushed to the assault in double time, but were repulsed by the terrible that every division was shattered to fragments, and the rest recoiled covered. It was just after this that Jacksonia's troops came upon the ground. General Gannonia asked for aid, and general Logan's divisions crossed the creek to his aid, and also other troops were sent over. All this while the enemy had made series of desperate attempts to break the Abbeannian line but failed. An hour later they made a still more fiercer attack, and by a headlong rush gained the woods held by the left of the right wing of the Christiania line, and the Abbeannian soldiers fell back to a hill in the rear and poured a storming fire upon the assault ants decimating their columns by the wholesale.

In this part of the engagement the losses of the foe were great,--from 7,000,000 to 8,000,000 on the glandelinian side, and from 6,000,000, to 7,000,000 on that of the Abbeannians.

During the time the frightful battle was in progress on the north side of the Erminie, the enemy were making considerable assaults on the south side, in front of Greathearts, and Gums Mills. According to the severity of the Christiania artillery and musketry fire the number of glandelinians thus shot down at this point numbered about 7,000,000, and to make matters worse Everette True now a prisoner of the battle going on massed his whole force in column, and advanced it against the Gannonia line in grand array, and for a time a horrible disaster threatened the glandelinians their assaulting waves were annihilated, and the glandelinian works on the south side of the Erminie were occupied, and though the glandelinians withdrew, and though all the bridges were blown up to prevent the Christians from crossing, the Abbeannians made a flank movement to the Grunnie creek and forced Gannonia's main extreme left to abandon strong fortifications on which they had spent twenty four weeks of hard labor, which had a depressing effect on the glandelinian soldiers, yet they bore up manfully under the disappointment and disasters, and manifesting marvellous courage and endurance, they held ground elsewhere as yet. Then toward the afternoon the whole glandelinian centre withdrew, slowly and deliberately, the Abbeannians followed after, but were repulsed from time to time, when they made desperate attacks, and in no instance did they in the main delay the withdrawal, for all the glandelinian generals mangled under general orders, to take turns in repelling the Abbeannians, and held them in check until portions of the army in motion moved to a certain point then those that held the opposing force in check passed on, while fresh troops awaited in well chosen positions the approaching Abbeannians. A part of the Abbeannian army made detours by taking country roads, but when they came upon the line of march of the glandelinian armies they found it prepared to meet any assault. In this withdrawal the glandelinians lost fewer soldiers than the Abbeannians. Finally the advanced reached Grunnie hills on which the whole force of the foe arranged to make another stand. General Franklin Gandiford held Gannonia in check for two hours, and then without orders but with wisdom withdrew, general Gannonia of his own accord soon followed, and then Mc-Hollester's command, and then Hookerine, taking their position in the wooded stretches of the Erminie creek.

Along this creek was a long elevated plateau, and on this the Glandelinian army was concentrating, center, left and right, extending to cover the passage to Aronburgs landing, and on the position 60,000 pieces of artillery were placed into position, and also ten-thousand siege guns. This decision to make a stand here probably saved the Glandelinian army from destruction. Everett True resolved to envelope the position of the Glandelinian army but delayed the attack until four P.M. as he seemed not to have had his preparations made, meanwhile the Glandelinian soldiers of their own accord had been throwing up numerous breastworks to defend certain positions. But the attack was made of the Glandelinian by left, the Abbieannians opening and advancing their batteries through an open field, in front of woods where lay the men to storm the Glandelinian position, when their batteries had silenced the Glandelinian guns. But their own batteries were soon disabled, by the well directed fire of the Glandelinian artillery, and the storming party as yet had no opportunity to carry out their orders.

Battery after battery was ordered up to play of the Glandelinians but every battery brought up was knocked out to pieces, one or two others more shared the same fate, and an attempted assault was annihilated.

General Sumner at six o'clock declared by what he thought to be the signal for attack charged with all his divisions, and with all his might, but finding himself unsupported, although Germaine Vivian might have hastened to his aid, he was obliged to retire with great loss. Magruder on the right also made an attempt which ended the same way. The gunboats, and fleets of battle ships joined in the fray, and made great havoc among the Glandelinian columns but could not oust them from their strong position. The Abbieannian loss in killed and wounded was already 15,349,349, the Glandelinians 19,533,245.

In the meantime detachments of cavalry reconnoitred and reported the wicked enemy of God in great force on the Graines creek, and also at Mc-Hollester Federal. The movements of other Glandelinian forces puzzled the Abbieannian generals, their presence being made known by a desperate attack on general Bankers army. They had arranged their forces in such a manner as to amount almost to an ambush into which the Abbieannians fell. The battle was indeed general all along the line, and simply terrific in the extreme. At 6 thirty Popery came upon the field with the rest of Everett True's army and made some change of position, which the enemy mistook for a retreat and pressed on, and came into an open field, and exposed themselves to a very destructive fire of artillery, which drove them back to their covert of scrub oak.

Nevertheless the Glandelinian generals were bound to win the desperate battle at all costs, sending a force of 100,000 under general Jackson to crush general Lees army before it could be reinforced, either by the new levies or my general Jimmie Vivians army..... A general cannonade sent for warca forward all the troops that could be spared from the Glandelinian right wing, the battle was now more violent, but nevertheless general Everett True learning of the numbers of the enemy in his front, withdrew the Abbieannian forces hard pressed at all the fords, and prepared to throw his main forces forward to give the Glandelinians hell. Soon the greatness of Glandelinian soldiers appeared, Jackson was making an unusual detour to reach the Erminie valley, and come up in the rear of Everett Trues army. The latter divined the movement, and threw all his artillery in the way, checked them with some great loss, and then at this moment general Jimmie Vivian came up his army amounting to more than 54,000,000 men and not more than 500,000 effective cavalry, Lees army to 70,000,000 effective men.

The problem of the Abbieannian situation was that the foe had a well chosen position behind the embankments of a railroad as well as the other portions of the battlefield, but nevertheless the Abbieannian arrangements were equally as well made. The struggle was now very severe, though for a time the wicked Glandelinians were driven back, and the Abbieannians occupied the field. There was want of concert in the attack, and movement of the Abbieannian divisions, some of them did not carry out their orders fully, as for instance general Fritz Johnston porters forces took no part whatever in the action, but were suffered by him to lie idle on their arms, within sight and sound of the battle during the entire whole day. He had come into it with his 10,000,000 fresh troops, and had he struggled with the rest no doubt the victory would have been won. This had been the second time during the war that general Porterson had delayed or refused to obey general Jimmie Vivian, and he was afterwards tried by court-martial for this conduct, severely censured, and his command lost.

The conflict no doubt was extremely fierce and terrific along a battle line of nearly forty five miles in extent, and portersons divisions not having taken part were surprised by the foe who were advancing in that region, taken in the flank, and though fighting bravely, were driven back for twenty miles in a scattered condition, the foolish general narrowly escaped capture though he was severely wounded, and other divisions maintaining their old reputation for persistent bravery and endurance, was also driven back but managed to stand his ground elsewhere. The contest extended all along the whole line and raged for several hours in the night even, the Glandelinians bringing up heavy reserves, and hurling mass after mass of troops upon the whole Abbieannian line. These persistent efforts forced the Christian left back one half or three fourths of a mile, but at dark they made a stand firm and unbroken. General Everett True fell back to the trenches at Centrelline, and within a day or two retired to the defenses of the city of pondinia on the way to which it was the severe battle of CHANTILLY RUN in which two of the most excellent Abbieannian generals were killed, Stevens Mc-Hollester, and Kearney pragin. Both sides lost at this latter battle 15,000,000 the Glandelinians winning a sweeping victory.

General Everett True was so enraged that he asked to be either relieved from command or that general Porterson the fault of this to be punished. The latter occurred as stated before. The whole Abbieannian losses in these two severe conflicts combined was about 56,799,999 killed wounded and missing while the Glandelinians lost only 10,000,000 killed wounded, and 15,000,000 wounded. These two sudden disasters caused the most intense excitement in the Calvinian country, they were altogether so uncalled-for, and so unexpected that the whole world was taken by surprise. In the Glandelinian-Abbieannian war the Abbieannians had not lost a single battle, though the Glandelinians had fought like demons, the loss of battles for the Abbieannians in this war was numerous disastrous and severe.

But the effect in stead of discouraging the Abbieannians roused them to greater exertions and sacrifices than ever before.

A party in the Glandelinian cause had urged that Cannonia should now take the offensive than the defensive, but he decided to take the offensive before the Abbieannians recovered from their two bitter defeats, and the withdrawal of Everett Trues army insured him of his own accord to push on his greatly reinforced army, his vanguard crossing the Erminie Run at the mouth of the Erminie and Mc-Hollester creeks, and three days after the advance was at Pembertonia (Calvernia).

While the Glandelinians were thus moving great confusion reigned at the city of Calvernia and vicinity. General Everett True in virtue of his position in his army and by the direction of Jimmie Vivian, took command of all the forces thus demoralized, in and around the capitol, and in his place played his remarkable talents as an organizer, by soon bringing order out of confusion. The Abbieannian army now 100,000,000 strong was prepared to place itself between the invading foe of God, and the capitol which was threatened, and also to guard the old time battle ground of Aronburgs Run. The great army moved in the direction of the enemy, Jimmie Vivian led the left, Sumner, the center, and Germaine Vivian the right. At Beldonia ferry was general miles with 11,500,000 men; he had been assured that aid would be sent to him. But general Cannonia was unwilling to leave this force in his rear, and says he to Manley;

"The advance of the Abbieannian army was so infernal swift as to justify the belief that the war in Glandelinia cause was lost, and our troops were unable to concentrate in time to meet it."

Accordingly he sent Jackson who moved rapidly seized the heights that commanded the ferry, and compelled the surrender of the garrison of and of the 11,500,000 men, the aid coming just thirty hours too late. Another disaster for the Abbieannians—just think of it. The Abbieannian cavalry however escaped, and on its way to join the Abbieannian army captured an important train of wagons belonging to the enemy and ruthlessly massacred a division of Glandelinians whom they surprised and surrounded, refusing surrender, and butchering the wounded, in the height of their mauling fury.

The Abbieannian forces entered the city of Fredricksonia in which place was found an order of general Cannonias, dated the 10th to his subordinate generals, fully explaining his future movements. Everett True availed himself of this information, and ordered his entire force to certain points. There were two passes of or gaps through the Vivian hills hills ---name given to the Vivian ridge, north of the Erminie, ---Gramptonia and Grametion ridge, within five miles of each other. The former of these Germaine Vivian decided to seize, which he did after a sharp conflict and passed through into Beldonia valley to find the enemy full in force. A battle was already raging in the valley below, and general Sumner also reaching turners gap found it held by Neldon with a strong force, and the crest of the mountain for ten miles.

The battle increased, added by a cannonading lasting all day in one of the most terrific artillery duels on the land in the entire war. The enemy with drew during the night under a clattering storm of hundreds of thousands of shells and high explosives which threatened to blow all the ridges down and destroy the whole battle field, having lost in the artillery duel alone almost 25,500,000 men. They next appeared drawn up on the west side of Sunbeam river professing to have gained their point despite the artillery fire of the christians and in holding the gaps until Jacksonia could return from Beldonia ferry. In this starting point of the battle was killed the Abbieannian general Reno Nemo a great loss to the christian army.

THE FULL PROGRESS OF THE BATTLE OF VIVIAN RIDGE.

General Cannoniasoppositi n was extremely strong, with the treacherous river in his front, plandons village one mile in his rear on the way to the Erminia, over which in case of disaster he could retreat. Over the river were one hundred strong stone bridges in a distance of nearly forty miles. Cannonias army faced east, and on his right he placed Neldon on edge to the southern bridges. Here was placed general Germaine Vivian's corps, then came porters in the centre, then hookerines, and a portion of gunners on the left. The main commander was Everett True.

The bridge on the extreme Abbieannian right also a ford were heavily guarded, but hookerines obedient of all orders crossed the bridge and fords after severe opposition, but general Cannonia had placed two of Fritzepatriks divisions under cover of the woods, to receive the Abbieannians as they moved southwestward toward their line, and here the combat commenced in severe violence. Hood's troops annihilated, caused a gap to appear in the glandelinian divisions, but the shattered force was relieved by a large portion of Jacksonias forces, and general Mansfield Francis crossing the Sunbeam river and joining hookerine, the conflict began in earnest, hookerine taking the initiative.

The assault was made by his entire division, the attack being so furious that after two four hours fighting of the most savage character, with the aid of the Abbieannian batteries on the east side of the creek, the enemy heavily out up were forced to retire and retreat across an open field, beyond which were woods, and which they so took shelter after being almost annihilated by the terrific Abbieannian fire.

Also the losses of the Abbieannians was terrific. Hookerine advanced his centre, and left over the open field under a storming artillery fire from the glandelinian batteries, his left was badly cut up, but the survivors continued on, and made a horrible attack, but after two desperate assaults driven far into the inferno of the woods, the enemy formed, and being heavily reinforced, drove back the christians and met them fiercely out in the open plain, with the most determined vigor, and settled the dispute like two giant prize fighters on the ring. Both equally brave this was really one of the most terrific conflicts in the war next to Logan Zoo Rae gun, and continued until both sides exhausted, by exertions and losses retired as if by mutual consent.

The glandelinians had suffered horribly, Neldon was wounded, Jacksonia was killed, and two hundred other excellent officers had been killed. or mortally wounded. Hookerines divisions had been terribly broken up and cut to pieces, he called for Mansfield's divisions, which came on the ground about eleven o'clock, but by this time the glandelinians had again been heavily reinforced, by Cannonias right grand division, which had been resting in the Sunbeam woods. No commenced another bitter conflict. Hookerines broken divisions and Mansfield's were forced back across the open fields to the woods of their own position with still heavier losses, and there the Abbieannian line held their ground until threatened with annihilation, and then they were forced to withdraw as the terrific fire of the enemy became unendurable.

The brave Abbieannian general Mansfield was killed, as he went to the front to rally his division, hookerine was severely wounded, and carried from the field, Everett True was disabled and Germaine Vivian dangerously wounded. At this time general gunner brought up his corps into that fierce conflagration of battle, and drove one portion of the enemy back into the woods, and another portion was withdrawn. A sea of dead and wounded strewn the battle field for forty eight miles.....

These again reinforced made an attack upon gunners right, which was much advanced, and drove it back crushed and mangled, then the glandelinians retired to a safe position in the rear at Twelve o'clock. Thus between the glandelinian left, and the Abbieannian right was the conflict into which were sent reinforcements, but by both general Everett True and Cannonia. Little was done by either the glandelinian right or center of the foes army until one thirty. An attempt by Jimmie Vivian had been made to force the lower bridge and occupy the heights, but not until two P.M. was the bridge after mortal fighting carried, and not until an hour afterwards was the heights captured, and not without much loss in officers and men. The guns of the enemy had fully commanded the west end of the bridge, Jimmie Vivian held the heights for a few minutes, and then was forced back to the bridge by a charge made by the foe with the force of an avalanche.

Jimmie Vivian the main commander of the whole army was reinforced by two divisions, and now Cannonia made the most desperate efforts to hold his position and the battle became doubly terrific. During this great activity Cannonia sent Franklin on a raid, with nearly 2,000,000 cavalry, which made a complete sweep around the Abbieannian army, passing through Meltonburg, Chamberlaine, Rosa, Copsy, and Ophelia and several other places, only to find all in ruins, but finally recrossed the Erminia safely without losing a single man.

In the meantime general Jimmie Vivian moved his main centre toward the Vivian heights, and the whole army moved for that point under heavy fire and was twice repulsed with heavy loss. The Abbieannian venture made a series of assaults upon the enemy entrenched line, nearly forty five miles long and crowned with all kinds of heaviest artillery. The artillery storm was horrible but nothing stopped the assault. The heavy Abbieannian batteries reached this entrenched line of the enemy, and the Sunbeam creek itself was an open space within range of many rows of rifle pits and a very strong force of infantry concealed right and left. Against these the Abbieannian soldiers were led, it is marvellous that all of them were not killed, the fire of the enemy was so terrific, and though assault after assault was made and the glandelinian soldiers rushed heroically into this arena of death the foes redoubts could not be forced. In no other instance in this war were Abbieannian soldiers led so recklessly. Night came on and closed the conflict. Only 90,000,000 of Cannonias troops were engaged and they all the time behind strong intrenchments. The glandelinians lost in killed and wounded, 44,101,000, and the Abbieannian army 34,678,888 in killed and wounded, while they captured 10,233,456 glandelinian wounded. The battle was a draw with a slight success to the enemy. Though the Abbieannians had met these checks, it was now found that not a glandelinian army was in Calverinia. All had been driven out, and who can imagine the rejoicing of the whole country.

SECOND BATTLE OF BIG GIRLMOOL.

April 10th.

We now return to the recommencement of the war in the Angolinian soil. The Abbieannian army had taken possession of Corinth (Angolinia without a battle, on the McPollester and Pandora railway. The same day general Monarch had sent an Abbieannian army under general Joseph Haley toward Angeline, an important strategic position on the same road in East Angelinia two hundred miles east of Corinth, he also ordered general Cranlin to protect west Angelinia, and to operate a from Memphis and move against Big-girlmool. Haley was to pass along the road, put it in repair, and by that route relieve his repairs. General Bobo Mitchell had previously held a portion of the same road, and had advanced into north Angelinia first, occupying Decatur and Florence and general Win Windrow, organ had also seized the Angeline gun gap, the gate of east Angelinia.

These commands when united with Haley's force amounted to about 40,000,000 men not half enough to accomplish what was required, but in truth they did and showed the foe that their inferior numbers were able to accomplish anything against wicked enemies of God.

Meanwhile the wicked glandelinians alarmed at the steady concentration of the Abbieannians planned to cause Haley's withdrawal from his position, being determined to pass his rear, in vain Calverinia again, threatening both Calverine and Angelinia, and force him to return for the latter's protection. This movement as we will soon see caused a great disaster to the glandelinians. And general Black Brooks who had superseded Cannonia, and general Smith Kerby, with about 56,000,000 men invaded the southern parts of Calverinia, and advanced toward the Erminia pillaging as they went, while Johnston Morgan and Forrester each having about 11,000,500 cavalry were riding and driving in every direction, plunging and plundering villages and towns in every direction, defeating small parties of Abbeisannians, and destroying bridges. Haley was ordered by general Jimmie Vivian to cross the border line and meet these forces, and drive them out of Calverinia. He moved from the north Angeline gun river as quick as possible and came into the state three days behind Gek Brooks, who had made a desperate push from Glasgow toward Angeline to find general Hanson prepared to meet him and he prudently fell back out of Calverinia toward Big-girlknool to unite with the glandelinian forces there 100,000,000 strong. Last Haley with a force of 90,000,000 now having been heavily reinforced should overtake him. The latter arrived at Big-girlknool, and as soon as possible went in pursuit, thus interfering very much with the enemy's plans of carrying off plunder, for which they had impregned all the wagons, mules, horses, and child slaves of the country. The glandelinians being hard pressed found they must be standing their ground, and so they made a stand at Big-girlknool the scene of the first two great conflicts early in the war in which the Christians had been so disastrously beaten. Haley came up and a severe battle was fought, and for an hour there was varying successes, but at the close of the hour the glandelinians had a decided advantage and hurled their big cavalry force upon the whole Christian line. The glandelinian cavalry 11,000,000 strong came sweeping forward, and made a tremendous onslaught it indeed being a vast squadron of Arabian cavalry as veritable glandelinian Escaadrille. The tremendous onslaught struck the large and mighty columns of Abbeisannian shock troops, and in the tremendous melee the Abbeisannian columns were shattered, thousands were trodden under the hooves of the foe who charged like an avalanche, and the survivors were sent in a scattered rout across the regions and fields and plains of Big-girlknool.

Supported by a prodigious cannonade of many hundreds of thousands of guns the cavalry swept on with overwhelming force and fury toward the very heart of the left wing of the Abbeisannians, and for a while finding their advance checked by a terrific fire along the Abbeisannian line, a portion of the cavalry force wheeled about, under the cover of a furious fire of 30,000 guns and then on coming to the Abbeisannian rear swept forward like a torrent or swollen flood from a bursted dam, but by this time general Haley realizing the danger had massed his batteries, which tore the cavalry columns to pieces, there was a conglomeration of falling horses and men, and to make matters worse Abbeisannian cavalry swept upon the glandelinian cavalry, and during the bloody massacre hand to hand, with sabres, lances, and carbines the few glandelinian survivors retired in confusion. The cavalry was pursued by Abbeisannian and Mosconian dragoons and even infantry, Price Sterlings works were then carried by the Christians, who captured about 1,000,000 prisoners, and treated the fresh cavalry force of the glandelinians who then charged still more severely. In this second cavalry fight the enemy under general John Van, Price Sterlington, Lovelace Francis, and Rustingmiller, had about 38,654,456 cavalry men all the fierce Gargolians, and in the clash the glandelinian cavalry of the two combined, suffered the loss of 1,423,456 wounded, 3,692,654 dead and prisoners, 2,248,999, while the Abbeisannian loss was only 315,555 killed, and 1,812,222 wounded.

THE

THE DESPERATE ASSAULT ON THE ABBEISANNIAN CENTER.

There was a lull of about an hour and then general Jackbrooks sent forward a heavy column of infantry, all Gargolians, Mosconian guards, and Moscollestinians to storm the Christian center, this he hoped would be a force sufficient to crush and drive the Christians back from the field. So after an hours lull these masses of the enemy rushed upon the center, Mos-Gooks positions, and general Jimmie Vivian who was advancing his reinforcements with the intention to fall upon the enemy's right, was arrested by the noise of a severe fight along Haley's center, and soon came a messenger from Mos-Gok that he had been attacked by an overwhelming force, was pressed hard and needed assistance. Jimmie Vivian answered: "Tell him to contest every inch of ground and I'll assist him as soon as I can bring up my forces. If he holds them at bay, we will swing into Big-girlknool with our left and cut them off." Soon however it was evident to Jimmie Vivian that he must change his original plan and hasten to sustain Haley's own center, which had already been driven though sullenly some distance. The main forces of the center of the Jimmie's satisfaction however withstood the tremendous buffeting of the enemy's headlong onslaughts in their mortal combat with the mighty screeching wave of glandelinians, that for four hours had swept against their lines with relentless fury. The supporting Abbeisannian forces having been badly cut up, had been forced back sullenly when Jimmie Vivian arrived, and the furious foe who had drove them back had almost entirely surrounded the remaining defenders, yet boldly in that furnace of slaughter they defied the wicked Glandelinian onrush, and presented a most inspirational picture of adamant resistance, as they broke and cut to pieces the assaults of the great succeeding glandelinian waves, that rushed with great fury against the main defenses. Enduring, inflexible they continued to hold, which the center of the main wing had yielded ground inch by inch by the time of Jimmie Vivian's arrival. No Ten thousand Immortals, no Guard Regiments, no Macedonian Phalanx ever stood their ground more nobly than nobly than the surrounded Abbeisannians did during this battle. Simultaneously the glandelinians in one perfect wave came upon the troops under Sheridan Logan. Here he displayed the remarkable promptness and skill which he afterwards so often showed.

13-46

The enemy advanced across the open fields and plains in compact mass twenty miles long. Upon them he trained three batteries of fifty thousand guns each with terrific and murderous effect, yet though horribly gapped and torn the glandelinians closed their shattered line and pressed on to within fifty yards or so of the woods, in which a portion of Jimmie Vivian's troops lay under cover, when suddenly the Abbeisannians with a terrific ear-splitting yell arose to their feet, and poured in such destructive volleys that after ten desperate attempts to force the red line the survivors of the glandelinians broke and fled. General Mills charged with his Abbeisannians and drove the glandelinians across the field, rescued those surrounded by the foe and drove the foe clean beyond their intrenchments. In this charge the gallant general Mills was killed. Other divisions moved against the Christian center, but Jimmie Vivian undauntedly changed his front and repelled them furiously. In an hours time came three other desperate assaults for which he was prepared by planting his main batteries which swept down the advancing columns. It was now six hours since the bloody battle began and general Germaine Vivian despite his wounds relieved in the last battle in the month of February came on the field with his forces.

New dispositions were made by both armies and severe fighting continued along the center at many different points. Finally the glandelinians made their last assault, to find themselves so subjected to so destructive an artillery fire, that when within three hundred yards, they broke and hastily retired to their intrenchments. The influence of this battle was indeed very discouraging to the leaders of the glandelinian armies and even more to their people. It was seen now for truth that the war was lost. The Abbeisannian army engaged on the center amounted to 43,000,000 and the foe about 50,000,000. The Abbeisannian loss on the center in killed and wounded was about 8,778,999, the glandelinians lost more than 10,000,000, killed and wounded, and 11,700,000 prisoners.

Along the left of the Christian line after the desperate cavalry melee the battle raged with equal fury, here the left wing withstood the onrush of glandelinian waves with such undaunted and unconquerable strength and courage, that smash, as they would, hammer as they did, the glandelinians retreated after their attack, powerless to entirely reduce the defenses, and shatter the Christian line. During another tremendous assault, though the flanks held, the center of the right yielded of the main left wing, but a reinforcing line some forty miles long, had been thrown forward to repel these apparently successful glandelinians, and the whole glandelinian wave pounding against this new Abbeisannian line, in its maddest fury, encountered a murderous fire that was unindurable, mostly of masonry and artillery, followed by a tremendous counter charge, that threw the glandelinian or surge at this section of the battle line back in the wildest confusion, a helpless and exhausted foe. Then the Abbeisannians of the right wing made a new and heavier concentration and the left staged a second counter attack of particular fury broke down the succeeding glandelinian waves, and drove the survivors in a headlong rout for thirty five miles. Now along the center the Abbeisannians also rushed forward to make a counter charge, in series waves. Each wave was at a length of twenty to thirty miles or more, and these striking from four to six majestic blows of tremendous force and irresistible fury in two hours, against which the wildest glandelinian waves in their maddest moment counter charged, and counter charged in vain finally broke up the entire glandelinian center, and tearing their columns to pieces carried all before them, and scattered the glandelinian divisions so widely that they were not able to rally.

Late in the afternoon Black Brooks seeing his center and right driven from the field, had hurried up reinforcements, and decided to storm the Christian right but met with an unexpected resistance. General Germaine, having determined at all hazards, to hold the position until General Everett True, with his forces could come to his assistance, which he did at two o'clock. Everett True had no orders to bring on a general engagement at all, but there was no alternative; the Glandelinians were attacking, and putting himself at the head of the division he hastened on, and sent back orders for the Third and Seventh corps to come forward with all haste. He took position on the hills in front of the town, lest it should be destroyed by shells. The artillery was under General Doubleday Johnston. General Everett True when directing the position of the last division and two brigades on the extreme right was killed by an explosion of a shell, a sad loss to the Abbeismannian army and the country. General Doubleday Johnston then directed the storming battle which now began in great earnest.

An entire Glandelinian wave forty million strong crossed with the fury of an avalanche the Sunbeam Run, and drove General Germaine back, but were in turn themselves, decimated, repulsed and then captured. With their commander General Sanford Archer. Simultaneously an Gargolian division of the same number of men was coming in on the right flank, and nearly captured an Abbeismannian battery, when the Abbeismannians after pouring in a most destructive fire all along the line, at once changed front and charged with fixed bayonets. The Gargolians thus suddenly counter attacked, were cut down in the most frightful wholesale numbers, thrown into confusion, and driven on to the uncut of an unfinished railway where they sought refuge, and here they were forced to surrender after a desperate resistance. Just thinking of it. That few hours in the afternoon 80,000,000 Glandelinians captured.

Black Brooks orders had in the meantime been so admirably obeyed that Earl Johnston crowing with garlands, and reinforced by Early Yorklin and Hill Chambersburg, all reached the scene just as this terrible disaster to the Glandelinian army happened.

Hill Chambersburg, put in line of battle 14,000,000 men besides his advance, Methus division. Earl Johnston who heard the tremendous roar of conflict thirty miles distant hurried forward and came upon the field just as the two forces were captured. He at once prepared to assault, the Abbeismannian left flank, and Hill to renew the fight in front. After the bloody fight had recommenced, suddenly Early Yorklin appeared on the other side, and made an impetuous charge on the eleventh corps, which had come up an hour before. These accessions of the foe gave it the superiority of numbers, and thus pushed on three sides, and thrown into confusion, the Glandelinian left from necessity too much extended, were driven back through the village.

General Howard Franklin when he reached the battle field at Three P.M. with his corps the Eleventh assumed command. In coming up he prudently stationed all of his divisions in reserve on the heights, a commanding position south of Big-girlknool. This division pouring in as fierce a fire as the enemy met at the Carnation ridge at Gloria soon checked the Glandelinians, and enabled the other troops to come up, to relieve the attack of in the exultant Glandelinians. The wounded Glandelinian soldiers were sent during the day to the village and immediate vicinity, and of course they fell into the hands of the Abbeismannians when they obtained possession. General Black Brooks had not yet arrived, but sent orders to Earl Johnston to press the attack to the utmost. Early Yorklin assaulted the heights immediately, but Earl Johnston seeing the position strong and the Abbeismannian soldiers well prepared, thought it more prudent to wait for reinforcements, and when Black Brooks arrived he found that Early was the only one assaulting the heights. News of the death of General Everett True had been sent to General Jimmie Vivian, who directed his brother to take command, who arrived with his main forces and did all possible to restore order and place his own troops in a position almost impregnable.

About four P.M. without sending forward skirmishers, lest they should give notice of his coming, General Cannon with his entire force made a tremendous assault on the advanced position of Germaine Vivians, extending his lines to overlap the other, and by a rush forward seized the heights the key to the whole position. Just at that moment Skyles corps which had been held in reserve were moving by order of Jimmie Vivian to occupy the same key. They had scarcely reached their line of the top, when the Glandelinians having passed round Germaine left, which had been turned which had been turned, came rushing up the slope to find themselves confronted with the most determined courage, and after a desperate hand to hand struggle the assailants were repulsed with the most frightful losses.

Cannon attacks on Germaine's corps was more successful, the Abbeismannian soldiers fought well but their faulty position gave the advantage to their adversaries, and though Germaine did hold his position he had only less than one quarter of his whole division when the battle was over. Germaine himself was severely wounded, and carried from the field, and General Pirney taking the command fell pierced through the heart. Worse of all a gap nearly twenty miles long was made in the Abbeismannian line by the sending of reinforcements, and the Glandelinians made attempts in fearful numbers, and with the fury of desperation to secure this opening, but were beaten off by the Abbeismannians sent off to occupy the same place. Then the Glandelinians made a long detour and came out in the rear of the heights, with the hope of suddenly securing that important point, but its crest was crowned with soldiers and cannons, and though an attempt was made, an attack on the rear of this position was madness, and as no one could reach the summit as they were shot down by the whole wholesale, the enemy fell back disappointed.

On the Abbeismannian left was stationed Earl Johnston who only made demonstrations, which Jimmie Vivian soon detected, but about Five P.M. he made a real assault against a portion of the ridge, and captured and held a breastwork partially manned, while three of Early's brigades attacked another portion of the same and succeeded in driving back the unfortunate Eleventh corps, though the artillery made sad havoc in their approaching lines. Their triumph was short, for the second corps fell upon them with the most determined vigor, and drove them off faster, than they had drove the Eleventh. Simultaneously General Jimmie Vivian attacked the foe in the breastworks in they had secured, though they had been reinforced by four divisions and after a severe contest, drove them out with great loss. All this while, there raged the most terrible artillery combat of field artillery. The Glandelinian guns had accomplished but little though they kept up an unceasing fire for all the time of the duration of the battle, and now the foe came on to make a last desperate attack in overwhelming numbers. As they advanced like a sweeping cyclone, the supports right and left began to waver, the left falling back, and the right not keeping up, finally melted away. Still the main column moved on, closing up the line as the men fell, its flanks exposed to an oblique fire from right and left, and the head of the columns torn by bombshells and grape shot, also melted away but nothing could arrest the survivors. The incessant fire caused the divisions to swerve to the left instead of direct upon the point intended, presently they came within musket shot range, the Abbeismannians reserving their fire for more deadly effect and then shot down line after line. The survivors of the columns pressed on steadily without taking time to turn the fire, which had been delivered upon their left when they came within two hundred yards, they were received by a most severe fire from ten divisions this they returned and rushed on only to melt away, but soon a portion of the remaining column broke into disorder, fifteen hundred of its colors were captured, and nearly 2,000,000 prisoners, another portion swerved to the right and took possession of a stone wall a little way in advance of the main line of breastworks, this wall having been hastily constructed and used temporarily, on this they placed their torn and tattered battleflags, but they became a centre of fire---front right and left---in a few minutes few were left, the survivors threw down their arms, and fell upon the earth to escape to the leaden hail, twelve more standards of colors were captured, and about 2,500,000 more prisoners were taken. This virtually ended the battle of Big-girlknool when the Glandelinian cause received a stinging blow from which it never recovered. The surviving Glandelinian soldiers returned in a screaming howling mob, pursued by the growling of howling cannon which swept all the valley and the slopes of the hills, with balls, shells and high explosives. Both armies remained in their respective positions until Jimmie Vivian rushed upon him at six P.M. and the foe were forced to retreat in general leaving their dead on the field, and their wounded uncared for, though Earls divisions remained to cover the retreat. The pursuit general Jimmie Vivian captured a great number of prisoners, many of whom were wounded, and cruelly left by the roadside to lighten the trains. Black Brooks fell back and finally after retreating for ten days at the rate of fifty miles a day or more finally took up position on the south side of the Angolinian boundary line, and Jimmie Vivian in his old homestead on the outskirts of Angoline.

This virtually ended all Glandelinian invasion, both Galverinia and Angolinian and Angolinian were freed from all Glandelinian armies, and only when the word was to be given, would the Christians rush into the foe's country to make an invasion themselves. In this battle the Abbeismannians lost 22,864,789 in killed, in wounded 33,790,000, they buried 44,500,000 of the enemy dead, and 26,500,889 wounded fell into their hands, while 13,621,999 of the remaining Glandelinian wounded escaped. Unwounded prisoners amounted to 90,000,000 men.

8060. 3006. JOJO of Abbeismann...
 the village of...
 JOHN MANLEY'S ARMY IS CRUSHED AT PHELANTONBURG.....

When general John Manley heard of the series of christian victories at or on the Galverinian soil, and how the glandelinian armies had been repeatedly banged about, and thrown back clean out of galverinia, and not only that but out of Angolia too, and that general Vivian had a purpose to reduced Titanio Fair. The Gibraltar of the glandelinia, he was worried in the extreme, and decided despite all the protest of the generals under him to make an invasion himself once more and strike against the city of phelantonburg near the Angolinian and glandelinian boundary line.....

In the latter part of January, he set out with a large army to take the christian army at phelantonburg in the rear, by capturing Jackson army of gon centinians, while Heldman was to mass down the great Mc-Hollester Mo-Hollester river running into the Mc-Hollester gun, from pavidiprin trans ports, fleets of battle ships and steamers, convoyed by admiral Porters gunboats and submarines, then up the Erminia to a certain point and there land and make a junction with other forces that would be sent to follow him. The latter moved by way of Holy springs which place the Abbeismannians evacuated on his approach, then passing on he found them drawn up for battle on the other side of the Sunbr sunbeam creek. He flanked them, and after some desperate and dusty fighting a portion of the Abbeismannian line fell back to Phelanton and Chesapeake town out of which they were driven, the glandelinian column moving on toward phelantonburg. There the first force of the enemy under Sanders halted for an accumulation of supplies at Holy Springs, but general Van Francis with his great cavalry force of 10,000, men surprised the regiment guarding these supplies captured them and secured the supplies for their own use. The capture of these stores necessitated Manley to fall back for some time and give up that plan of attack. But Black Brooks following and not aware of this disastrous mishap passed twelve miles up the Sunbeam and found the Angolinians themselves in great force at Villanaw Bluffs a strongly fortified place, and commanding the river and any approach to land. Instead of the cooperation of Manley, Black Brooks from the enemy's native force free to oppose him on the Sunbeam creek. He made a vigorous attack but so simply were they prepared to repel any force that he was compelled to withdraw sustaining a loss of over 2,000,000 men retreating down to the Erminia, and opposite the mouth of the Mc-Hollester River, and the Milky Band the army being concentrated in force twelve miles above Phelantonburg. Manley took his forces from Pandora and went down the river to the same place while waiting for Manley and his forces general Heldman who was in command captured the fortifications of Chesetown, at Graham's lanes fifty miles further up. The dangerous expedition was well planned the troops mostly being on board steamers and battle ships Porter conveying them with his gunboats, rams and submarines. The troops landed three miles below the fortifications and invested it as soon as possible while Porter passed up to closer range the conflict was sharp and decisively, soon a white flag appeared, the fortifications were surrendered and with it and all the war material but though the fortifications were surrendered the Abbeismannian soldiers would not surrender themselves as prisoners, and butchering all the glandelinians who tried to nab them they escaped from the abandoned fortifications through a secret passage way. General Manley arrived at Younke Point with a part of his forces at about ten o'clock in the morning after the first two conflicts and assumed command, and in due time procured his designs against Phelantonburg. General Steadman sent a force from Pandora Angolia to recover and occupy the fortifications at Chesetown. The glandelinian garrison attacked heavily withdrew up the river to Port Manley soon to become fortified to such a degree as to be seconded only by Titanio Fair. The Abbeismannians made an attack by land and by water, with thirty powerful rams and a large force of infantry. A position was recaptured, the glandelinian general prairie right being killed. The Westfield fortifications abandoned by the enemy was mined and the explosion blew the wreckage a thousand feet into the air. Within a few hours more after severe desultory fighting, the battle became extremely sanguinary the first advanced forces of the foe being surprised and driven back toward the main portion of Manley's right wing, and now concentrated up on him was about 47,000,000 men, while simultaneously the main Abbeismannian commander sent general Boldonto guard the main approaches toward Phelantonburg, while 12,000,000 others were sent to try and take Manley on his left flank, while the 120,000,000 others were held in reserve.

3007.

An extreme advanced portion of great importance, and shot to pieces, in regulars, and thus far that day all the Abbeismannian left in their movements, other divisions were signalled to the Phelantonburg rivers on pontoons with but little opposition, and the Phelantonburgs. General Sedwick's division had according to orders crossed below Phelantonburg, and made demonstration on the extreme right of the glandelinian army under Black Brooks. Black Brooks perceiving this latter to be a firmer left 6,000,000 men to guard the recently captured fortifications and hastened all the force he could muster to phelantonburg.

On the march he met Kenneth Casey who was making a long detour with the purpose to come in on the extreme right of the christian army. He was advancing with about 22,000,000 veterans in a direction, that induced the Abbeismannian scouts to think he was falling back toward the south. General Manley in the meantime with only 13,000,000 men kept the attention of the Abbeismannian commander by making desperate assaults of violent character at many different points, while Kenneth Casey was moving rapidly around to the rear of the big Abbeismannian army. There was certainly no chance however for general Logan of the Abbeismannians and his officers to be thus deceived by this unusual maneuver of Kenneth Casey, but his glandelinian forces fell with such unexampled fury upon the eleventh corps and 344th infantry, that despite fierce resistance for four hours, it could not hold and was finally driven back upon the Twelfth corps. The struggle was terrific the Twelfth corps letting loose with all their terrible cannons tearing down the glandelinian waves as if they were corn, general Kenneth Casey was mortally wounded, and general Black Brooks who took his place, and was appointed commander of the division also fell severely wounded. Worse of all for the foe the Twelfth corps were in a position that rendered their superiority of numbers unassailable, and though fighting continued at certain points in the most savage manner indescribable, Manley with four divisions managed to force Sedwick back, though his troops suffered horribly from the Abbeismannian artillery which was persistent.

Though Sedwick was compelled to recross the river, he could not be driven back any further, though the most violent assaults were directed against his lines. For three hours and half there was hardly any responsible head to the immense Abbeismannian army as general Richard Logan when on the scouting tour was stupefied by the concussion of a shell from a hostile battery. Indeed no matter how matters fared, or no matter how strong the Abbeismannian army, Manley would surely have won this battle, and renewed the invasion with great success, and finally win the war in spite of all if it had not been for a number of inexcusable blunders which made this battle more of a terrible disaster than a defeat.

During this first day of the battle the Abbeismannians had lost in killed and wounded about 11,000,000, and the wicked glandelinians about 10,000,000.

NIGHT

NIGHT OPERATIONS!!!!.....

General Manley finding it impossible to take Phelantonburg from his present position, determined to pass a portion of his army on the west side of the river from Milky band to a point below, and then by running the gauntlet of the hundreds of Abbeismannian batteries, obtain gunboats and ferries which were in possession of the christians. A portion of the army during the night commenced the laborious march most of the way over an inundated and spongy soil, the soldiers often times halting to construct roads. Meantime Admiral Porterson ran past the Phelantonburg batteries, with his ships and both sides opened up at once in the most terrifying cannonading of the war and the heavens were racked by the din of exploding shells. Ships were disabled by the score but during the heaviest of all cannonading the fleets passed down continually bombarding the grand Abbeismannian batteries, and though successful in driving the Abbeismannians from the Grand Gulf, admiral Porterson was killed, all on his ship was wounded or dead, and the dead and wounded littered his other ships like swarms of massacred flies. Pemberton ordered his fresh columns of Abbeismannians to retake the place, united all his troops and began the troops coming to assault him by land back, under the very fire of the glandelinian warships and all that was abandoned was recovered.

Manley in the meantime was moving toward Jackson's force throwing out long parallel divisions, bewildering Pemberton as to his real object. As the army advancing during the night did all the bombardment of the fleets on Abbeismannian batteries, the glandelinians came in contact with the Abbeismannians from time to time, and mingled in severe conflicts.

One for the village of the old land, strongly posted in a long stretch of woods near the river, and after a contest of three hours the glandelinians drove the christians from their position, but general McNeill coming up with a division about 11,000,000 strong engaged the main body of the assailants, and Sherman passed round flanking the enemy, and driving the back out of the woods with terrible loss. General parley who was now on the ground wished to delay a general battle until the Thirteenth corps came up, but ere he arrived the Abbeannians began the battle, and after a short and decisive struggle, all the glandelinians in possession of the christian works at the Grand Gulf were driven back with great loss in killed and wounded. They fell back to Erminio river railroad bridge, where they made a desperate stand, but their soldiers were sadly demoralized and when an Abbeannian brigade charged their right in order to obtain a better position, they fled in disorder.

"All is lost," he cried from the glandelinians ranks, and the panic stricken soldiers crowded upon the embankment far from the main army and mine explosions occurring blew fortifications thousands of feet into the air. These fugitives finding all escape cut off surrendered, there being about 32,000,000 of them.

In this twenty four of forces fighting the whole glandelinian army under general John Manley was crushed in pieces and discouraged, Manley was forced to fall back to the boundary line, and now he saw that all hopes for the cause being won was out of the question!.....

THE SERIES OF BATTLES ALONG THE BOUNDARY LINE.....

From the battle of Aronburgs Run or what is called more so the battle of Glorinda, till January 25th, general Evans remained in his camp recruiting, especially his cavalry, and it was surprising to all that he remained inactive so long.... Meanwhile general Ottoman Hamish, retired with his own forces to the south bank of Cranberry river a deep narrow stream, whose fords he fortified with the greatest care, and waited for general Evans to come and attack him in his well chosen position. The latter advanced not in the way marked out by his new adversary, but by a series of skillfully devised flanking movements, and compelled Ottoman Hamish to abandon all his well laid plans, and to escape, being taken at a great disadvantage in the rear. He fell back toward the boundary line and continued his retreat eastward, there on the old time battle ground of Easter Starring he made a stand, having been largely reinforced from Manley's army by Crawford's division, and from Johnnie Mac Gowan's force, and paroled prisoners from Virginia run who had not been exchanged. He fortified that famous railroad center, and at various points on the Easter Starring river threw up defensive works. Evans was much retarded in his pursuit by rains of heavy explosions occurring everywhere, on his line of march by mines set recently by the retreating foe under the three Manleys, by checked up fields and streams, and the want of bridges which had been destroyed by the wicked enemies of God.

Easter Starring is on the very river by its name, between Aronburgs Run, A(Angelina) and the Pandelionia ridges. On Evans approach Ottoman Hamish evacuated the west western regions of Easter Starring, which Evans occupied himself, also a portion of the hills by Winstons divisions and the valley of the Easter starring. Ottoman Hamish advanced his forces over the creek, to get between Onion city, and Pitane riar.

THE SECOND BATTLE OF EASTER STARRING. FRIGHTFUL STORIES OF CARNAGE.

Other movements were also made, which Violet and her sisters had detected, and they frequently gave warning to all the christian commanders, who made counter movements, resulting in squabbles, which brought on a serious and general engagement.

About ten P.M. the glandelinians made a heavy assault upon the left flank of the christian line, the attack though at first desultory was severe, and though repulsed, the foe attacked again with redoubled fury, and with their whole strength, and forced it back crushed and shattered after a most obstinate resistance of four hours duration. The whole glandelinian surge however during this terrific onslaught was horribly torn and shot to pieces, and unable to hold the advantage they had gained, for the Abbeannian left being reinforced in turn, took the offensive, made three desperate onslaughts and by 4 P.M. recovered all the ground lost, and shattered the whole glandelinian army at this portion. The glandelinians left their sea of dead and wounded on the field. Meanwhile generals Frankin Pope ishop, and Crawford assaulted the Abbeannian center with the same violence, which being shattered wavered for a short time, but being reformed, recovered, and held the enemy in check under a storming fore fire for the length of sixty three miles, then the glandelinian assault was made again in stronger force, and though three hundred glandelinian divisions were crushed and mangled the force of the onset compelled the christian center to give way. Shoemuckers divisions soon came up, and presently others sent by Winstons, and after three spirited charges, regained the entire ground.

Again the enemy made a most desperate attempt on the christian center, raging the assault so wildly, and so insanely that general Jack Evans himself was indeed indescribably astonished, but he made such a heavy concentration of troops and artillery, that the glandelinians who had captured a line of positions being recaptured so vigorously abandoned the works, and recoiled. The attack was made simultaneously against the christian right. The Abbeannians here held their ground for a time, and then overwhelmed by an assault of thirty three glandelinian divisions fell back in order, tearing the Mason line to pieces with their terrific withering fire. Then being reinforced, they made series of fierce and spirited counter charges, and checked the enemy seriously. Two hours after they threw a tremendous force upon the christian left, where general Winstons commanded. During the night before his men had extemporized a barrier of logs and fence rails, from behind which their long lines of artillery and musketry told very severely on the enemy, making the most severe havoc had havoc in the ranks of the Glandelinians ever witnessed by Ottoman Hamish in the war.

But nevertheless the surviving glandelinians came on with the most frantic devil yells, never staggered under the well directed fire, the right was weakened by overwhelming losses, the disordered portions falling back toward Easter Starring, and Evans was carried along with the crowd. Winstons then moved to a position on the slope of the hills, and there massed all the artillery he had, which played most effectively on the enemy. The glandelinians were urged against this new position by Crawford and Ottoman Hamish with a disregard of human life scarcely known. As they came up they were slaughtered at a terrible rate by well directed discharges of musketry and artillery, and though making a well directed flanking movement, they were simultaneously repulsed by Abbeannian and Winstons' cavalry. Evans retired his forces on the right toward the railroad lines, and after a short lull the enemy suddenly rushed out of their intrenchments and fell with great fury upon a portion of Winstons' main reserve forces and a portion of Winstons' forces, each series glandelinian force striking with the violence of great tidal waves of men. The battle was terrific, but after two hours of it the assailants were forced to retire to their intrenchments having lost more than 4,000,000 killed, and accomplished nothing except to teach the Abbeannian army to be on its guard with more unusual alertness. The other portion of the right wing in contracting their lines and cutting casual communications seized a line of low hills near the Easter starring railway, from which elevation cannon balls and shells were thrown upon the assailant assailing columns at a most terrific rate, and despite all the storm of shell fire the glandelinians made ten of the most desperate and rash attempts to recover the hills, but were repulsed each time with the most exorbitating losses, and general Crawford, was killed.

The Abbeannian army still contracting the lines carefully, when about three o'clock the vivid girls reported the enemy in motion and massing on the main left of the right wing, and that an unusual cannonading was going on that shook the hills as if to throw them down. On they came with mad violence, and the battle raged with redoubled violence, cannons by the score of thousands volley and thundered, line after line was gapped and torn to pieces, and though in the main the desperate massed assailants were repulsed with fearful loss, they made seven assaults of the wildest character in quick succession, and in this battle fell Winstons the most promising of the corp commanders, but fortunately he was only wounded.

Again and again the enemy assaulted, on they came and still on they came the scene was a roaring hell of devastation, the foe in the face of the line of inferno came on in the most reckless manner, with his men crowded together upon the Abbeannians, who deliberately taking better aim swept away line after line of the best men of the glandelinian officers. Six more successive charges were made, which were six times gallantly repulsed, each time with more fearful loss of life.

All the while during the terrible battle the numerous forces of inactive christian cavalry were continually breaking the enemy's lines of communications, and a great force of glandelinian infantry made a tremendous assault upon the christian cavalry, but was severely repulsed, and still the battle was general all along the line of the christian right. Evans with a force of cavalry which he led in person drove the foe out of the Easter starring valley, and throwing forces forward in greater numbers made a tremendous counter charge at six P.M. on Ottoman Hamish right to divert his attention of crushing the assaults of the christian right, but sending a large force with much ostentation, and taking a good position in sight of the inactive portions of the enemy, the foe rifle pits one by one were taken, the enemy at this point took to flight and the christian troops under John Evans rushed on in pursuit, clouds of powder smoke rolled everywhere, and now as the right was relieved of the assault from the foe the whole christian line got the orders to advance, and now the reserve forces of Abbieamians rushed headlong for the centre of the enemy literally running over the series upon series of rifle pits and breastworks and saillents in their front, burst out of the woods like an overwhelming torrent carrying all before them, the panic stricken glandelinians on the center fleeing in every direction and scattered in unmitigated rout the glandelinian center being disastrously defeated. It was a most striking scene to behold the floating signal flags along the battle lines telegraphing to one another, and to hear the cheers that arose along the lines for sixty three miles.

The battle was over the losses of the glandelinians being enormous as they had been so much exposed in their assaults. Ottoman Hamish admitted a loss of 32,000,000. The christian loss was 2,544,544 killed, and 9,252,752 in woe wounded a total of 10,706,912.

The vigorous pursuit was commenced the next morning, but was soon discontinued. The authorities at Glandelinia censured Ottoman Hamish for his disastrous misfortune, alleging that his position was so impregnable that he should not have been defeated, even by the fierce fighter Jack Ambrose Evans, and general Lee Heller Johnston was sent to supersede him in command.

Simultaneously general Jack Dane was sent from Pandora to occupy, Helions station, to which he went, repairing to Pandora and assuming command, then to Clarence Hogan, on the Salablainian river, and then across the country driving all the glandelinians before him with a battle. The glandelinians under general Ashes finally made a stand three miles below Little Helen but were defeated not by fighting but by man evers of the christians, and pursued so vigorously that they were unable to set fire to the town. The glandelinian power at this portion of the boundary line of Angolonia was effectually broken, though only squads of glandelinians Glandelinian guerrillas prowled for some time about the country, robbing the houses, granaries, and cellars of the christian citizens, and under an outlaw named Guintrillion a band of these marauders dashed into Lawrence (Angolonia) at half past three in the afternoon and murdered in cold blood every man and woman and child they could find. Simultaneously to this expedition of Glandelinian troops occupied Coppos Christi on the Angolonian coast, and Brownsia on the Aberdeen in G/a glandelinia, simultaneously an expedition was sent up the McWhirther River against Federalport an important point.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FEDERALPORT.....

After much preparations general Jack Brown was ready to move. Admiral Adverses with fifteen hundred battle ships, passed up the great McWhirther Run River, freeing it of obstructions and its banks from the presence of the christians by a vigorous shelling of thirteen days. Passing the gunboats and fleets of warships reached Alexandria and the glandelinian troops after making ten vigorous assaults losing thirteen million for their success obtained possession of the town, and the Abbieamians scattered all over the town and country, burned all the cotton they could find, destroyed all the farms, and burned down thousands of farm houses, and set the woods on fire as well. The army then from necessity and suffering from bloody losses sustained from Abbieamian counter attacks, and from the fire of many scores of Abbieamian batteries, left by the river, the advance carelessly fell into an ambuscade, was annihilated, the force occupying the town was surrounded and captured, and finally the remaining forces abandoning the region and their trains pushed on till they reached the main army.....

The next day the Abbieamians much elated made a tremendous and general assault of fourteen hours duration upon the glandelinian forces but were frightfully repulsed with the severest losses. The fleets itself bombarded the town of Federalport for fourteen days, and after a terrible cannonading three quarters of the ships were wrecked, with their decks smashed in the terrible numbers of dead and wounded, and the whole fleet was almost torn to pieces. It was thought best to give up the bloody interprise, since the river was falling fast, and the ships surviving the battle would be useless. When the fleets reached the rapids near Alexandria it was found it could not pass down, the ships of the christians were converging on all points, and finally the glandelinians surrendered. Thus ended this fruitless expedition.

THREE OTHER BATTLES.....

Simultaneously the glandelinian general wick "Keykey" carried on an irregular warfare in western Angolonia always treating the christian inhabitants with the greatest cruelty. He captured the Angolonia city with its Garrison of 456,731 men after a bombardment of five weeks, he also made a desperate three days attack upon Francis paducah but was repulsed with the loss of 4,567,992, while those of the christians who had fallen was 10,000,000. The same gasey and his band of ardues carried the fortifications of Pillow by series of desperate assaults lasting five days, about three weeks later, and after the fortifications surrendered, the garrison to the number of 300,000 were all slaughtered in cold blood, because a portion were Abbieamians. Gasey from his statement of the case seems to have been at least not altogether responsible for these outrages.

As a survey of the position of affairs at this time it may be stated;

There were sixteen main army armies of the confederacy of glandelinia six under the direction of the Hanleys and their assistance, and the others defending the glandelinian capitol, the great strategic point, and railroad center of the whole world, the many great rivers was patrolled by the fleets of the christians to their mouths, the line of the Frainia was held, and all west and north of that great stream, all the points north of the McWhirther Run were held by the Abbieamians, at the mouth of the Easter starring was a strong Garrison, along the Calverinian and Angolonian coast, in addition to the strong blockade any important places were held, all of Calverinia and Angolonia was now in possession of the Angolians and Abbieamians once more, and even the city of Giviana on the glandelinian boundary line which had been captured by the christian general by that name.

Such was the position when through the Angolonian governments general Jack Evans assumed supreme command with Hanson. His design was to keep the three Hanleys so hard pressed that they would not be able to hereafter to join one another. His designs was the cause of the wars short duration that following year.

THE BLOODY BATTLE OF GILMORE.

April 30th

Richardson Halsted was now ready to move with his fresh armies. At Pattonia thirty miles southeast of Phalanterburg was the glandelinian army 30,000,000 strong under general Lee Heller Johnston. And by its well chosen position it could have been equal to twice that number. Here the glandelinian general Johnston was waiting to be attacked, and though the attack of the christians was made on the point near Gilmore, it happened that a portion of the christian army by a rapid march through passes and gorges, had flanked him upon his left, and was threatening the railroads in his rear, while another portion was moving upon his front, and still another on his right was marching round his heavily attacked army, he was therefore after a days hard fighting compelled to give up his stronghold, and fall back eighteen miles to Gilmore itself, another strong position behind Daytonia creek, its whole line well fortified on steep hills. Richardson Halsted during the early morning reconnoitered, and making a fearful assault again flanked his adversary.

Heller Johnston at one time thinking he had discovered a weak point in the strong christian line, made a desperate counter attack upon the twentieth or corps, Fredrickson Parsons, but was repulsed at all points, and driven from several strong holds with great loss.

Failed at every attempt to force his forces against the Abbeoannian, left and at 7 P.M. the glandelinians came in tremendous force and fury, and overwhelming numbers upon that point. The Abbeoannians after sanguinary fighting for four hours were forced back eighteen miles. Suddenly a tremendous cheer was heard from hundreds of thousands of voices, and Frederickson Parsons came up and the first intimation they gave the enemy was the cheer, which was followed by a headlong rush over the bodies of their fallen comrades. They broke a portion of the enemy's line beyond recovery and drove them more than a mile. At two o'clock in the next morning the foe evacuated Gilmore passing over the Easter Starling River, and breaching down all the bridges behind them, and moved on until they reached the Chickadee River over which they crossed and took position on the Atleonia hills, where on the crest were arranged batteries to sweep every approach and here Johnston resolved to fight the decisive part of the battle. The Abbeoannian army came up, but Richardson Halsted had no idea of sacrificing too many of his men by assaulting so strong a position, and though he made some tremendous assaults he managed to flank Johnston again to compel him to fall back. It soon however again became a battle severely contested, but at length the whole glandelinian force was driven back to where three important roads met. The Abbeoannian soldiers threw up intrenchments during the night, which Johnston assaulted fifteen times and was repulsed with horrible loss. The Abbeoannians afterwards made a gallant assault upon what was deemed a weak point of the enemy's line, and they too were repulsed with the wounding of Frederickson Parsons.

The glandelinian commander then remained quiet for the remainder of the night and Halsted ordered a movement to his rear, and Johnston thought best to fall back once more to a new position to the right of Gilmore, fortifying and extending his lines about thirty miles, his centre being much advanced. On the centre the enemy had signal stations, but Halsted's sign-corpse learned their sign codes and revealed their secrets. During a tremendous assault lasting four hours and made by the foe with terrible vehemence general Oyester pocket-feller with his staff came out to lead a charge a battery was fired at the group of officer officers by the Christians and all the officers including the glandelinian generals were killed. Halsted decided to break the enemy's line at the advanced center, and a rapid artillery fire was opened upon it. The assault was repulsed, and then the glandelinians made an assault upon Halsted's advanced line, driving back the whole force, and came upon the main line behind extemporized breastworks. The assailants were repulsed with fearful slaughter, leaving the field covered with their dead. Sixteen times they returned to the assault, but by flanking his adversary right and left, and while Thomas Fair weather was pressing back the assailants in front the Christians were enabled to break the Mason line once more, and the foe fled in the greatest confusion.

The losses of the glandelinians was 4,567,000. Christian loss was 8,990,765. That night strange noises like earthquakes and explosions were heard in the direction of the retreating enemy. Johnston was blowing up all his munition stores and evacuating the whole region. H. Johnston's scattered forces were afterwards more or less scarcely less united, and he made many attempts to annoy the Christian army by cutting railroads and attacking places garrisoned, but in all these he totally failed.

Halsted's army marched in two columns with spreading wings, extending over 265 miles, so thoroughly bewildering the enemy of God, that for a while the glandelinians were unable to make much opposition. For McAllister was next taken without a battle, the defenses of Bloomingdale was also taken, and general Hardison in consequence evacuated the city without a fight, which was immediately occupied by Christian soldiers.

We now return to the armies under general Viviania and Mr Nero and Nero. Arrangements were made for the preparation of the final struggles along the Angelinian-Glandelinian boundary line. General Viviania was assigned to the general supervision of the Christian forces designed to follow up the Erwinite to Gibbie Fair, and to make a strong diversion toward Aronburg Federal. He had about 33,000,897 men under the main commands of generals Concentinian Aronburg, and Everette True, the latter being recalled from Calverinia with 10,000,000 men. General Cannon the friend of the Vivian girls was in command in that famous battle field of the war now about to be fought, in connecting with general Jacob Baldwin on the Cainsbury, general Zimmermann the hero of Glorinda with the main army on the north bank of the Mc-Hollister Run.

Hebaun Manley's army lay on the south side of the Mc-Hollister Run, virtually intrenched in an extensive wilderness, a barren region covered with all kinds of tripoal growth, and palm trees, where even a thousand soldiers could keep fourteen times their number at bay for any length of time. This was intersected by scores of broad and narrow cross roads, bounded on either side by a perfect jungle. The whole district and every road was through outly known to the glandelinian generals, and general Hebaun Manley from his position and knowledge of the ground was able to throw as he wished a strong force on any particular point. The Christian and Abbeoannian army crossed the Mc-Hollister Run at Germainia Viviania's forces unopposed but purposely by the foe in order to secure a battle in this wilderness. Viviania had intended to pass rapidly through this Angelinian jungle with as little fighting as possible and force his adversary back across the boundary line, because in that jungle he could not deploy his men and could use only twenty out of his three hundred thousand pieces of artillery. He neither could he use his cavalry.

BATTLE IN THE ANGELINIAN WILDERNESS.

May 1

Early the next morning the Christian armies began their onward march to get beyond this labyrinth of trees, when it was met at two points by three big glandelinian armies, each 10,000,000 strong, brought up by parallel roads. This was at first thought to be a feint but at 11 A.M. the battle began in earnest, by the Christian soldiers assaulting the enemy. The battle had only continued for four hours, when the scene was like the most vast inferno ever imagined. It was as if the whole wilderness was on fire, the soldiers grouping for each other through the thicket, firing like blazes at the enemy, and with various successes at different parts of the woods. The fallen lay as thick as leaves blown down by the hurricane. The first part of the conflict, ending with a lull at two o'clock was a draw, but at three o'clock general Nero fell furiously on the center of the glandelinian army, the inferno was intensified ten fold, and after raging the horrible conflict for four more hours the glandelinians were driven back for three miles and a half, with the loss of many prisoners.

Trees were by the million were pierced by bullets. The glandelinians soon outnumbered Nero, and in turn forced him back over the same ground repeating the inferno scene, but at seven P.M. he made a desperate stand from which the enemy failed to move him though assaults were made till ten o'clock in the night without intermission. Here fell general Nero a general and gentleman of excellent worth, and high social position, and here also fell the glandelinian generals, Jones Parkerson, Guy Jenkins, and Standford, and staffed very efficient officers.

There was a lull for some hours when the enemy at eleven P.M. that night made a more desperate assault upon Viviania and partially forced him from his position after a horrible conflict which almost terminated into a general massacre, so fierce was the firing, but now being reinforced by the Twentieth corps of Concentinians Viviania drove the assailants, back then Everette True charged, engaged the enemy for four hours in a paroxysm of horror and was in turn driven back with horrible slaughter in generals and privates. Here the glandelinian general Cannonia was severely wounded, and carried from the field, and Manley himself took immediate command.

He restored order, but all his desperate attempts to retrieve the field were in vain. When the Christian center advanced during a headlong assault the next morning, Manley after desperate resistance for five hours, was forced to fall back to a second position more strongly intrenched. This new line of battle was sixty miles long, along which raged one of the most terrific conflicts in southern Angelinia. Manley toward noon was forced to fall back again, and afterwards fought only behind long lines of breastworks so except where it could not be avoided. So many losses were sustained during the battle, and so many his bitter disasters and defeats that the glandelinians were evidently discouraged, and when a portion of the Christian army moved by night toward the right grand division of Manley's army, he fell back lest he be taken in the rear. Now recommenced another series of horrible conflicts in one of which general Viviania one of the main leaders of the Christian generals was killed. General Everette True had to take command of the armies, and the fighting went on in the most savage manner. Everette True made a dash at an advanced position of the enemy, stormed it for four hours, rushed over the long line of breastworks, and captured the two glandelinian generals, Henry son Federal, and Hendon Camillia, and nearly 4,500,000 prisoners and thirty thousand guns. Everette True then moved on and after more desperate fighting yet of the battle captured a second line of rifle pits, this brought on another general action of the battle which lasted three more days, the latter in the midst of a violent rainstorm.

Everette True now delayed to move on several days, in order that the millions of wounded could be sent to the hospitals..... A large number of surgeons arrived from the north, from the Angolindian cities, and members of both the Sanitary and Christian commissions, to take care of these wounded, also reinforcements and supplies came up. General Magdalena Lee Evans during this great battle had set out with a large force of cavaliers, moving toward Pheasantonburg to a decisive battle, then eastward along the right wing of the Landolinians, reached the railroad in their rear, and destroyed fifty miles of it, locomotives, innumerable trains of cars, and immense quantities of ammunition, and provisions, and released about 12,456,789 prisoners. He pursued his way, burning depots and breaking railroads. At length he fell in with that valiant Glandolinian raider and child butcher, Hubbard Mc-Hollester; they came to tremendous blows, and the Landolinians were defeated, leaving their commander Mc-Hollester mortally wounded. Pushing on Evans came upon the outer defenses of Titanic Fair itself. There he took but found the outer defenses too strong, and so he retired rapidly to and across the Easter Starring, and after a raid of twenty four hours returned to the main Christian army. This raid in its effects was one of the most important in the whole war. General Glandolinian simultaneously after severe fighting destroyed a railroad bridge and a portion of the track seventeen miles north of the wilderness, the force capturing some intrenchments at the railroad.

The Landolinian general Henry Starring was in command at this point, and he made a tremendous assault on the Christians at this point who were compelled to fall back with the loss of general Juncus who was killed. But another portion of the Abissinian army by a flank movement came upon the north bank of the Easter Starring, for three more days Everette True made fierce assaults, and then in the night commenced flanking his adversary, and Juncus was again compelled to abandon his position and fall back, but at the new point the Landolinians made a sudden attack in great force, and though repulsed with heavy loss, returned to the attack until their commander Henonida Baldwin was killed then they abandoned the assault. Then Everette True to test their works ordered a general assault along the whole line. This was vigorously done, and after bloody fighting the enemy were driven out of their first defenses, and took shelter behind their second second line, which were too strongly fortified to be easily taken. Finally the Landolinians resumed the offensive and made many wild and insane charges during the day against the Christian lines, but in every instance were repulsed with heavier loss. Juncus ordered series of attacks of the most violent character on three more successive nights and days on the strong Christian lines. Every one failed, and his army sustained unaccountable losses. These attacks raging so incessantly night and day for already ten to eleven days showed the desperation of the enemy, and the watchfulness of the Christians, who were never surprised.

General Everette True finding after all that the fortifications were very strong in front, determined to unite with Mc-Maurice Bel Benligan and move on Titanic Fair by way of the Easter Starring, and general Juncus deeming Titanic Fair more assailable from this direction than from the north was worried in the extreme. Indeed this movement took the enemy by surprise as it was accomplished with so much celerity, and with scarcely any difficulty though fighting of the most savage fury continued day after day. A portion of the Christian troops passed by water, down the Easter Starring and up the Mc-Hollester Run, and the remainder by land, crossing these two rivers on pontoon bridges.

Meantime an important Cavalry raid, by the Christians under generals B. B. Davidson and Callum was conducted north of Titanic Fair, destroying a portion of the Mc-Hollester and Pandora railroad, in the wilderness, the Evangelina St. Lare, and the northwestern, in all about 170 miles, with immense amounts of rolling stocks and depots, and then after severe fighting returned to the army having lost their light artillery. The damage done to the enemy in this battle and two or three expeditions more than compensated for the losses sustained.

BATTLE OF BROCKENRIDGE. SPRING OF OTHER BATTLES. THREE OF THEM IN ORDER.

Meanwhile general John Picknell who was in command at Brockenridge with too small a force---3,000,000 men--- was defeated at that place by Sherman's army, general Crocker in west Angolindia failing to cooperate with John Picknell who was killed in the engagement and lost 2,456,789 men in the three hours battle. General Edwin Hunterson was appointed in Picknell's place, and he was ordered to move up the valley, and destroy the railroads in the vicinity of Stauntonia and G. Orgonville, and general Crocker was to come in from the East. Hunterson hastened on, and met the enemy within eight miles of Stauntonia, and after a desperate conflict of ten hours routed them beyond recovery, capturing 1,500,000 prisoners; the Glandolinian commander Dandel Jones being killed. Their loss in killed and wounded was 9,876,988. Hunter lost only 678,987 men. Three days later he occupied Stauntonia and now joined by Crocker's troops he marched toward Lackberry Run to which place general John Manley had sent a large force by railway. Hunterson's ammunition had given out, and he skimming and fighting desperately on the way with the enemy fell back not toward Evans' army as was expected, and from which Germaine Givian made a raid in order to meet him but toward Western Angolindia. This retreat left the region once more open to the Glandolinians who under general Mc-Hollester, pushed on in force to make a raid into Angolindia and obtain forage and supplies, and as usual make a demonstration against Pandora, and induce Juncus Givian to sent reinforcements from his inactive army. The latter promptly sent troops from the Angolindian run, and ordered others to follow, who had just arrived in Hamptonia roads from Angolindia. Mc-Hollester with about 20,000,000 men moved rapidly down the fields and valleys to St. Martin, where general Pan was in command with a strong force. The latter however without an engagement retreated across the Angolindian run. The enemy of God followed rapidly, and crowding over arrived at the town of Sandfort, the citizens saving the town by paying to the Glandolinians a ransom of $20,000,000. General Wallace Lee attacked the new invaders so vigorously in ten severe battles at that very town as to retard them until mere troops arrived and then he being still outnumbered fell back, and the Glandolinians moved toward the city of Pandora but being met by the bold attacks of general August Auger at that place retired across the Angolindian run, and were in turn pursued by general Juncus with 10,000,000 cavaliers who overtook their rear guard at Godfrey and captured 500,000 prisoners.

THE SANBUDINARY BATTLE OF GODFREY.

May 13

By this time general Hunterson had arrived from the western parts of Angolindia and Angolindia with two armies, and was ordered to maintain his position but general Mc-Hollester was heavily reinforced, and again began to move into Angolindia, forcing the Christian troops out by outflanking the. At the same time another Glandolinian raid was made into Angolindia under general Cedornine Jennings, he suddenly appeared before the village of Cedornine, then defensible and demanded $500,000 ransom. The Christian citizens were unable to raise a sum, and the soldiers deliberately set the village on fire, and not only burned two thirds of it but carried off all the Angolindian children and massacred them in the most shocking manner. This Glandolinian raider was pursued but he escaped and joined Mc-Hollester who had concentrated his forces near the town of Godfrey..... General Henry King Baggot moved against Mc-Hollester with his army of Angolindians, and early in the next morning, attacked Mc-Hollester, and after obstinate fighting all day carried his entire position, and drove him through Godfrey. Mc-Hollester lost 3,500,000 killed and 5,678,999 wounded, general Cedornine Jennings being mortally wounded, and his entire command cut to pieces, with the survivors taken prisoners and butchered for revenge over the murder of helpless children. General Mc-Hollester in his retreat did not dare to stop until he reached Millers Creek thirty miles south of Godfrey, and scarcely had he halted his men when the indomitable Baggot pounced upon him, driving his forces with greater loss through Millfordburg, and scattering them across the Millery Run. But in the meantime general Mc-Hollester having rallied his forces, at the arrival of heavy reinforcements, waited for the arrival of morning, and moving rapidly and secretly he early in the morning fell suddenly upon the sleeping Christian soldiers, who though completely taken by surprise, recovered themselves, and suddenly fell back to their second line position from which they tore up the assaulting lines of the foe with a terrific terrific fire of cannon and musketry. The Angolindian cavaliers in the meantime moved around and attacked the foe in the flank, while the infantry after pouring in a terrific fire for four hours, charged the foe in front, completely routing and driving them clear from the field and back to their own works.

During the retreat a terrific explosion of munition works occurred among the enemy's redoubts, tearing it all to pieces and annihilating three quarters of the division at that section. In Mc-Hollesters came it was found nevertheless that the defenses were so well arranged that it was madness to throw away human life in assaulting them, as one man within each intrenchment was at least overwhelming to fifteen outside. But nevertheless the christian army was not idle. A strong detachment seized the Pampa Pandora Meldon railway and held it in spite of the most strenuous efforts to dislodge them. Several other bloody movements were made but without any success.

Baggot decided to have his fleets bombard Mc-Hollesters positions from the Easter Starring river, and so the expedition of ships arrived, and arrangements were made on board the flag ship the Margret Ford, with general Cannery. The river side of Mc-Hollesters position was defended by redoubts and batteries and strong as a thousand forts in that one section, and in the river were floating the main reliance of the glandelinians their own rams and battle ships, besides numerous dangerous submarines. Reinforcing troops were landed on the west side of the hostile position, to operate against Mc-Hollester from that quarter. After three days of land fighting with Mc-Hollester and King Baggot, the christian fleets steamed in between the two Glandelinian fortified positions and gave their broadsides at short distances.

After a most gallant bombardment the iron clads were withdrawn as it was discovered that to take the position the land forces must act simultaneously. Ten of the christian battle ships were so badly damaged that they blew up destroying every fighter on board. A continuous bombardment of thirteen hours however had crumbled the eastern redoubts to pieces. Twenty other christian ships had run foul of the glandelinian submarines which let loose their torpedoes sinking the ships, but the christian shore batteries hammered at these submarines sinking them also, while the remaining Abbeaunian battle ships now poured in a general fire that was incessant broadside following broadside in quick succession of about 375 shots per second, eighty glandelinian ships were down upon the christian fleet, the fury of the cannonading increased, but the foe's ships torn to pieces surrendered, but without the simultaneous action of the christian troops on the land side the fleet could not bring the defenders of the redoubts into submission and signals came to Baggot to make a tremendous assault right away or the fleets would have to retire. General Antoine Hardee was ordered by Baggot to charge, he made a charge that was our rising to the christian commander himself, the whole right wing of Mc-Hollesters force was crushed, and the survivors fled, Hardee pursued, the right wing again made a stand and was again disastrously defeated, losing all their guns, 1,000,000 in prisoners, and in generals Costello, Montrose, Granger, Cresco, Conroy, Concoe, Cornscoe, Callaboonia, Cassels, Carladeor, Costello, Costello, Cannonia, Crawford, Crew, Costelloe and Carlisle Liebermann who were all mortally wounded.

So fierce was the Abbeaunian advance and pursuit at this point that the whole cavarly force rode one hundred two miles in thirty six hours, and driving the right wing beyond recovery. General Baggot assaulted the left and center many times and though often repulsed with great loss he managed at last to drive the foe out of the first line of works with the loss of 1,750,000 killed and 3,800,000 wounded. The main glandelinian center fell back in accordance with orders, the left still held firmly, but a heavy movement was made against Mc-Hollesters left by general Aronburg Stedman by which movement Mc-Hollester was deceived, and sent reinforcements from the last of his reserves. Then at the proper moment, general Caldwell and Burns swung around and attacked the weakest point, and carried every thing before them, in one instant the christian cavarly 10,000,000 strong dismounted, and carried a heavily redoubt single handed sabre in hand cutting wanton slaughter, then the second redoubt which the fleets had been unable to subdue the same cavarly troops carried in the same manner a slaughter, all its defenders because they would not yield. Then Fairbanks carried general Mc-Hollesters main position, the foe being driven out of their original line, and was forced back along the base of Maria Heights a new position, which was also forced after a storming assault the foe losing 1,200,000 more in prisoners, and sixteen hundred pieces of artillery, arms and wagons. The christian army bivouacked on the field and prepared to continue driving the enemy on the morrow. At 6 P.M. an assault was delivered with horrible violence against the whole christian line just as they were resting, and though taken by surprise, the main line held firmly till nine o'clock though the left and center was driven back two miles, and general Baggot, viewing the tremendous assault sent reinforcements from his right and center, and as more glandelinian columns moved to the assault they thoughtfully drew the heaviest Abbeaunian musketry and artillery fire they had ever encountered, and were compelled to fall back to be reformed. The signal was given, and then upon the glandelinian right and center, like a mighty storm were rushed the christian forces under generals Caldwell and ganderly countercharging the foe as they were reforming, and in that heading onrush carried all before them with the greatest impetuosity.

Meanwhile the other assaulting glandelinian columns having been reformed for the second time moved against the christian line, drove back the columns that made the furious counter charge, and carried a good portion of the christian position by a most desperate assault..... The whole Abbeaunian line it seemed was broken beyond recovery but not so. In these terrible onslaughts the enemy had lost about 24,000,000 men in killed and wounded, and though capturing 53,000 pieces of artillery could not even hold them long enough to fire one discharge, and while most of the christian line was badly broken up general Owens arrived with a column of 7,000,000 cavarly, added by a force of 7,000,000 dragoons or lancers, 8,000,000 consen tinians, and over 10,000,000 Abyssinians, while quickly after him came general Vanderbilt with a force of 38,000,000 infantry, and 3,000,000 cavarly, and these assaulted the works captured by the enemy carried them with one simultaneous bold dash and recaptured all the guns while the enemy were trying furiously but in vain to fire the first discharge. Again the christians secured 17,500,000 prisoners. A vigorous attack of maddened violence was made by the foe to retake these works, an overwhelming force of Arabian Curdes and Kurds furiously assaulting the works and positions, again the christian force was overpowered and driven back with great loss, and with the death of general Baggot the main commander General Crawford took his place and by making a heavy concentration from the right and left, caused the triumph of the enemy to be short, and though the glandelinians managed to use the captured artillery this time, and pour in their shots so incessantly as to tear line after line of christians to pieces, the whole force of glandelinians who had captured the works fought themselves surrounded, and out of 10,000,000 of them only two 2,345,678 surrendered, the rest having fought to the last. General Meade Francis seized the well intrenched right line of the glandelinians, securing a large number of prisoners, but he himself was killed, and by a prompt counter assault of greater violence the whole christian line was again shattered, but all efforts to regain the once captured position was repulsed with fearful loss. On the extreme christian left a similar assault of great violence was made, but resulting the same.

The battle had now raged until nine o'clock but now instead of waiting till the morrow as King Baggot had proposed Crawford at once resolved to resume the attack on the enemy, and cut off their retreat by the Easter Starring. In preparation he secretly sent troops to his extreme left, and gave orders to Antoine to move on the right flank close to the foe's center. General Mc-Hollester learned of these movements and suspecting the design threw 17,000,000 of his best men to the support of his right, and these made a heavier assault than ever, and amidst the fierce storm of christian fire, the assailants gained a greater advantage than before during the battle, crushing the Abbeaunian left to pieces, and annihilating Antoine Hardee's whole division, but Crawford threw his reserves upon the assailants, the reserves were beaten back, with three quarters of their number shot down, then troops and artillery were sent from the right, and these after horrible fighting finally beat off the glandelinian assailants, and finally the christians carried the very earth works from which the enemy issued, and obtained possession. But this at once led to fighting of more horrible fur and violence. The glandelinians came on wildly once again, driving the reinforced christian left and center back, but presently a fresh division by a gallant counter assault, checked the furious glandelinian advance for a time.

Crawford dismounted his great cavarly forces, and managed them so skillfully as to repel the fiercest attack at every point. The christian forces under Mangoline drove the glandelinians in front of them, to the skirmish lines, then by impetuous attacks the glandelinians were driven to Ten P.M. within their main lines. Mangoline in his report said;

"The enemy after the most desperate assaults by my men were driven from their strong line of works, and completely routed, the fifth corps doubling up their shattered flanks in confusion capturing many prisoners, besides officers, and the cavarly under general Penigan dashing over the position captured the foe's artillery, and turning it upon them, and riding into their disorganized ranks, carrying all before them, and so demoralized were the glandelinians that they made no further serious stand or charges after their line was carried, but took to uttermost flight in disorder."

